The tutor began to inquire into Robert's accomplishments. Unluckily, he began with French and Latin, and Robert knew not a word of either. Down he went into the beginning-class, where the boys were younger and much smaller than himself. As this class were also in the rudiments of geography, arithmetic, history, and grammar, Robert was very unequally placed, for he had been well drilled in all these branches, and in them, as reading, spelling, and penmanship, scarcely a boy in the school was equal to him. The schoolmaster in the little red school-house had done his work well, and beside these important branches of education had given Robert and his fellow-pupils a fund of useful general information. Robert was disgusted and discouraged to find himself put back in the English branches, to a place which he had passed two years before. He felt that the tutor and the pupils unjustly undervalued his acquisitions, but he did not understand that he should remonstrate against his unpleasant position.

"Put all your time on these grammars, until you catch up with the class," said the tutor, handing him his Latin first books.

The other boys in beginning had had explanations in class, and, for years, had heard other boys reciting in Latin. Robert had had none of these aids, and the pages looked to him a senseless and hopeless maze. Oh, what a hateful school this was! Oh, to be back at the red school-house on the Mountain! Recess came, and the boys took him in hand. Their examination was as ruthless and unsatisfactory as that of the tutor.

"Can you play cricket?"

"No."

"Base-ball?"

"No."

"Can you fence?"

"No."

"Have you been drilled in gymnastics? Can you do this and that and the other, that these boys are doing on the bars and rings and ropes?"

"No." Robert had not been initiated into any of these things.

"Gracious goodness, man!" cried the young leader of the school. "Where have you lived? Have you been brought up in the backwoods?"

"Yes, I have," said Robert, promptly.

"Didn't you go to school?" exclaimed several.

"Yes. Certainly."

"Then why are you not on better? Did you not begin Latin?"

"No. They taught no Latin in my school."

"I wish I'd been there," groaned one boy.

"You're in for it here," said another. "It is nothing but cram, cram, cram at Latin from week's end to week's end."

Poor Robert! He could have crammed anything else with a better heart. He had no natural talent for languages, and his present tutor was not one calculated to inspire enthusiasm for a study. His classmates being younger than himself, and not particularly gifted, Robert found it easy to overtake them in the few lessons by which they were in advance of him. That done, the regular lessons in Latin and French occupied but a little time each day, and the lessons in arithmetic, grammar, history, and geography he did not need to study at all, as his drill on them had been thorough in the red school-house. Thus left to idle time, Robert would fall to dreaming.

Oh, beautiful red school-house on the mountain-side. How good it had been to be there, exchanging dagger-glances of wrath and challenge with his enemy, Jim Long; striving, in generous emulation, with Tom Britt for the headship of the classes; getting peeps at marvellous worlds through the master's microscope; dear Pink on the seat by his side, sharing his blue desk all the years of their school-life, Pink's yellow head bowed over the same Reader with his head; Pink's wide, dismayed blue eyes turned to him in appeal for help over difficult problems, for arithmetic was Pink's terror and Robert's forte. How delightful had been school-life up there on the Mountain! In summer, looking through open door or window, you could see red or gray squirrels whirling around the tree-trunks; or great, splendid wood-peckers drumming for food; in the autumn, the trees in red and gold, made garlands all around the play-ground, and you could hear chestnuts and hickorynuts rattle down among the withered leaves; in winter, how whitely lay the snows about the door, and what fantastic shapes the trees and bushes took under their soft mantles; and, then, in spring, the robins and bluebirds came to the very threshold, or window-seat, and built nests in plain sight! Robert's longing soul would be lost in such dreams as these, the splendid appointments of his present "First-class Establishment for Young Gentlemen" quite forgotten, until the sharp rap, rap, rap of the tutor's ruler on the desk, and the warning voice, "Robert Murray! You are not attending to your lessons!" would bring him to himself. But what lessons had he to attend to?

Robert had no especial talent for drawing; he was no artist in embryo, but he could scrawl or sketch something that was at least recognizable. His hand, following the meanderings of his heart, drew inside the covers, on the fly-leaves, all along the margins of his books, mills and water-wheels; rows of beehives. One-legged Jerrys climbed up along the right-hand margin of his history and travelled down the left-hand margin, and marched across the lower margins, as if one-legged Jerrys were the sole heroes of the historic tales. Over the pages of his copy-book, in and out among maps and Caucasians and Ethiopians and Malays, rolled dripping mill-wheels, and rose trembling little bridges and rude picnic camps. The barge Fair-Weather sailed right across the unimpeachable pages of the spelling-book, and Bop's rudely-cropped head and square, honest countenance, looked forth among examples for parsing and graced the interstices of the multiplication-table. Eliza, Pink, and Captain Zekiel did not appear in these tracings, they were too sacred to delineate, but none the less did Robert hug their dear images in his heart.

Mr. Murray, intensely proud of his son, had boasted of him much to the Principal of the "First-class Establishment." Too much, the Principal thought. He believed it only right to lower this paternal pride a little.

"The boy is very backward; he is in class with boys two years younger," he said to Mr. Murray.

"That is owing to his unfortunate lack of advantages; he will soon press on and take his proper place."

"Indeed, I fear not. He is not even diligent; he sits and dreams and idles away his time. He is the least attentive boy in school. He seems never to be paying attention to his books."

Mr. Murray, much dismayed, implored Robert to take an interest, to be diligent, to get on quickly.

"I don't know what to do," said Robert. "I know all my lessons. I never make a mistake."

"I daresay not. Well, Robert, apply yourself—apply yourself. You must make up for two or three years that you are behind the rest."

Robert, however, was in the very agonies of home-sickness. His lonely heartache grew upon him; he could not distract his mind from his lost home and friends; his heart hovered over their memory, as a bird hovers over her nestlings. Neither study nor sport attracted him.

"I hope my son is giving you more satisfaction," said Mr. Murray, anxiously, to the Principal.

For answer, the disgusted Principal spread before him Robert's books "with original illustration," none of them belonging to the text.

"That is the way he spends his time in school! I never saw such a sight in my life as those books! How can a boy learn from books scrawled up in that fashion!"

Mr. Murray was about as much dismayed at the sight of these "free-hand drawings" as was the Principal. With these before his eyes continually, Robert would be little likely to forget Lal's Mountain and the Allen mill.

"Get him a new set of books, burn these up, and let him keep the others clean," decided Mr. Murray.

Therefore, Robert found on his desk a complete new set of books, and a card with the legend: "Robert Murray, having ruined one set of books in a few weeks, is provided with another set, and requested not to scrawl on the margins."

Letters came to Robert from the mill. Now and then Captain Allen would labor at a note to "his dear son," a note only moderately well spelled, and very poorly written. Bop wrote a sheet of chronicles of nutting expeditions, and snow-fort building and defending, and besieging. Bap's letter was open to criticism. Bop was not strong in English grammar. But Eliza and Pink wrote most of the letters, and filled them with the simple chronicles of the home, and the neighborhood, and the burden of their longing for their "dearest Robert." These letters Robert seized with eagerness, and read again and again.

"I wonder what Pink put that 'lec' in red ink, over the top of her letter for," he said, absently, one day, as, sitting on his desk, during "nooning," he read a letter. "I wonder where Pink got the red ink."

North, the boy whom he liked best, was reading a letter near him.

"What are you talking about, Murray? That 'lec'?" Pink, as you call her, didn't do that. Don't you know anything, boy? The Prex put that there to show that he had read it."

"Read my letter! What right had he to read my letter?"

"The right of might, and, moreover, the right of law. It is a rule of the establishment; the Prex sees all the letters. Haven't you noticed they are all unsealed?"

"So they are. I was so glad to get mine, I never noticed it. I think that is a mean rule. I don't like my letters read."

"It's not pleasant," said North; "but after all, there is some reason in it. I have known of a fearful lot of trash being into school-mails, where they were not looked after. I suppose the Prex only glances at them, though."

"Lec—what does lec mean?" said Robert.

"Why, man, it's a supine. You are dull! Lego, legera, legi, lectum—lectum, read. There, now, that's Latin."

"Lectum? I thought it meant a bed; it does in my book."

"It can mean more than one thing, can't it? Don't we say in English: I may read, and I have read (red) a book."

"But they are parts of the same verb, you know."

"Well, we say a pair of shoes, and we eat a pear."

"But they are spelled differently."

"But, boy, we say you peer into a well, and that one man is another man's peer. Such are some of the beauties of the English language. The Latin has similar beauties, as you will slowly discover."

"Anyway, I am sorry that Pink's letters are read. Still, if it is a rule, I can't help it."

"Since we came here under rules, we might as well abide by them with a good grace; it is only honorable to do so," said North. "But the rules are easily evaded. I often think laws seem only made to be broken. Half of the boys get letters, privately, through that stationer's little shop around the corner. They are sent to the man there, for the boys. There is no rule to hinder a fellow buying pens or paper, and his letters are slipped into his pocket meanwhile."

"But I think that looks very mean of the stationer. He should let the Prex run his school in his own way. He should not help the boys to break rules."

"Bah! he dopt care. The boys pay him for it. If it was only the letters, now! But he sells candy by the pounds, secretly to them, and wine and beer. He keeps bottles of those things under his counter. The fellows run in to buy a paper, or a pencil, and swallow a drink. One fellow carried off three bottles, hidden about him, and drank them and got drunk; and we did have work to keep him in bed in the morning, and not let the Tute know what was up."

"I think that is beastly," said Robert, full of disgust.

"So do I. But there is scarcely a big school where there is not near it some place to sell drinks. The law is that no saloons or liquor-selling places are to be near school-houses. I read that once in Boston, two saloons were nearer the school-house than the law allowed. But instead of ordering the liquor-places away, they got the school-houses condemned and moved the schools."

"We never had such doings where I came from," said Robert. "I should think this whiskey-selling to the school-children would be found out."

"It is not, or not for a long time. The boys make a point of honor of not telling. While they are acting as they think so honorably, to a rascal who is breaking the law, they are letting their schoolmates, and brothers, and so on, be ruined with whiskey. These places sell brandy in candy jugs and bottles made of sugar; they keep ale and beer under the counter, and rum and gin and wine in lemonade bottles, or labelled 'lime juice,' or 'fruit syrup.' Or, they have a little den behind the shop, where the boys can slide in and get a 'half and half,' or 'Tom and Jerry,' or some such. There are dozens of city school-houses fixed out just that way, with liquor sold at a newspaper-stand, or a lunch-stand, that looks as if it had only cake and biscuits; or at a stationer's shop. Land! I've known boys to really steal dimes from their mother's purse or their father's cash-draw, to buy julep, or egg-nog, or sling with lemon in it."

"I never before heard of such things," cried Robert.

"Oh, well, you're from the country," said North in a superior manner. "Now, some of the fellows are going to have a supper after hours to-night. You see, they smuggle in the things, and, when all the house is asleep, we get up and spread the supper on one of the beds, and sit around in our night-shirts, and feast like Sardanapalus. Perhaps you don't know him, though?"

"Yes, I do know Sardanapalus,—knew him long ago. I've been through Ancient and Modern three times."

"Well, that's the way we do it. To-night the spread is to be turkey stuffed with truffles, pickles, Vienna-rolls, mince-pie, fruit-cake, and some other things. It is in our dormitory, not in yours. I don't mind taking a hand in it myself. It's great fun; only I'm out of this because the fellows have got champagne. I draw a line at champagne. I've no objection to sitting at the head-board or foot-board of the bed in my night-shirt and eating Strasburg patties, or pickled olives, or calves'-foot jelly, or any of the rest, but I don't believe in the champagne. I promised my mother I wouldn't touch any kind of wine, and I'm a man of my word."

"Well, I've signed a temperance pledge," said Robert.

"Signed a pledge, have you? said Crocker, one of the boys, coming in just then. "What did you do that for?"

"Because my father wanted me to, and because I thought I ought to, and because I meant to do it, and so why not say it, and because I believe in temperance."

"Tuts! tuts! Ain't you rich, Murray?"

"No, I am not. I haven't any money at all."

"Then how do you come to be dressed to kill, and have a watch, and a writing-desk, and a dressing-case, and all such paraphernalia?"

"Because my father is rich and buys things for me."

"Well, man, isn't that all the same?"

"No, it is not. A person is rich if he has money that he has earned, or if he has money that has been given to him out and out—not because some of his friends are rich," replied Robert.

A TOOL THAT COST A LIFE.

In a recent mining accident in Cornwall, England, a middle aged miner was among the dead. His fellow-workmen told a sad story of the way in which he lost his life. He had come to work on the morning of the accident bringing with him a new pick for which he had given a sum equivalent to sixty cents. He boasted about his pick and the bargain he made in buying it. While the men were at work a sharp crack was heard. The miners did not need to be told what the meaning was. Looking up, they saw a rent in the coal which formed the roof and they fled for their lives.

Having reached a place of safety near the foot of the shaft they waited momentarily to hear the crash of the falling roof. Among them was the man who owned the new pick. Remembering that he had left it behind and thinking that he might have time to recover it, he started back at a run for the place where it was lying. Before he returned the crash came. When his body was found afterward, the new pick was in his hand. Like him, many a man has been almost saved, having decided to quit his sins and become a follower of Christ, but returning to the scene of his worldly pleasures for one last indulgence, has been again enmeshed and has lost his soul.

THE CAGED BIRD.

A YOUNG lady once said to Dr. Mackay, "What does all this preaching mean? Why, I feel as happy as a bird, just as happy as the day is long, and I have nothing to do with it." "So, madame," was the reply. "you say you feel as happy as a bird. Of what bird may I ask?" "Oh, as happy as my canary." "Exactly so, and it is a prisoner, but no more a prisoner than you are." "But, Doctor," argued the young lady, "it does not know it is a prisoner." "So much the worse for the bird. It has been so long confined, that it has forgotten how to soar in the air. It has wings but it cannot use them. It scarcely deserves the name of bird, and now you, madame, are exactly like that bird. You are incarcerated in the devil's cage, but you have been so long there that you have become habituated to it and look upon it more as a home than a prison. Your soul has not cherished a yearning for God. It has not been accustomed to fly to God. The tendency has been to sense, sin, and bondage. If you feel that you do not require God's salvation, it is not because you are better than others but because you are worse and further sunk in the stupor of sin."

WITH YOU ALWAYS.

UPON my life, one day, at highest noon, There fell a dark eclipse. Enwrapped in gloom, With burdened soul, I groped along my way. The burden heavier grew, and deeper still The shadows gathered round my faltering feet, I felt as one who walks unloved, alone, Forgotten even by that Friend who bore Alone upon His breaking heart the woe, The bitter blinding woe of all the world. I prayed. Up through the darkness rose my cry, By night, by day; and this was all my prayer: "Lord, come to me; Oh, come! Lord, come to me!"

My Lord came not! But as I prayed there came, As from the lips of One quite near, this word: "Come unto me! Thou heavy-laden heart, Thou weary, toiling one, come unto me!" And I remembered then what he had said, And oft repeated to my listening heart, In many a lonely walk of years ago: "Lo, I am with you always, to the end!" Then straightway I was comforted in Him, And knew that warm, sweet Presence in the dark. Assured that He had never left my side, At highest noon, or deepest, darkest night. So will I hold me henceforth to his word, And trust where I can neither see nor hear, For He is faithful that hath promised me.

THE GOSPEL BY THE SEA.

Many Thousands at Asbury Park—Preaching by Mr. Frank De Witt Talmage in the New Auditorium.

OVER 5,000 persons crowded the new Auditorium at Asbury Park on Sunday, Aug. 23, to listen to a sermon by Mr. Frank DeWitt Talmage, son of the famous preacher, from John 21:3: "I go a-fishing." The audience was a representative and sympathetic one. After the Rev. Edward S. Young had offered prayer, the preacher was introduced, and delivered a powerful discourse. Among other things Mr. Talmage said: "In the Delaware Valley where slumbering beauties lie smiling as does a babe asleep, where silent mountains shoot forth waters into brooks, which go murmuring on until they join themselves into a creek and then sing the rest of the way, and within sight of Bushkill Falls where trout drop o'er their noisy waters ninety-six feet into the pool below and then start down the clean brook, and where the river struck by some fever simply crawls to the sea slowly winding as though it would aboard for heaven! A church may cost a million dollars, may have the most fashionable congregation in the city, have a prima donna in the choir loft and a preacher to whom they pay thousands, but if that church don't save some souls—it's a dead failure. Why? It doesn't catch fish! But if, on some hot August day, you go out into the woods with an old Christian woman and she commences to tell you about your sins and the power of the Holy Ghost descends and you kneel by some log and pray 'Oh, God save me! Oh, God help me!' that sermon is a gem for it saved your soul."

Continuing, he said: "Now my friends what are you going to do with Jesus? You cannot serve two masters but you must serve one. Some people think it is so hard to be a Christian. Why, do you know the hardest taskmaster is the devil? He demands surrender of body of mind and of soul. When going down the street some night and listening to the glad laughter of revellers coming from the places of sin and hear the clash of music, you think: My, what great carnival is this? But stop—is that all? Ten years from now that youth will be worn out, you will see him coming home after midnight, bloated by debauch to some tenement house where sits those to whom he is father and husband. Is that the being she so proudly stepped to the fain go back—how often have I heard this summer the words of my text—"I go a-fishing." And the same characteristics that made Peter a fisherman, made him the chief apostle and spokesman of the twelve, entered into his preaching when the spirit descended and three thousand souls found Christ. Peter's business was to fish, but after his conversion it was to save souls: this is what the pulpit is for. The pulpit is not the place for ecclesiastical scrimmage, but for Christian truths pure and simple. The average man cares nothing for transgression, progression or election, but he does want repentance for his sins: when he stands at the open grave he wants Jesus, and when he comes to die he wants to hear 'I will be with thee and the river shall not overflow thee.'

"Let us throw overboard some of our surplus theology—let us anchor the boat and throw out the gang-plank for Christ—All altar to greet? Is that the man friends congratulated her upon marrying? Is that the man who used to go and call with love and lofty ideas? Through this sea of anguish I hear the echo of the revel of ten years back. The devil always pays your wages, and those are the wages of sin of misery and of woe.

"We call that fun. Fun to be turned out of your store, fun to have the sheriff sell the home above your head, fun for your family to be put out in the street, fun to be swindled out of earth and of heaven. Sin is death. In the school of sin, there are many different classes: once you enter the rum shop, once you do that which you are ashamed to tell your mother, wife or child, once you commence to let your breath smell of whiskey—there is a rapid promotion and soon you will be graduated from the senior class. Too late you see the error, to try to feel the right path. Look out, you will tumble from the rock."

THE MASTER'S QUESTIONS.

HAVE ye looked for sheep in the desert,
For those who have lost their way?
Have ye been in the wild waste places
Where the lost and wandering stray?
Have you trodden the lonely highway,
The foul and darksome street?
It may be ye'd see in the gloaming
The prints of wounded feet.

Have ye folded home to your bosom
The trembling, neglected lamb,
And taught to the little lost one
The sound of the shepherd's name?
Have ye searched for the poor and needy
With no clothing, no home, no bread?
The Son of Man was among them,
He had nowhere to lay his head.

Have ye carried the living water
To the parched and thirsty soul?
Have ye said to the sick and wounded,
"Christ Jesus makes thee whole?"
Have ye told my fainting children
Of the strength of the Father's hand?
Have you guided the tottering footsteps
To the shore of the "Golden Land?"

Have ye stood by the sad and weary
To smooth the pillow of death,
To comfort the sorrow-stricken

And strengthen the feeble faith?
And have ye felt, when the glory
Has streamed through the open door
And flitted across the shadows,
That I had been there before?

AT Urugala, in the Central Province of Ceylon, a woman who is now named Ruth had lost her child and was attracted by the assurance that, if she would trust in the Saviour, she would see her child again. Mr. Garrett, the church missionary in the Island, says: "The mother listened, gradually yielded, and has become a follower of Jesus. Presently her husband came to ask, 'What medicine have you given my wife?' 'No medicine; we give none.' 'Oh, yes, you have given her good medicine. She used to be cross, and now is so kind. She used to be lazy, and now is so willing. She used to speak such bad words, and now is so gentle.' Ruth was baptized in August last.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

THE SCEPTIC REFUTED.

How a Christian Nobleman Convinced a Visitor Out of His Own Mouth.

IN that beautiful part of Germany which is on the Rhine, there is a noble castle, which as you travel on the western banks of the river, you may see lifting its ancient towers on the opposite side, above the grove of trees about as old as itself. About forty years ago, there lived at that castle a noble gentleman whom we shall call Baron. The Baron had only one son, who was not only a comfort to his father, but a blessing to all who lived on his father's farm.

It happened on a certain occasion that this young man being from home, there came a French gentleman to see the Baron. As soon as this gentleman came into the castle he began to talk of his heavenly Father, in terms that chilled the old man's blood; on which the old man reproved him saying, "Are you not afraid of offending God who reigns above, by speaking in such a manner?" The gentleman said he knew nothing about God, for he never saw him. The Baron did not notice at this time what the gentleman said, but the next morning took him about the castle and grounds, and took occasion first to show him a very beautiful picture that hung on the wall. The gentleman admired the picture very much, and said, "whoever drew this picture, knows how to use his pencil."

"My son drew this picture," said the Baron. "Then your son is a very clever man," he replied.

The Baron then went with visitor into the garden, and showed him many beautiful flowers and trees.

"Who has the ordering of this garden?" asked the gentleman.

"My son," replied the Baron; "he knows every plant, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall."

"Indeed," said the gentleman, "I shall think very highly of him soon."

The Baron then took him into the village and showed him a small neat cottage, where his son had established a school, and where he caused all young children who had lost their parents to be received and nourished at his own expense. The children in the house looked so innocent and happy that the gentlemen was very much pleased, and when he returned to the castle, he said to the Baron, "what a happy man you are to have so good a son."

"How do you know I have so good a son?" "Because I have seen his works; he must be good and clever if he has done all you have shown me."

"But you have never seen him."

"No, but I know him very well, because I judge him by his works."

"True," replied the Baron, "and in this way I judge of the character of our heavenly Father. I know from his work that he is a being of infinite wisdom, and power and goodness."

The man felt the force of the reproof, and was careful not to offend the good Baron further by his sceptical remarks.

AN UNEXPECTED WELCOME.

ONE of the most successful agencies in Missionary work in India is that of a band of young native converts, who are known as the Tinnevely itinerants. Their labors recently have been rewarded by several converts. One of them was a young man of high caste, whose friends endeavored with various pretexts to entice him away, but were instead induced by him to attend church, with the result that one of them confessed a desire to be a Christian too. This young man joined the itinerating band for instruction, and his father showed no resentment at his joining the Christians. The Rev. E. S. Carr says:—"The young man himself has stood firm, and in October we came to his village in the course of our tour. We were rather afraid of a disturbance, as he was with us; but after we had preached there on two occasions, his father sent a message asking me to go to the house and bring his son to see him. I wondered whether this was some trick to get hold of the son, but took it as an opportunity from the Lord, and went with our band of catechists. We found a number of his relations, who all live in one street, standing about waiting for us. We were shown into the courtyard of the father's house, and were received with all native respect. They gave me a chair put a garland of flowers round my neck, and presented me with fruit, sugar, etc. They then asked us to conduct a meeting as we liked. We had prayer, read the story of Zaccheus ('This day is salvation come to this house'), and then I tried, as far as my small knowledge of the language would allow me, to improve the opportunity by pointing out that it was the work of the Spirit of God alone which had drawn the young man to Christ. They listened well, and begged that their son might be allowed to come and see them sometimes. I said the lad was quite free to come whenever he liked. He has since been to see them, and was well received. It is an almost unheard of thing for the relations of those who have become Christians to receive us in that way. They are, as a rule, very bitter."

GOD IN THE HEART.

The fool hath said in his heart there is no God.

PSALMS 53.

THERE is no God! it cannot be,
No Father to remember me?
No shepherd for the wandering sheep
In pastures green their steps to keep?
His hand holds up the weary head
And giveth us our daily bread.

There is a God! we yearning cry.
His Spirit in us cannot die.
For Him our hearts we open wide,
That he may enter and abide.
Abide with us till time is o'er,
Abide with us for evermore.

MRS. J. ELDER.

A Christian 110 Years Old.

BAINBRIDGE, GA., Aug. 14, 1891.

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:—

Sister Millie Brinton of my church, was born in North Carolina, in 1781. She is one hundred and ten years old. She has been a Christian forty years, and up to about three months ago, she attended church, but she is now confined to her bed, quietly, she says, waiting the Master's call. She is a consistent Christian; and, oh, how it would do you good to hear her talk of heaven!

Very truly,

W. A. PIERCE, Pastor M. E. Church

A Memory of Five Points.

GEORGETOWN, D. C., Aug. 20, 1891.

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:—

DEAR SIR:—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the 10th, fifty describes the Five Points. As to the date of establishing the Sabbath and Mission School, prior to 1840, the Misses Wilbur, 39 Pearl Street, where I was a boarder, (they being members of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, Rev. Joel Parloes, pastor), invited me to aid them in the work which they had been long engaged in. In 1840 and 1841, I had been a member of the Scotch church, (Rev. Dr. McElroy, Pastor, Robert Castor, Sunday School Superintendent), Mr. Castor placed me on the Visiting Committee, mornings. During two of the three years I was a member of the Scotch church, (1839, '40 and '41), I was engaged in the same work on the afternoons of the Sabbath. There was not a house or room at Five Points, within a mile radius, that I did not visit, being kindly received. I was glad when I heard of the fire destroying most of the houses as it was a blessing to the inmates.

I am now in my seventy-seventh year. Memory, I have thought, never dies.

Respectfully,
A. Z. MUNCASTER.

The annoyance of breaking lamp-chimneys need not be borne.

Get tough glass chimneys. Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass" are tough against heat; they do not break, except from accident.

They are also clear, transparent, not misty or milky; they fit and stand upright; shape and proportions are right to direct the draft upon the flame.

They cost a little more than rough and wrong chimneys of common glass that break continually.

BEAUTIFUL THINGS.

BEAUTIFUL faces are those that wear—
It matters little if dark or fair—
Whole-souled honesty printed there.

Beautiful eyes are those that show,
Like crystal panes where hearth-fires glow,
Beautiful thoughts that burn below.

Beautiful lips are those whose words
Leap from the heart like songs of birds,
Yet whose utterance prudence girds.

Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest, brave, and true,
Moment by moment the long day through,

Beautiful feet are those that go
On kindly ministries to and fro—
Down lowliest ways, if God wills it so.

Beautiful shoulders are those that bear
Ceaseless burdens of homely care,
With patient grace and daily prayer.

Beautiful lives are those that bless—Silent rivers of happiness,
Whose hidden fountains but few may guess. Selected.

Old-fashioned ways in washing need strength in the washer and strength in what is washed. The modern way is to use Pearline. It saves labor for weak backs; it saves wear to delicate fabrics. It cleans houses as well as it washes clothes, and what it does, it does safely. Millions use it. Pearline is soap's successor; where soap fails, Pearline succeeds.

THE HEAVENLY FOOT SOCIETY.

THIS quaint title has been taken by the Society recently formed in China to abolish the cruel practice of binding the feet of girls in their infancy. It has long been the custom in China, where small feet are even more highly esteemed than with us, to begin early in life to secure that object, not as in America by the wearing of tight shoes but with bandages which effect the purpose much more surely. The bandages are tightened every morning and evening till in the course of time a full grown woman's foot can be got into a shoe of three inches in length. The operation is most painful, and the cries of pain from the poor girls are terribly painful to Europeans who may be in the neighborhood. Wherever the missionaries have established themselves they have endeavored to put an end to this practice among their converts. During a meeting of the Anti-Foot-binding Society, which is now called the Heavenly Foot Society, an old lady, nearly seventy years old, with wrinkled and withered face, but eyes still bright and clear, got up to speak. Her feet were so small that she had to lean upon a long staff which she had in her hand. Whether with excitement or with old age, I know not, but she seemed deeply moved, and her hand trembled as she firmly grasped her staff. "I am very sorry," she said, "that we did not have this meeting twenty years ago. Alas! why did we not have it? We might then have begun our war against this cruel custom long before to-day. I quite believe in all that has been said to-day against foot-binding. It is a terrible evil, as only we women knew, and something should have been done to put an end to it ere this, but I am thankful for this meeting. The only thing I am grieved about is that I am an old woman, and I have no little ones that I can see shall never have their feet bound. But," she continued, as her eye brightened, and she took a steadier grasp of her staff, "I am going to use all my influence to put a stop to this evil. I have grandchildren, and they shall not have their feet bound if I can help it."

A REBUKE TO A PRIEST.

A CHINAMAN who was converted from the worship of Joss to Christianity, joined the congregation at Woug-pwang in North China. After remaining there some time he left the city to live at Lo-ngwong. The missionaries were greatly concerned about him, for his new home was in a district where the Roman Catholics have many converts. His neighbors were puzzled about him for he would not visit the gambling-houses and yet he would not go to the Catholic church. At last his reputation reached the ears of the priest, a Spaniard, who sent for him and talked with him for two hours, questioning him on both the Old and New Testament history. Astonished at the answers of so rough a man, he asked him how many years he had read in school. "I never was at school," said the man. "Where, then, did you learn all this?" "From reading my Bible," was the answer, and the priest was silent. Then he showed him the crucifix in the chapel. It impressed the man, but in an unexpected direction. To some minds his answer would be shocking, but to him, himself recently an idolater, it came quite naturally. "What a pity," he said, "to make an idol of the Lord Jesus for the heathen to laugh at!"

THE FELLAHS OF EGYPT.

A Quiet, Contented, Submissive Race, who Till the Soil and Love Their Country—Patriotic but Poor—Egyptian Homes.

SINCE Herodotus' time, many books have been written by travellers and others concerning Egypt, affording a vast quantity of valuable information, yet little is known, outside the land of the Nile itself, about the people who are Egypt's bone and sinew—the Fellahen. Fellah is an Arabic word, meaning peasant or agriculturist, and has been specially applied to the farming and laboring population of Egypt by their Turkish masters, in a contemptuous sense; for the Turk himself distains labor and regards all workers as slaves. The Fellahen form the great bulk of the population of Egypt and are the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, intermingled with Syrians, Arabs and other races, who have been converted to Islam. They are a peaceful and contented race, and despite the exactions of a sordid and unjust government which keeps them forever poor, they are comparatively happy.

To-day we give an illustration of a Fellah family group, taken from a photograph procured by Rev. Dr. Talmage, editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, during his recent tour in the East. This photograph, taken near Cairo, represents an industrious toiler surrounded by his household, resting in the grateful shade of the cool palms of an oriental garden after the cares and labors of the day. The simple wants of such a family are easily supplied; the husband cultivates the patch of ground, raising corn which he makes into a kind of coarse flour or millet that is eaten with the fingers, although spoons are occasionally used. If the season be a prosperous one, the family can occasionally eat wheat bread or seed cakes, the latter being a special viand used on festive days at the tables of the poor. The usual food, however, consists almost entirely of vegetables, dhourra bread and beans. Rice is somewhat of a luxury, and meat is simply unattainable. This modest repast is washed down with a draught of water from the Nile, or with coffee; yet on this diet, the Fellahs are healthy and robust, and capable of severe labor.

The dress of the Fellahen, who form the fourth or lowest class of the population, is very simple, consisting for the men of a shirt and linen drawers, over which is worn a large garment called the herie, which is girdled by a belt of leather or cloth. On the head is worn the tarboush or turban, which may be of almost any color. The women tattoo themselves and marry early, being wives at eleven, mothers at twelve, and grandmothers at twenty-four. It is not unusual for them to intermarry with the Bedouins, whose peculiarities have already been described in recent issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Nile-worship and love of country are characteristic of the Fellah. He cannot live away from his native village; he must follow the plough where his father followed it before him, and by their graves he must be laid. Revolutions he holds in abhorrence, and he will submit to any tyranny rather than be driven from his home. He bows his head submissively to affliction and exclaims "Allah, Kerim!" He is wholly unambitious and it is seldom, indeed, that one of his race rises to great deeds or fame.

The women, like all Moslems, are slaves in their obedience to the law of their lord and master. Instead of the yashmack, they wear a head-dress of dark stuff, covering the entire face and shoulders, and leaving only the eyes and forehead visible. This head-dress is frequently trimmed with strings of coins of sufficient value to buy a handsome outfit for the wearer, but these are held sacred, and would not be touched by the husband, being the design to speak. It is probably a modification of the ancient Egyptian head-dress, which sometimes took the form of serpents and other animals, lying prone on the forehead, or curving, with head erect, as if about to strike. For the rest, the women's garments consist of a single wrap enveloping the entire form, and distorting rather than concealing its outlines. Graceful attire is something unknown to them.

their labor, the bulk of it being greedily absorbed by their social and official superiors. They doubtless represent more of the peculiarities of the ancient Egyptians than any other Orientals. In seasons of prosperity, as well as in the days of adversity, they exhibit a philosophical content and indifference to fate that would be remarkable in a more cultivated people. Christianity has made considerable marriage dowry of the woman, who loves to display them in this open fashion. Down the centre of the forehead is a light metal tube, formed of rings jointed together, and this is worn by all married women of their race. Through this tube, tradition says, Allah may

The Fellahs live in villages, each governed by a sheik who is little else than a tax collector. They occupy a pitiful position, socially, and are the victims of oppression and extortion almost beyond belief. It is estimated that they scarcely retain one-twentieth of the fruit of progress among these descendants of the pyramid-builders. In Cairo and several other cities, Christian schools are in operation, the pioneer in this Gospel work being Miss M. L. Whately, whose efforts in behalf of the children of Egypt are known all over the Christian world.

THE DROVES AT THE WELL.

Dr. Talmage's sermon preached last Sunday, Sept. 6, at Elmira, N. Y., to an enormous audience gathered at the New York and Pennsylvania Exposition, at that place. His text was: "And they said, we cannot; until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep." Gen. 29: 8.

THERE are some reasons why it is appropriate that I should accept the invitation to preach at this great Inter-state Fair, and to these throngs of countrymen and citizens, horsemen just come from their fine chargers, the king of beasts for I take the crown from the lion, and put it on the brow of the horse which is in every way nobler, and speak to these shepherds just come from their flocks, the Lord himself in one place called a Shepherd, and in another place called a Lamb, and all the good are sheep, and preach to you cattle-men come up from the herds, your occupation honored by the fact that God himself thinks it worthy of immortal record that he owns "the cattle on a thousand hills." It is appropriate that I come because I was a farmer's boy, and never saw a city until I was nearly grown, and having been born in the country I never got over it, and would not dwell in cities a day if my work was not appointed there. My love to you now, and when I get through I will give you my hand, for though I have this summer shaken hands with perhaps forty thousand people in twenty-one states of the Union all the way through to Colorado and North and South I will not conclude my summer vacation till I have shaken hands with you. You old farmer out there! How you make me think of my father! You elderly woman out there with cap and spectacles! How you make me think of my mother! And now while the air of these Fair Grounds is filled with the bleating of sheep, and the neighing of horses, and the lowing of cattle, I cannot find a more appropriate text than the one I read.

It is a scene in Mesopotamia. A well of water of great value in that region. The fields around about it white with three flocks of sheep lying down waiting for the watering. I hear their bleating coming on the bright air, and the laughter of young men and maidens indulging in rustic repartee. I look off, and I see other flocks of sheep coming. Meanwhile, Jacob, a stranger, on the interesting errand of looking for a wife, comes to the well. A beautiful shepherdess comes to the same well. I see her approaching, followed by her father's flock of sheep. It was a memorable meeting. Jacob married that shepherdess. The Bible account of it is: "Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept." It has always been a mystery to me what he found to cry about! But before that scene occurred, Jacob accosts the shepherds and asks them why they postpone the slaking of the thirst of these sheep, and why they did not immediately proceed to water them. The shepherds reply to the effect: "We are all good neighbors, and as a matter of courtesy we wait until all the sheep of the neighborhood come up. Besides that, this stone on the well's mouth is somewhat heavy, and several of us take hold of it and push it aside, and then the buckets and the troughs are filled, and the sheep are satisfied. We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep."

Oh, this is a thirsty world! Hot for the head, and blistering for the feet, and parching for the tongue. The world's great want is a cool, refreshing, satisfying draught. We wander around and find the cistern empty. Long and tedious drought has dried up the world's fountains, but nearly nineteen centuries ago, a Shepherd, with crook in the shape of a cross, and feet cut to the bleeding, explored the desert passages of this world, and one day came across a well a thousand feet deep, bubbling and bright, and opalescent, and looked to the north, and the south, and the east, and the west, and cried out with a voice strong and musical that rang through the ages: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!"

If a herd of swine come to a well they angrily jostle each other for the precedence; if a drove of cattle come to a well, they hook each other back from the water, but when the flock of sheep come, though a hundred of them shall be disappointed, they only express it by sad bleating, they come together peacefully. We want a great multitude to come around the Gospel well. I know there are those who do not like a crowd—they think a crowd is vulgar. If they are oppressed for room in church it makes them positively impatient and belligerent. Not so did these Oriental shepherds. They waited until all the flocks were gathered, and the more flocks that came, the better they liked it. And so we ought to be anxious that all the people should come. Go out into the highways and the hedges and compel them to come in. Go to the rich and tell them they are indigent without the Gospel of Jesus. Go to the poor and tell them the affluence there is in Christ. Go to the blind and tell them of the touch that gives eternal illumination. Go to the lame and tell them of the joy that will make the lame man leap like a hart. Gather all the sheep off of all the mountains. None so torn of the dogs, none so sick, none so worried, none so dying, as to be omitted. Let down all the bars, swing open all the gates, scatter all the invitations: "Whosoever will let him come." Come, white and black. Come, red men of the forest. Come, Laplander, out of the snow. Come, Patagonian, out of the heat. Come in furs. Come panting under palm leaves. Come one. Come all. Come now.

You notice that this well of Mesopotamia had a stone on it, which must be removed before the sheep could be watered; and I find on the well of salvation to-day impediments and obstacles, which must be removed in order that you may obtain the refreshment and life of this Gospel. In your case the impediment is pride of heart. You cannot bear to come to so democratic a fountain; you do not want to come with so many others. It is to you like when you are dry, coming to a town pump, as compared to sitting in a parlor sipping out of a chased chalice which has just been lifted from a silver salver. Not so many publicans and sinners. You want to get to heaven, but it must be in a special car, with your feet on a Turkish ottoman and a band of music on board the train. You will have to remove the obstacle of pride, or never find your way to the well. You will have to come as we came, willing to take the water of eternal life in any way, and at any hand, and in any kind of pitcher, crying out: "O Lord Jesus, I am dying of thirst. Give me the water of eternal life, whether in trough or goblet; give me the water of life; I care not in what it comes to me." Away with all your hindrances of pride from the well's mouth.

Here is another man who is kept back from this water of life by the stone of an obdurate heart, which lies over the mouth of the well. You have no more feeling upon this subject than if God had yet to do you the first kindness, or you had to do God the first wrong. Seated on his lap all these years, his everlasting arms sheltering you, where is your gratitude? Where is your morning and evening prayer? Where are your consecrated lives? All the bright surroundings of your life from him. O man, what dost thou with that hard heart? Canst thou not feel one throb of gratitude toward the God who made you, and the Christ who came to redeem you, and the Holy Ghost who has all these years been importuning you? If you could sit down five minutes under the tree of a Saviour's martyrdom, and feel his warm life trickling on your forehead and cheek and hands, methinks you would get some appreciation of what you owe to a crucified Jesus.

Heart of stone, relent, relent,
Touched by Jesus' cross subdued;
See his body, mangled, rent,
Covered with a gore of blood.
Sinful soul, what hast thou done?
Crucified the eternal Son.

Come, all ye thirsty! You have an undefined longing in your soul. You tried money-making; that did not satisfy you. You tried office under government; that did not satisfy you. There are men here who are perfectly discontented. Unhappy in the past, unhappy to-day, to be unhappy forever, unless you come to this Gospel-well. This satisfies the soul with a high, deep, all-absorbing and eternal satisfaction. It comes and it offers the most unfortunate man so much of this world as is best for him, and throws all heaven into the bargain. The wealth of Croesus, and of all the Rothschilds is only a poor, miserable shilling compared with the eternal fortunes that Christ offers you to-day. In the far East, there was a king who used once a year to get on a scales, while on the other side the scales were placed gold and silver and gems; indeed, enough were placed there to balance the king; then, at the close of the weighing, all those treasures were thrown among the populace. But Christ to-day steps on one side the scales, and on the other side are all the treasures of the universe, and he says: "All are yours—all height, all depth, all length, all breadth, all eternity; all are yours." We don't appreciate the promises of the Gospel. When an aged clergyman was dying—a man very eminent in the church—a young theological student stood by his side, and the aged man looked up and said to him: "Can't you give me some comfort in my dying hour?" "No," said the young man; "I can't talk to you on this subject; you know all about it, and have known it so long." "Well," said the dying man, "just recite to me some promises." The young man thought a moment, and he came to this promise: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin;" and the old man clapped his hands, and in his dying moment said: "That's just the promise I have been waiting for. 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.' Oh, the warmth, the grandeur, the magnificence of the promises!

Come, also, to this Gospel-well, all ye troubled. I do not suppose you have escaped. Compare your view of this life at fifteen years of age with what your view of it is at forty, or sixty, or seventy. What a great contrast of opinion! Were you right then, or are you right now? Two cups placed in your hands, the one a sweet cup, the other a sour cup. A cup of joy and a cup of grief. Which has been the nearest to being full, and out of which have you the more frequently partaken? What a different place the cemetery is from what it used to be. Once it was to you a grand city improvement, and you went out on the pleasure excursion, and you ran laughingly up the mound, and you criticised in a light way the epitaph. But since the day when you heard the bell toll at the gate as you went in with the procession, it is a sad place, and there is a flood of rushing memories that suffuse the eye and over-master the heart. Oh, you have had trouble, trouble, trouble. God only knows how much you have had. If I could gather all the griefs, of all sorts, from this great audience, and could put them in one scroll, neither man nor angel could endure the recitation. Well, what do you want? Would you like to have your property back again? "No," you say, as a Christian man: "I was becoming arrogant, and I think that is why the Lord took it away. I don't want to have my property back." Well, would you have your departed friends back again? "No," you say: "I couldn't take the responsibility of bringing them from a tearless realm to a realm of tears. I couldn't do it." Well, then, what do you want? A thousand voices in the audience cry out: "Comfort, give us comfort." For that reason I have rolled away the stone from the well's mouth. Come, all ye wounded of the flock, pursued of the Lord's sick and bereft ones have come.

"Ah," says some one, "you are not old enough to understand my sorrows."

You have not been in the world as long as I have, and you can't talk to me about my misfortunes in the time of old age." Well, I have been a great deal among old people, and I know how they feel about their failing health, and about their departed friends, and about the loneliness that sometimes strikes through their soul. After two persons have lived together for forty or fifty years, and one of them is taken away, what desolation! I shall not forget the cry of the late Rev. Dr. De Witt, of New York, when he stood by the open grave of his beloved wife, and, after the obsequies had ended, he looked down into the open place and said: "Farewell, my honored, faithful, and beloved wife. The bond that bound us is severed. Thou art in glory, and I am here on earth. We shall meet again, Farewell! Farewell!" To lean on a prop for fifty years, and then have it break under you! There were only two years' difference between the deaths of my father and mother. After my mother's decease, my father used to go around as though looking for something; and he would often get up from one room, without any seeming reason, and go to another room; and then he would take his cane and start out and some one would say: "Father, where are you going?" and he would answer: "I don't know exactly where I am going." Always looking for something. Though he was a tender-hearted man, I never saw him cry but once, and that was at the burial of my mother. After sixty years' living together, it was hard to part. And there are aged people to-day who are feeling just such a pang as that. I want to tell them there is perfect enchantment in the promises of this Gospel; and I come to them and I offer them my arm, or I take their arm and I bring them to this Gospel-well.

Sit down, father, or mother, sit down. See if there is anything at the well well for you. Come, David, the Psalmist, have you anything encouraging to offer them? "Yes," says the Psalmist; "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age, they shall be fat and flourishing, to show that the Lord is upright, he is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in me." Come, Isaiah, have you anything to say out of your prophecies for these aged people? "Yes," says Isaiah; "Down to old age I am with thee, and to hoary hairs will I carry thee." Well, if the Lord is going to carry you, you ought not to worry much about your failing eyesight and failing limbs. Do you think you will come to want? Who do you think the Lord is? Are his granaries empty? Will he feed the raven and the rabbit, and forget you? But you say: "I am so near worn out, and I am of no use to God any more." I think the Lord knows whether you are of any more use or not; if you were of no more use he would have taken you before this. Do you think God has forgotten you because he has taken care of you seventy or eighty years? He thinks more of you today than he ever did, because you think more of him. May the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and Paul the aged be your God for ever!

But I gather all the promises to-day in a group, and I ask the shepherds to drive their flocks of lambs and sheep up to the sparkling supply. "Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth." "Though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion." "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." I am determined to-day that no one shall go away un comforted. Yonder is a timid and shrinking soul who seems to hide away from the consolations I am uttering, as a child with a sore hand hides away from the physician lest he touch the wound too roughly, and the mother has to go and compel the little patient to come out and see the physician. So I come to your timid and shrinking soul to-day, and compel you to come out in the presence of the Divine Physician. He will not hurt you. He has been healing wounds for many years, and he will give you gentle and omnipotent medication. But people, when they have trouble, go anywhere rather than to God. De Quincy took opium to get rid of his troubles. Charles Lamb took to punch. Theodore Hook took to something stronger. Edwin Forrest took to theatrical dissipation. And men have run all around the earth, hoping in the quick transit to get away from their misfortunes. It has been a dead failure. There is only one well that can slake the thirst of an afflicted spirit, and that is the deep and inexhaustible well of the Gospel.

But some one says, in the audience: "Notwithstanding all you have said this morning, I find no alleviation for my troubles." Well, I am not through yet. I have left the most potent consideration for the last. I am going to soothe you with the thought of heaven. However talkative we may be, there will come a time when the stoutest and most emphatic interrogation will evoke from us no answer. As soon as we have closed our lips for the final silence, no power on earth can break that taciturnity. But where, O Christian, will be your spirit? In a scene of infinite gladness. The spring-morning of heaven waving its blossoms in the bright air. Victors fresh from battle showing their scars. The rain of earthly sorrow struck through with the rainbow of eternal joy. In one group, God and angels and the redeemed—Paul and Silas, Latimer and Ridley, Isaiah and Jeremiah, Payson and John Milton, Gabriel and Michael the archangel. Long line of choristers reaching across the hills. Seas of joy dashing to the white beach. Conquerors marching from gate to gate. You among them.

Oh, what a great flock of sheep God will gather around the celestial well. No stone on the well's mouth, while the Shepherd waters the sheep. There Jacob will recognize Rachel the shepherdess. And standing on one side of the well of eternal rapture, your children; and standing on the other side of the well of eternal rapture, your Christian ancestry, you will be bounded on all sides by a joy so keen and grand that no other world has ever been permitted to experience it. Out of that one deep well of heaven, the Shepherd will dip reunion for the bereaved, wealth for the poor, health for the sick, rest for the weary. And then all the flock of the Lord's sheep will lie down in the green pastures, and world without end we will praise the Lord that on this first autumnal Sabbath of 1891 we were permitted to study among the bleating flocks and lowing herds of this Fair Ground the story of Jacob and Rachel the shepherdess at the well in Mesopotamia. Oh plunge your buckets into this great Gospel well and let them come up dripping with that water of which if a man drink he never again shall thirst.

A TITLE DEED AMONG RUBBISH.

NEW ORLEANS newspapers announce the discovery by a young lawyer of that city of a title deed to land in New York worth several millions. It is an old grant dated before the Revolution. It was given to two brothers one of whom was the great-grandfather of the lawyer. In 1776 the two brothers were living in Virginia and in 1786 they removed to a farm in Kentucky. Recently the young lawyer visited the old farm house, which is still standing, and while exploring the garret for relics of his ancestors he found among a quantity of papers, thrown there as rubbish, the old deed which he believes gives him the title to this magnificent inheritance. He has taken it to England to establish its validity. If it proves to be genuine he will return and prosecute his claim in the courts. He acted very promptly on the discovery of the deed, though he found it unexpectedly and in so strange a place. In this he showed none of the indifference which men display when they read in the old Book of the heavenly inheritance given to them and to their fathers by the King of kings. (1. Peter 1: 4.)

A VICTIM'S MOTIVE.

ONE of the witnesses at the Coroner's Inquest, which sat last week to investigate the disaster of August 22, in Park Place, New York, was in the building a few days before it fell. He went to see a friend named Hemmerich who worked there as a pressman. He noticed the vibration of the building and especially the sharp shake given to it when Hemmerich, seeing him enter, jumped off his press to greet him. The witness asked Hemmerich if he was not afraid to work in a building that jarred so easily. He replied that he would not work another day there if it were not for his wife and child. He must consider them, for it was difficult to get another job in the summer. A few days afterward the building fell and Hemmerich was one of the men crushed under the ruins. A man so concerned about the welfare of his wife and child would probably have been much distressed on their account if he had lost his job; yet it would have been a good thing for them and him if he had been discharged. The time will come when the Christian will see that his "misfortunes," which now seem so mysterious to him, were really blessings sent by his heavenly Father to save him from some calamity temporal or spiritual. (Rom. 8: 28.)

A RACE FROM A BEAR.

A THRILLING adventure, which recently befell a lady in Kentucky, is reported in a dispatch to the New York Times. She has been teaching school in Bear Creek, and on August 8th she set out, accompanied by her niece, a child three years old, to visit her mother, who lives on the other side of the mountains. The road is a lonely one and lies through woods which were formerly infested by bears, though none of them have been seen of late years. As the lady and child leisurely climbed the mountain path, they were startled by the crackling of bushes behind them. Looking back they saw a huge bear emerge and start in pursuit of them. With a cry of terror the lady snatched up the child and ran. If she could have gone down the mountain she could soon have reached her school-house, which was not far off; but the bear was between her and it. She must go on climbing, and, weighted with a heavy child, there seemed no hope of outrunning her savage pursuer. Her strength was failing rapidly, and the nearest house was two miles away on the other side of the mountain. Soon the bear was so near to her that she could hear his heavy tread and his panting. But there was a pause in that dreadful sound. Looking back, the lady saw that the bear had stopped to worry the child's hat, which had fallen off in the flight. In a little while he resumed his pursuit, but in the few precious moments thus gained, she had increased the distance between them. She was now almost at the top of the mountain. As the bear came nearer she quickly divested herself of her dress-skirt and left it in the path. Again the bear halted and savagely tore it to shreds. Her hat and sash went next. The garments had cost her much hard-earned money, but she cared not now. They delayed the bear and gave her a chance of escape. She almost flew, for she had passed the top of the mountain, and before her, she could see the house where she would be safe. She pressed on and was soon inside its doors. The men of the house were away at their work, but a Winchester rifle stood in the corner, and the brave girl seized it. Going to the door she faced the savage beast and taking deliberate aim shot him through the heart. She is now the heroine of the township, everyone praising her coolness and courage. She is confident that she owes her life to the sacrifice of her outer garments, for not only did they delay the bear, but relieved her of an incumbrance which impeded her flight. In comparing the Christian's life to a race the Apostle recommends the same tactics. But it is not our garments but our treasures and sins that we are to sacrifice. "Let us," he says, "lay aside every weight and the sin that doth so easily beset us and let us run with patience the race set before us." (Heb. 12: 1.)

HELPLESS AMONG FLAMES.

A REMARKABLE effect of lightning is described in a press dispatch from New Orleans. It states that a few days ago, during a severe thunder-storm, the lightning struck a farm-house in Iberia parish. The bolt passed down the chimney and into the room where the family were sitting, tearing down pictures and doors, and setting the place on fire. Although the lightning darted around the room and struck several inanimate objects, it did not touch nor injure the lady of the house and her three daughters, who were in the centre of the room. It completely paralyzed them, however. They were conscious and saw everything round them, and were perfectly aware of the fact that the house was on fire, but they were unable to move or cry for help. Fortunately, the son of the family who was some distance off, saw flames rising from the house, and hurried to it. He was horrified to see his mother and sisters seated amid the flames, gazing helplessly around them. He rushed to their assistance, and one by one carried them out of the burning building. But for his timely arrival and brave efforts all four would probably have been burned in their chairs. Their situation was typical of that of the whole human race, when, threatened with destruction and powerless to escape, the Son of God came to their relief and gave his life to save them. (Isa. 59: 16.)

A CORPORATION BIBLE.

ON the desk behind which the President of the Village of Sing Sing, N. Y., sits in the Corporation Room where the Board of Trustees meets lies an ordinary-sized black-bound book. This volume is scarcely ever touched, except on rare occasions, usually at the beginning of a President's term of office, and after that it is allowed to lie there and the dust to accumulate upon it. What is more remarkable about it is the fact that neither the President nor any of the Trustees, nor the officers can read a word in it, as none of them are acquainted with the language of the book. This plain, black-bound book is a Dutch Bible. Once, many years ago, some village officers had to be sworn into office and the President declared that nothing but a Bible would suffice. There was none among the books and archives of the corporation, and the Clerk was sent out to find one somewhere in town. He returned with a Dutch Bible which has ever since been the property of the President and Board of Trustees, and on this Dutch Bible all the village officers have since been sworn. This is making a fetish of the Bible, a practice which, unhappily, is not confined to corporations. In many families who would be ashamed to have no Bible in the house it is merely an ornament, as little used as if it were written in an unknown tongue, instead of being studied as the guide of daily life. (Joshua 1: 8.)

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 20, by Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 10: 1-16. Golden Text Ps. 23: 1.

WE can never know our God theoretically. We only understand the relations which he sustains to us by entering into them. Who has ever known Jesus as a Saviour, until he has, by the Holy Ghost, seen his own utter ruin, and leant the whole weight of his soul's eternal destiny on the faithfulness of him, whose blood cleanseth from all sin? We must know the Saviour to know salvation, and we only know the depths of salvation, "the wells of salvation" (Isa. 12: 3), as we become better acquainted with our Saviour. We can only know our Shepherd as we prove his care, and then the assertion is no rash boast: "The Lord is my Shepherd;

I Shall not Want."

"Whosoever shall drink of this water shall thirst again," said Jesus to the Samaritan woman, "but whosoever shall drink of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst;" he has found his Shepherd; he shall not want. There was a time when Jesus was in Galilee that the people out of many cities followed him, they were dissatisfied, they wanted something. "And Jesus, when he came out, saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd," they did want. Paul could look forward and say: "Behold I go bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there, save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." (Acts 20: 22-24.) Another was in charge of Paul's life, and he could say in his heart, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." He knew his Shepherd, he did not want.

Jesus, the great teacher, "the Light of the world," must teach and shine, whether men stopped their ears, and barred out the light, or whether they received him. To the needy ones, the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, the poor woman taken in adultery, the man born blind, he was indeed a Shepherd, and each of them, after being made an object of his healing and pardoning grace, could say: "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want." But the time of Jesus on earth was getting short, he must speak not only for at the time, but for those who should afterwards hear and read his words in the light of the Holy Ghost. The Pharisees and scribes, galled with the felt superiority of Jesus to themselves, and finding that in every encounter with him they lost more and more ground, while his works spoke with irresistible power to the unprejudiced among the people, continually laid plots for his life. But his hour was not yet come, more home truths must yet be spoken which should be a mine of life and truth to future generations.

The Pharisees had just excommunicated the man born blind whose sight had been restored. These were the recognized shepherds of the people. Jesus said to them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you," you teachers, "he that entereth not in by the door to the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber; but he that entereth in by the door is the (or 'a,' R.V.) shepherd of the sheep." What then is meant by the door? "I am the door of the sheep: . . . by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture." But how can Jesus be the Shepherd and the Door too? How can he enter in by himself? "By his own blood he entered in once." (Heb. 9: 12.) There was no other way even for Jesus, even for the good Shepherd. These would-be shepherds who knew nothing of the power of the blood of Christ knew no mercy for the blind man. It is only as we know the depth of our indebtedness to the precious blood of Christ that we can have a truly tender heart for others.

Jesus drew a striking contrast between himself, the good Shepherd, and those who had the spirit of a hireling. The Shepherd enters by the door; the sheep hear his voice. There is a perfect understanding between the Shepherd and his true sheep; he calls them by name; he has an individual knowledge of, and interest in, each one. He had his special word for Peter, for Philip, for John, for Thomas, for Mary Magdalene. He

"Leadeth Them Out."

He never sends them anywhere but where he is willing to go himself, and when he putteth them forth "he goeth before them," that they may never have to tread an untrodden step, or meet an unconquered temptation. "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man;" if no other man has known it, Jesus, the Son of man has, for he "was tempted in all points like as we are." Sorrow, shame, pain, death, he has tasted for us; he never calls us to any step in life where his own feet have not previously trodden. The good Shepherd "giveth his life for the sheep;" his is the way of sacrifice all along.

But the stranger, the hireling? "he climbeth up some other way." By education he claims the place of shepherd, or by the ordination of man, or by virtue of his knowledge of doctrine, or by his eloquence. But this is "some other way," he can never shepherd or feed the sheep of Christ's fold, but according as he values the precious blood. Just in so far as he climbs up some other way, he is "a thief and a robber," he robs Christ of his glory, and the sheep of their true pasture; the true sheep flee from him, he is "a stranger," the life-link which binds to Jesus is wanting, and "they know not the voice of strangers." When a testing time comes, and persecution breaks out, the spirit of the good Shepherd is wanting in the hireling; he gave his life for the sheep, but the hireling "seeth the wolf coming, and fleeth." The good Shepherd lays down his life, the hireling seeks by every means, to preserve his life; his very fleeing is evidence that "he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep."

No man can really take the place of the good Shepherd. Paul's charge to the Ephesian elders at Miletus was, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock; over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." (Acts 20: 28.) Peter writes to the elders of the Church, "Feed the flock of God which is among you, not by constraint, but willingly, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock." But, much as we may thank our God for any true and faithful elders which he may give to his Church, he his immediate leading; "he leadeth me;" he never trusts the rod and the staff which comfort his sheep into any other hands. None but he can know when the green pastures, and when the valley of the shadow of death, is appropriate to the condition of his sheep. He never leaves another hand to prepare the table in the wilderness, and he reserves to himself the right to anoint their head with oil, with the unction which abideth, even his Holy Spirit. There never can be an exchange of poured-out life between any other than the Shepherd and his sheep. He "giveth his life for the sheep," and they present their bodies "a living sacrifice to him" (Rom. 12: 1), and are always delivered unto death "for his sake, that the life of Christ might be manifest in their mortal bodies." (II. Cor. 4: 10.) And as there is this exchange of life, he for his sheep, his sheep for him, so there is a wondrous mutual understanding which the world knows nothing of: "I am the good Shepherd, and I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father." (R.V.) It is this mutual acquaintance, being made on earth, to be consummated in heaven, which is the true measuring of the life of those who follow Jesus. What harm is there in dancing, amusements, novels, smoking, etc? does not enter as a question into the intimacy of this acquaintance with our Lord. What is to be gained by giving up the pleasures of the world, its honor and its patronage? Such a question is altogether outside the relation of the good Shepherd, and the sheep who love to follow him.

"And other sheep I have which are not of this fold, them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd." Selfishness is very exclusive; Peter was very exclusive until the Holy Ghost taught him how God had a heart for the Gentiles as well as the Jews. (Acts 10: 9-20.) The Lord's true sheep can always find room for others. Just as many as the Lord can take into his heart they can take into theirs. It is a proof that they are his true sheep. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." It is a false sheep which does not follow. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his" (Rom. 8: 9), and the spirit of Christ is love. It is to such as hear and follow, to such as have his Spirit, that he gives "eternal life, and they shall never perish, and no man shall pluck them out of his hand." How accords anxiety with the possession of such a Shepherd? How accord disobedience and straying from his ways? The Lord teach us to know our Shepherd ever more truly and deeply. Amen.

LESSON POINTS,

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

I AM the door. There is no other medium of communication between God and man or of passage between heaven and earth. Jesus is the only mediator and the only door. If we wish to go to heaven, we can only do so through him. "I am the way, the truth and the life." "No man cometh to the Father but by me." No one can get in by his own goodness. There is none other name given among men by which we can be saved, and if any get to heaven it will be simply and solely through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ.

During the late Civil War, a judge who had shown much interest in the suffering soldiers found his time so greatly taken up with appeals for charity and the like that he could not give attention to important legal matters that demanded consideration. He therefore determined not to entertain any further requests for help until professional duties had been satisfactorily adjusted. One day a soldier, miserably clad, with a thin face marked with deep lines of care, entered his office. The judge gave him no encouragement whatever and actually pretended not to see him. The soldier fumbled in his pockets for some time and then said in a tone of evident disappointment, "I did have a letter for you." The judge continued writing, smothering his sympathies, and made no reply. Presently the soldier's thin, trembling hand pushed a little note along the desk. The judge was about to shake his head negatively as though to intimate that he had no time to spare for such matters, when his eye caught sight of the handwriting, which was that of his own son, a soldier in the army. He took up the note and read as follows: "Dear father: The bearer is a soldier discharged from the hospital. He is going home to die. Assist him in any way you can for the sake of your loving son, Charlie."

All the tender emotions of the judge's soul were aroused in a moment. He embraced the soldier for Charlie's sake. He placed him at the table where Charlie was wont to sit and made him sleep in Charlie's bed. He clothed him and supplied him with every comfort for the sake of his own son.

Thus does our Heavenly Father deal with us. He grants us his best and choicest gifts for Jesus' sake through whom alone we have free access to the throne of grace.

Other sheep have I which are not of this fold. We are prone to suppose that our "Set" is the only one that will make sure of heaven. There are many Baptists and Episcopalians and Methodists and Congregationalists who are so impressed with denominational prejudices that they actually believe that all the best places in heaven will be reserved for members of that particular denomination. So there are many men and women so exclusively aristocratic in their ideas as to believe that only the "toney" and the wealthy and the cultured and the stylish will be admitted at the Great Reception, when Jesus shall receive unto himself his own. But Christ tells us for our encouragement, "Other sheep have I which are not of this fold." External circumstances have no weight with him in determining destiny, for God looketh not upon the outward man but upon the heart. Your clothes may be very poor, and very unfashionable and you may even be woefully deficient in culture and yet you may be one of the King's own. Not what we wear, not what we know, but what we are irrevocably establishes our fate.

A fashionable young man, who found his sister chatting with a plainly attired and altogether unpretentious woman, called her aside and privately rebuked her for keeping such low company. The sister bore the rebuke meekly, to avoid embarrassment, but when the visitor had retired, she turned to her brother and said to him: "You are evidently mistaken about this good woman. It is a privilege to be in her company for she is the daughter of a King. The plain clothes she now wears are the suit in which she is traveling from earth to heaven, where she will wear the pure and radiant robe of Christ's own righteousness. May the good Lord help us to bear in mind, that in a few years we will all be among those who have passed from time to eternity, and that we will stand shoulder to shoulder with those whom we now despise and consider beneath our dignity, because of circumstances too ephemeral to merit serious consideration.

He goeth before them. And where he leads we may safely follow. He has passed through every trial, every temptation, every hardship we may be likely to encounter, and has come out more than conqueror. If we look to man, we look at a very imperfect copy, and the result will be still more imperfect. But if we fix our eyes on Jesus, we may with Paul "boldly press forward to the mark of our high calling which is in Christ Jesus our Lord," and feel quite sure that he will never lead us astray, nor that by following his example, we shall ever come to grief.

Two school boys undertook to cross a snow-covered field with a view to discover which of them could trace the straightest line. One seemed to have wasted no steps at all, so beautifully straight was the line he pursued, while the other seemed to have followed an irregular, zigzag course. On investigation, it appeared that the one boy had fixed his eyes steadfastly on the point he had determined to reach, and had then gone straight ahead, while the other boy had carefully watched his own feet, and had thus frequently found himself going astray, necessitating constant re-tracing and a frequent change of course. The straight and sure path to heaven for every Christian lies in the direction of our Leader, and it is our duty and privilege, fixing our eyes upon him, to go on, step by step, the path which he himself has trod before us.

A TATTERED LEAF.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Sept. 20.
"The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. Ps. 23: 1.

EXAMINING reverently an old family Bible, a boy of some sixteen years came upon a tattered leaf. It was not torn, but worn thin. New strips of paper were pasted on three edges, but he could see the edges of the original paper and perceived that they were worn and frayed. Will was no longer a child or he would not have touched the book. His father came in while he was looking at the Bible and saw how carefully and reverently he was handling it. He went to the table and stood beside his son.

"It is easy to see which were Grandfather's favorite passages," the boy said. "See how some of the leaves are worn. Look here and here. But there is one in the Psalms almost in tatters."

"Ah!" said the father, "I remember how that was worn. I have seen it wet with tears. I have seen a strong man's hand laid upon that page so heavily that it seemed to be literally grasping the words. Your grandfather had it open before him when he died."

"Why was he so fond of this Psalm?"

"It comforted him and it supplied a key to the mystery of his life. When he was in trouble—and trouble seemed to visit him periodically—people would say how strange it was that so good a man should be so unlucky. I have heard my mother say so. She used to think that they would surely die in an almshouse and she suffered torture in dwell-ling on the apprehension. But he was never distressed by it. He felt his losses and his disappointment keenly, but he was troubled by no forebodings. He would have a struggle and then fall back calmly on the assurance, 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want.'

"How did his losses come, father?"

"Oh, in the ordinary ways. There was nothing extraordinary about them except in their number. If any one failed in the town where he was, my father was sure to be a heavy loser. Burglars visited his store repeatedly, and always with profit to themselves and loss to him. Three times he was driven from his location by the competition of rivals with exceptional advantages. Twice he was burned out. There seemed to be a fatality about everything he undertook. I remember his securing a profitable contract. Everyone who had the contract before had made a pile of money out of it, but he lost. The goods he had to supply were imported, and just as he was expecting his first consignment, a war broke out, the foreign ports were blockaded, the goods became scarce, and the price more than doubled. But there was one strange feature about it all, which was very remarkable, and was a great comfort to my father. In each case of a change of residence—and he had that experience four times—there was some special religious work waiting to be done in the new location, which he was specially fitted to do and which would have been undone if he had not arrived at that particular time."

"No, he never preached; he was in business. At his first removal he was connected with a church in which all the members were men of no education. The town had developed suddenly. It was in the days before public schools. The men were good men earning a great deal of money and were giving their children a thorough education but few of them could do more than write their names, and they had not the slightest notion of keeping accounts. They were in a hopeless muddle. My father became secretary and treasurer to the church and carried them through a crisis which threatened to wreck the church. When he left that place and settled in another town he connected with a church which had a trouble of another kind. It was full of jealousy and faction. The members had formed two sides which were perpetually struggling for predominance. My father was a stranger to both, but his worth was soon recognized and he was put in control and in a short time had both factions working harmoniously under his management. So it was elsewhere. In one case he was able to start a mission church in a place where only a stranger of peculiar tact, such as he had, could have done it. But in every instance when his work was done business reverses came and he had to move elsewhere."

"The last catastrophe was the most severe trial of his faith. He was stripped of every cent he had in the world. 'Now,' said my mother, 'we shall surely come to want. You cannot go into business without capital and no one will employ you, for you are too old and feeble.' She seemed to be right, for the work in that town was work that could be done only by young and strong men. My father knew it and he sat down with the old Book before him a broken, depressed man, with no light on his path. When he rose he said with unwavering confidence, 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want.' That very night the chief banker of an adjacent town came to him and said that he was ordered by his doctor to diminish his duties at the bank and he needed some one to take charge of some routine work he had been doing himself, but which now must be placed in the hands of some one whose qualifications must be strict discretion, honesty and intelligence. My father was just the man for the purpose and the place was at his disposal. No such vacancy had ever occurred there before, or was likely to occur again, but just at the time my father needed it."

"Later, when paralysis disqualified him for that duty I was able to offer him a home. The night before he died he was talking with us over his experience, or, as he said, 'the way in which the Lord had led' him, and showing how his confidence had been justified. 'I never worried,' he said, 'in the darkest hour. I knew the Lord was my Shepherd I should not want, and now I can add, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death: I will fear no evil." The Lord has been very good to me.' The next morning when we went to call him, we found him dead. He had died in prayer and as I told you, his head was lying on this Bible, on the very passage which had been his comfort in the days of trial."

RAIN-MAKING MACHINES.

The Recent Experiments in Texas by the Agricultural Department.

HE recent experiments on the dry, parched prairies of Texas, by the expedition under the auspices of the Agricultural Department at Washington, are attracting wide-spread attention throughout the country. Early in August, General Dyhrenfurth began his experiments near Midland, Tex., for the purpose of demonstrating that rain could be drawn from the clouds artificially. It has long been known that heavy cannonading or other conditions tending to cause atmospheric shock, has the effect of precipitating whatever moisture there might be in the atmosphere; but this Texas experiment was undertaken under phenomenal conditions. The sky was cloudless, and no rain had fallen for many weeks. Indeed, in that immediate section, a drought had prevailed for the greater part of three successive years.

Ex-Senator Farwell, of Illinois, may be said to be the projector of the present rain-making experiment. He introduced a bill into the last who had seen no such grateful showers for years.

Within the last two weeks, further successful experiments have been made by Gen. Dyhrenfurth in the same neighborhood, and also at El Paso, Texas, near the Mexican boundary. His method of operations is very simple, involving three lines of attack on the atmosphere. A number of large cloth kites, with heavy charges of dynamite attached to their tails are sent up, the explosives being discharged by an electric current passed through a thin wire; a similar number of balloons, each charged with from five hundred, to five thousand cubic feet of oxy-hydrogen gas, are also sent to a considerable altitude—probably five thousand feet—and exploded in a similar manner. Simultaneously with the these explosions, giant powder and rackarock bombs on the surface of the ground are touched off, the entire combination of explosives perceptibly shocking the atmosphere and giving the impression of a slight earthquake. The balloons are charged by a hose connected with retorts, filled with chlorate of potassium, and binocide of manganese, together with hydrogen from a large generator. The observation balloon is held stationary by a cable at a Congress, appropriating $10,000 "for rain;" it passed as a clause in the General Appropriation Bill, and Texas was selected as the scene of the initial experiment. On August 10th, General Dyhrenfurth proceeded to the 300,000 acre ranch of Mr. Nelson Morris, which is situated in a notoriously arid section. The ranch is little else than a vast wind-swept prairie. General Dyhrenfurth had with him, besides his working corps, Professor Edward Powers of Delavan, Wis., civil engineer; Dr. C. A. O. Russell, chemist; Professor George E. Curtis of the Smithsonian Institute, meteorologist; Mr. J. T. Ellis, secretary; Mr. Paul A. Draper, electrician; Mr. George E. Casler and Mr. Carl E. Myers, balloonists; Mr. F.B. Keefer, statistician.

A little building was constructed, where explosive balloons, filled with oxygen and hydrogen gas were prepared. Then a beautiful, clear day was selected for the first attempt. A wind blew from the west, and there was no sign of moisture in the sky. Five balloons were sent up and exploded at a great height, while two hundred pounds of dynamite rackarock powder, and one hundred and fifty pounds of dynamite were exploded on the ground. Meanwhile, one of the party ascended in an observation balloon, to watch the experiment, which lasted several hours. Within five hours heavy clouds appeared in the western horizon, and an hour later a fierce storm of rain, accompanied by thunder and lightning, was in full operation. This lasted three hours. Five other rain-storms were produced in rapid succession, delighting the farmers and ranchmen, height of one thousand feet, until the observer gives the signal, when it rises to a height of two miles, enabling the occupant of the car to view the entire aerial field of action.

Gen. Dyhrenfurth explains his theory of attack very lucidly as follows: Rain-storms originate in the mingling of different currents of the upper air, some warm and moist, others cooler. The effect of this conjunction is to squeeze out the moisture which is precipitated, first as clouds and finally as rain. Sudden explosions at high altitudes produce waves of air, and mingle the currents necessary to the condensation of the moisture, and thus work in line with nature, simply accelerating her processes. Persistent heavy explosions force the precipitation. The experimenters have observed that after an explosion, heavy showers have been drawn from light clouds, unsuspected of rain.

Professor Pickering of Harvard, and certain other scientific gentlemen, are still sceptical about these experiments, believing that no means have yet been discovered to draw rain from an absolutely cloudless sky.

The prophet said, "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can make rain? Thou hast made all these things" (Jer. 14:22). If these experiments succeed, some will, doubtless, say the challenge has been met. The Christian need not be disturbed. It may be that man has discovered how to use the natural law which produces rain, but of that law, as of all else, we say, "Thou hast made all these things."

THE FLORENCE MISSION IN THE WEST

A DEEPLY interesting anniversary is described in the Daily Mercury of San Jose, Cal. It was that of the Florence Mission established a year ago in that city by Mr. Charles N. Crittenton of New York. As was stated in this journal in January, 1889, when we gave pictures of the Florence Mission in New York, and a portrait of its founder, the wonderful success of the Mission encouraged Mr. Crittenton to hope that a chain of such beneficent institutions might spring up across the continent. Mr. Crittenton, it appears, has commenced the work at the other extremity of the chain. In San Jose and Sacramento, in the extreme West and in New York in the extreme East, the name of Mr. Crittenton's beloved daughter, Florence, is now identified with the work of Christian rescue of the fallen.

The results of one year's work in San Jose, as reported in our Western contemporary, prove that God is blessing the effort there as he has done in New York. Eighteen men rescued from debased lives, some of whom had actually been criminals, were present at the anniversary to testify to the change that had been worked in them by the power of God through the instrumentality of the Florence Mission. Some of them said they were hopeless cases, and one who had been in prison several times, but who for six months past has been kept faithful, told how low they had sunk when, to their own amazement and that of all who know them, they were lifted up and kept from falling through Christ. Mr. Crittenton has too much confidence in the principle of his work to need encouragement to persevere, but even he must have felt cheered and stimulated by the testimonies given. He has, it appears, spent a hundred thousand dollars already, in planting and maintaining the Florence Missions, but the expenditure has been blessed to the production of precisely the result for which he was hoping, and he, therefore, considers the investment satisfactory.

It was stated at the Anniversary, which was held in the First Methodist Church of San Jose, that the aggregate attendance at the meetings of the Mission during last year was no less than 45,625 persons. More than a thousand had been so moved as to ask for the prayers of the workers on their behalf, and more than four hundred fallen women and outcasts had been sheltered, fed and clothed. There is much to hope from the reports which come from rescued ones restored to their homes, or started again in a better life through the efforts of Mr. Crittenton and his helpers. They do not boast of these trophies, but their hearts rejoice over them and they are going forward with fresh energy and confidence in their Christ-like labor.

A DISREPUTABLE FATHER.

"THERE was a strange parting, some years ago in Edinburgh," says Rev. W. Birch, now of New Zealand. "A gentleman, who was visiting the poor in the narrow lanes in the poorest quarter of the city, was knocked down by a frightened horse, and would have been crushed under the wheels of the vehicle behind it if a strong hand had not dragged him aside. Deeply grateful to his preserver, he asked him what he could do for him. 'Nothing for me,' was the reply, 'but if you would take my son and make something of him I should be grateful.' 'Why not for you?' was the next question. 'It's no use,' was the reply. 'I am one of the best known thieves in Edinburgh. I'm too old to reform, but you can save the boy.' Help was offered in money and influence, and he was assured that an honest occupation should be secured for him; but the man said, 'No; I shouldn't keep it. I've got used to this kind of life and I should not be content out of it. Take the boy, there's hope for him.' The gentleman still urged him to make an effort on his own account, but unsuccessfully. Finally he yielded and the boy was brought. In rough words the father bade him go with his benefactor and respect him and obey him in all things. 'I have done with you,' said the father, 'from this time on. If you see me in the street don't you speak to me. We are strangers now. I won't drag you down.' Without another word of adieu the man turned away, slinking off with the peculiar furtive look of the hunted criminal. Neither his son nor the gentleman ever saw him again, but they heard that he died in prison six years afterward. The son is now working as a missionary among thieves."

PUBLIC MORALS.

OFFICIALS who wink at fraud, and who have neither censure nor arraignment for glittering dishonesties, always weaken the pulse of commercial honor. Every shop, every store, every bazaar, every factory in your city feels the moral character of your City Hall. If in any city there be a dishonest Mayoralty, or an unprincipled Common Council, or a Court susceptible to bribes, in that city there will be unlimited license for all kinds of trickery and sin; while, on the other hand, if officials are faithful to their oath of office, if the laws are promptly executed, if there is vigilance in regard to the out-branchings of crime, there is the highest protection for all bargain-making. A merchant may stand in his store and say, "Now I'll have nothing to do with city politics; I will not soil my hands with the slush;" nevertheless the most insignificant trial in the police court will affect that merchant directly or indirectly. What style of clerk issues the writ; what style of constable makes the arrest; what style of attorneys issue the plea; what style of judge charges the jury; what style of sheriff executes the sentence—these are questions that strike your counting-rooms to the centre. You may not throw it off. In the city of New York Christian merchants for a great while said, "We'll have nothing to do with the management of public affairs," and they allowed everything to go at loose ends until there rolled up in this city a debt of nearly $120,000,000. The municipal government became a hissing and a by-word in the whole earth, and then the Christian merchants saw their folly, and they went and took possession of the ballot boxes. I wish all commercial men to understand that they are not independent of the moral character of the men who rule over them, but must be thoroughly, mightily affected by them.

MINISTERS TO THE FRONT.

AUTUMN will soon be here and with it will open a new year of ministers' work. We hope that this will be the year when your congregations will either raise your salaries, or pay up what they owe you. Either will do. We do not want you bothered this year with raps at the door for the payment of butchers' bills which speak of meat that months ago turned into bone and muscle and sermons. The congregation had better be called together, and the liberal men called upon to pay for the dead-beats who, though able to help, give nothing to the support of the Gospel, and so are stealing aride to heaven. The monetary condition of the pastors provided for, let them plan for a twelve-month of hearty work for God. The weather will be cold, and you might decrease your bill for fuel by putting into the stove some of those well-seasoned and dried-up manuscript sermons. Throw away those old mackerel, and catch a fresh shad right out of the river. This may be our last year for preaching. What a glorious thing it would be to die in the pulpit, our faces agleam and our lips warm with the story of Jesus and the Resurrection. But do not mistake us as wanting to get to heaven yet. We want to be alive when the commander-in-chief of all the forces of darkness makes a Yorktown surrender. We want to see him unhorsed from his black charger, and sent spinning to perdition quicker than he came out of it. Come on, ministers of the Gospel, and let us make this a tough year for him!

INCIPIENT GAMBLING.

AMONG the most baleful influences abroad are the gift-enterprises. They have a tendency to make this a nation of gamblers. Whatever you get, in such a place as that, without giving a proper equivalent, is a robbery of your own soul and a robbery of the community. We are appalled to see men who have failed in other enterprises go into gift concerts, where the chief attraction is not music but the prizes distributed among the audience; or to sell books where the chief attraction is not the book but the package that goes with the book. Tobacco dealers advertise that on a certain day they will put money into their papers, so that the purchase of this tobacco in Cincinnati or New York may unexpectedly come upon a magnificent gratuity. Boys hawking through the cars packages containing nobody knows what, until you open them and find they contain nothing. Christian men with pictures on their walls gotten in a lottery, and the brain of community taxed to find out some new way of getting things without paying for them. O, when a young man consents to these practices, he is being bound hand and foot by a habit which has already damned "a great multitude that no man can number." Sometimes these gift enterprises are carried on in the name of charity; and you remember at the close of the late war how many gift enterprises were on foot, the proceeds to go to the orphans and the widows of the soldiers and sailors. What did the men who had charge of those gift enterprises care for the orphans and the widows? Why, they would have allowed them to freeze to death upon their steps. I have no faith in a charity which, for the sake of relieving present suffering, opens a gaping jaw that has swallowed down so much of the virtue and good principle of the community. Young men, have nothing to do with these things. They only sharpen up your appetite for games of chance. Do one of two things: be honest or die.

THE OLD GOSPEL.

THE impression has been abroad in many of the churches that in order to get an audience it is necessary to relax the more rigorous teachings of the Gospel and not say much about man's desperate and dying need, and but little about the necessity of regeneration, but I believe that church will stand longest and mightiest which is planted half way between Sinai and Calvary. The thick August cloud first thunders and then wets and ripens the field, and this Gospel first shadows the heart by conviction, and then brightens it with saving rain. My word is, to those who are about to buckle on the Lord's armor, preach the whole Gospel, hit whom it will, affront whom it may, and you will get an audience. Men may get mad and go away, but they will be so mad that they will keep talking against you and that will send a great many people to see what a desperate case you are; and whether it be in western log meeting-house or city cathedral, your services will be thronged. The plain, unvarnished truth is itself a stir, an excitement, a God-kindled sensation; and when the Lord makes a sensation, it is a healthy sensation. The Church of God is sick of scholastic hair-splitting and didactic sawdust, and "physics and metaphysics, hyperphysics and hypophysics," and wants bread to appease hunger, and salve to cure wounds, and light to lift darkness. Give it a fair chance and the warm-hearted and enthusiastic religion of the Man of Nazareth will be the most popular on the earth. All human inventions to create spiritual light are only unclarified kerosene—explosive and deathful—while this old Gospel is the noonday sun whose smile is the world's illumination and harvest. Why is it that our city dispensaries always have patients? If the doctors sat there day by day and read them treatises on the cause and cure of disease, how few sick men would go there to be healed! It is because every day those dispensaries will treat them, and the people know there will be alleviation and commiseration in those institutions. Now, the church was intended to be a moral dispensary, and if the people find out that every Sabbath there are hundreds of cases of moral ailments prescribed for, there will be no lack of attendance. The apothecary's shelf has on it the magnesia and the belladonna and the morphine and the medicines for all kinds of disease; but this Gospel is the specific for every style of spiritual sickness, and everything else is quack medicine.

THE LOAD OF ZEAL.

WORK, but don't worry," says the song, but we don't know about the worrying. A little anxiety is a good thing in its way; it is an incentive to work in every department. It is a very pleasant thing to take everything in the serenest way possible, but so far as our observation goes, very serene workers are not always the most efficient ones. While the virtue of patience should not be lost, a freedom from anxiety is not always practicable if desirable. A man who has no anxiety about his business is pretty sure, before long, to have no business about which to be concerned. Are we then pleading for disquiet? No; only that we are not indifferent to things, the accomplishment of which we have at heart; and where we are not indifferent we are anxious; there is no middle ground. And now we come to the question and we ask the reader, are you anxious about your work for Christ? Work is such a different thing spiritually from what it is physically. Spiritual work is not shouting Christ's name in a desert; it is not tying one's self up in a double bow-knot of gesticulation; it is not seizing every man by the collar, whom you take to be unconverted, saying to him: "Be a Christian, sir, or your days are numbered!" There is, we admit, a good deal of this spiritual burglary about; but this is not the right kind of work. But true spiritual work means a cup of cold water to the thirsty, a crust of bread to the hungry; it means a noble example, it means a forgiving spirit, it means the kindly smile, the hearty hand-grasp, the encouraging word, the urgent word in the right place and at the right time. We know poor, suffering, bed-ridden invalids who do more for Christ in one day than some obese Christians who kick the beam at 250, have done in all their lives. "Poor," we said, but we recall it. In the priceless treasure of a heart filled with the love of Christ, they are richer than if they possessed in fee simple all the gold-fields of California and Australia.

Christian brother, work for Christ! Work in the shop, in the counting-house, in the mill, in the factory; work for Christ as you till the earth for its increase and the great canopy of heaven covers you.

In a pure life, in an earnest purpose, in service however simple, in careful attention to the little affairs of life, in all that you do, strive to put Christ in everything. The life of the earnest, working Christian should be the jolliest, the joyfulest life in the world; and such yours should be, "For the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof."

BRIEF NOTES.

Our readers will be glad to learn that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has now, for the first time in its history, its own press-rooms and bindery. The machinery is all of the newest manufacture, with all the improvements to date, and it is run by electric power. The present issue is the first that has been produced with facilities, and we believe our readers will agree with us that the character of the work surpasses in excellence even the high grade to which they have recently been accustomed. Arrangements have been perfected for the production of an issue of 150,000 copies per week and this circulation the publisher hopes soon to attain by the aid of the many friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The new press-rooms and bindery are located on Broadway within easy reach of the publication office which, as heretofore, is in the Bible House.

Major D. W. Whittle has just concluded a course of lectures at the Young Men's Institute at Lake Geneva, N. Y.

The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Jerusalem says there are now about 100,000 Jews in all Palestine, of which 40,000 are in Jerusalem.

Bishop Thoburn of India received this year from the friends and students at Northfield funds sufficient to support seventy-five native evangelists.

Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost expects to resume evangelistic work in Calcutta about Christmas. The Calcutta Missionary Conference, promises him a hearty welcome.

Evangelist H. W. Brown of Chicago has been holding tent meetings at Gallipolis, O., the churches of the town uniting in the work. Mr. Brown is being urged by other towns in Ohio to conduct union meetings this fall.

The Fourth Presbyterian Church of Chicago listened on Sunday last to Rev. John McNeill, the most popular preacher in London next to Spurgeon. He is pastor of the Regent Square Presbyterian Church, and is known as "the Scottish Spurgeon."

Miss Frances E. Willard has reluctantly cancelled her autumn engagements to speak and attend Conventions in New England and elsewhere. Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge will probably take her place. It is intimated that the feeble health of Miss Willard's mother has caused this change of arrangements.

Rev. C. H. Yatman begins his fall evangelistic work at Trenton, N. J. Thence he goes to Newton, Mass., and Newburgh, N. Y. His meetings at Martha's Vineyard this summer, were eminently successful. Efforts to secure his services for a whole year, are being made in New England and on the Pacific coast.

The King's Household of Bible Readers, is entering on the sixth year of its course. It was organized in 1885 to encourage the systematic reading of the Bible. Many testimonies to the benefits derived from the course have been received from students. Persons desirous of undertaking the study may apply, enclosing one-cent stamp for reply, to Mrs. E. H. Bronson, Salem, N. J.

The Annual Foreign Missionary meetings of the Congregational Churches, will be held during the week commencing Nov. 27. The American Board desires to encourage this plan of holding the meetings simultaneously and will supply suitable literature to any Congregational Church applying for it. The general meeting of the Board of Managers will be held at Pittsfield, Mass., Oct. 13-16.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon suffered a relapse on September 2, but the following day the cable announced that he had rallied. Reports from the sick room, of earlier date, represent him as making little, if any progress; but he is still confident that God will answer the many prayers offered on his behalf and will restore him to health and usefulness. Prayers are earnestly desired by his family and church from all sympathizing friends.

Princeton University is to have one of the most beautiful parks in this section of the country. The tract of land called the Potter Farm which was recently presented to the University, added to the old College grounds, will be turned by the skill of a famous landscape gardener into an immense pleasure ground with shady drives and promenades winding through it. The new Commencement Hall, the gift of Mrs. Charles Alexander of New York is to be erected on the space between the Gymnasium and Reunion Hall.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Balmaceda's Abdication and Flight—Rev. Orrin Bouton Dead—Canada's Census—The Russian Famine—News from the Arctic Expedition—General Notes.

IN spite of gloomy predictions as to the probable fate of his Arctic expedition, the latest news from Lieutenant Peary shows that gallant explorer to have surmounted the difficulties presented by the ice pack at Melville Bay, and to be now in quarters 800 miles from the pole. His party built a hut on the side of a bleak mountain and surrounded it with an abundance of stores. The steamer Kite, Peary's vessel, had a tremendous fight with the ice-floes in Melville Bay for three weeks. The explorers have had the satisfaction of encountering the most northerly people in the world, who live beyond Cape York, at Itah and Ittibu, in the Arctic highlands, and who were not even aware of the existence of other beings. They have kayaks or boats, and are apparently of the Eskimo race. Polar bears and seals, little auks, gulls and ice partridges furnished excellent hunting for the explorers, who are all in good health and spirits. Lieut. Peary's broken leg was caused by a huge cake of ice which crushed it. It will doubtless prove a serious setback to the expedition.

The Russian Famine Spreading.

FAMINE has already taken hold of Russia, and hundreds of villages are suffering, with no present prospect of relief. In some parishes, the entire population has taken on a gaunt and emaciated aspect and there are families that have gone without bread for weeks, subsisting on the poorest of vegetables, and the leaves of trees. If they get a piece of bread, it is immediately surrendered to the young children. In one village of 145 houses the occupants of less than twenty had the usual supply of food in the house. A clergyman found sixteen persons in another district in the last stages of enfeeblement and exhaustion. There is much excitement among the peasantry, but they are powerless to help themselves, and nobody in the official world seems to care whether they live or die.

A Railroad Wreck.

FOUR passengers were killed and thirty injured by an accident on the Cannelton Branch of the Louisville & St. Louis Railroad, near Evansville, Ind., on August 31. The midnight train plunged down an embankment, while running at the rate of thirty miles an hour. The coaches followed the engine and rolled on top, breaking the steam pipes and scalding the occupants. The death list will probably reach ten or twelve.

The Five Points Mission's Loss.

FRIENDS of Home Mission work will regret to learn of the death of the Rev. Orrin Bouton, for over seven years Superintendent of the Five Points Mission, New York, a historical sketch of which was published in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Bouton was a native of New York State, and was sixty-two years of age. He studied for the Methodist ministry and was graduated from Union College in 1857. After several years as Principal at Macon College, Mo., he returned to New York and was stationed successively at Bovina, Windham, Hurley and Stamford. In 1884 he was appointed Superintendent of the famous Five Points Mission. Mr. Bouton, whose portrait appears in this column, was a man of considerable organizing powers. The position he held was an exceedingly difficult one to fill, and several of his predecessors had broken down physically under the strain. His immediate predecessor was Rev. S. I. Fergusson, before whom the position was filled by Rev. J. N. Shaffer, and Rev. C. S. Brown. These clergymen found the work exceedingly laborious. Dr. Brown died at Nyack practically from too close application to the work. Dr. Shaffer, who was a most successful manager, was for thirteen years in charge of the Mission, this period covering the most exciting days of the Civil War. During the Draft Riots, Five Points was a constant scene of turbulence, and it required all the courage and determination of a Christian to remain at his post in these trying times.

The Chilean War Ended.

THE leading foreign event of the week has been the close of the Chilean War, the Revolution having been entirely successful. In the last issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it was announced that a great battle was in progress near Valparaiso. Claims of victory were made by the Balmacedists which proved to be totally unfounded, for the Congress party, under Col. Canto, won a great and decisive triumph, capturing several thousand prisoners, a large amount of war munitions, and occupying the city of Valparaiso. The Balmacedist warship, Almirante Lynch, after a slight resistance, also surrendered. Balmaceda the Dictator, on learning of the defeat of his forces, turned over the Government to Gen. Baquedano and fled, first taking the precaution to secure 800,000 pesos in specie, which he forwarded on the British war ship occupying the city of Valparaiso. The Balmacedist warship, Almirante Lynch, after a slight resistance, also surrendered. Espeigle to Montevideo. In his flight he took with him his wife and family and several attendants. General Baquedano, has handed over to the Junta, consisting of the Vice-President of the Senate, Speaker of the House and Commander of the Navy, the reins of authority. Balmaceda, it now turns out, instead of being murdered in the mountains, while attempting to reach Buenos Ayres overland, fled by sea. He took passage on the steamer Condella for San Francisco, but, if pressed by the insurgent warships, may land in Mexico. Col. Canto (whose portrait is given above) remains in command of the Congress armies, and the country is quieting down. U. S. Minister Egan, after much delay, telegraphed to our State Department announcing the success of the revolution. A new government will be organized on a temporary basis, pending an election for President, and will doubtless be recognized by our own and other governments. The opinion prevails in London that the next President of Chili will be Don Augustin Edwards, who is wealthy and a staunch supporter of the revolutionary cause. He is largely interested in the nitrate trade. The active head of the revolution has been George Montt, who with Waldo Silva and Ramon Barros Luco, forms the Junta or governing body that will administer affairs till a new President is elected. We give on this page a view of the city of Valparaiso, near which a final stand was made by the Dictator's armies. For months past this great seaport has been a sufferer through the war. Its jails have been filled with political prisoners and its wharves have been more or less deserted on account of the blockade by Balmaceda's ships.

Canada's Census.

CANADIANS are astonished and not at all gratified at the result of the Census which has just been completed. To those statesmen who have been declaiming about the phenomenal growth of the Dominion and the evils that would result from closer trade relations with the United States, it has proved a boomerang. The total population of the Dominion is shown to be 4,823,344, as against 4,324,810 in 1881, an increase of about half a million in a decade. This is 5.79 per cent. below the rate of increase during the preceding ten years. It was generally hoped that the increase would have been at least seventeen per cent. The greatest growth is in the western provinces, while those on the seaboard are almost on a standstill. Toronto is ahead of the cities in development and is now close to Montreal in population. One remarkable result of the Census is that it will cause a reduction of two in the membership of the House of Commons, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward's Island each losing a member.

The Tennessee Convict Question.

TRADES Unions all over the country are watching with interest the action of the Tennessee legislature, assembled in special session by Gov. Buchanan, to pass a law for the adjustment of the mining troubles in that state. The Governor's message, while it advocates a radical change in the present convict labor system, opposes its abolition although petitions are pouring in from all quarters demanding that it be wiped out. One resolution was introduced in the lower house, which if adopted, would have had the effect of sending back the troops to the mines and provoking still more serious troubles. Thus far no positive action has been taken. Meanwhile, the situation at the Briceville mines remains unchanged, and the miners, though quiet, are revisors of the U. S. Pharmacopoeia ten years ago, and is a standard authority on medical topics.

NEWS NOTES.

Mr. Blaine will not return to Washington before October, it is now said by his friends.

Secretary of War, Proctor, has accepted the United States Senatorship tendered him by Gov. Page of Vermont.

The Gautemalian Government is said to be on the verge of bankruptcy, and the army threatens to revolt unless it is paid.

Parnell, it is now said, will come to this country to attend the Convention of the Irish National League, October 1 and 2.

During a G. A. R. Encampment at Grand Island, Neb., lightning struck a tent, prostrating nine occupants. All will recover.

England threatens to annex Egypt, as an offset to the action of Turkey in granting the freedom of the Dardanelles to Russia.

It is rumored that in consequence of the recent disclosures of official corruption in Canada, Premier Abbott has called upon Secretary of State Chapleau to resign.

France, England, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Denmark, Sweden, Belgium and the Congo Free States have all given assurances of fine exhibits at the coming World's Fair.

A heavy frost was experienced throughout Southern Dakota and other sections of the Northwest, on September 3d. Corn, buckwheat and cereals in general suffered considerable damage.

Miss Mary Lincoln, daughter of the American Minister to England, Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, was married in London on the 2nd of September to Charles Isham, a young lawyer of New York.

Ten thousand window glass workers in Pittsburgh have struck for five per cent. increase in wages. The strike will last at least seven weeks. The men have nearly $250,000 in the treasury.

Six masked men, by the use of dynamite and Winchester rifles, intimidated the express messenger on the Southern Pacific Railroad, near Samuel, Tex., on Sept. 2, and robbed him of a large amount of money.

George Wood, while assisting at a balloon ascension at the Oswego (N. Y.) County Fair, was caught up a thousand feet in the air, his body becoming entangled in the ropes. He fell to the earth and was instantly killed.

Two more bodies have been found in the collapsed buildings at the Park Place disaster, New York. There is a general movement in the metropolis to investigate the condition of buildings heavily loaded with machinery.

A band of Italian brigands belonging to a society similar to the Mala Vita, an organization of robbers and murderers, has been corralled and its leader and twelve members captured near Bari, in the Italian mountain district.

President Hippolyte, of Hayti, has followed the example of Balmaceda, the dictator of Chili, before his fall, and sent his family to a place of safety. Several of his ministers have resigned. He is evidently preparing for the coming revolution.

Ex-Premier Crispi, of Italy, threatens to publish certain documents designed to prove that France, in 1889, wanted to force the Pope to leave Rome, and that he did have such an intention at that time, when the troubles of the Vatican were pressing on every side.

Labor Day, Sept. 7, was observed in New York City by a parade of the different trades, followed in the evening by public gatherings, speeches and merry-makings. In Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Buffalo and other cities similar parades took place.

Congress is to be asked to appropriate five millions of dollars to assist the World's Fair. Twenty legislatures have made appropriations, and thirty states and territories have applied for space at the Fair. This is besides of the large amount of space that will be devoted to the exhibits of other governments.

The Steamer Dunmurray, which sailed from New York for Antwerp, on August 26, capsized and sank in a terrific gale, about eight hundred miles out, on the 29th ult. Eight of the crew were drowned and twenty others tossed about in a life-boat for two days, when they were rescued and taken to Halifax.

The Japan mail from Yokohama to New York arrived last week in fifteen days—breaking all records. The steamship Empress of Japan sailed from New York Oct. 19th, reached Victoria, B. C., Oct. 29th, two and three-fourth days ahead of schedule time, and the mail was immediately transferred to a special train on the Canadian Pacific road, arriving on Sept. 2d, in New York City.

PROF. PRESCOTT.

VERY general attention has been directed toward the fortieth annual convention of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, whose proceedings at Washington were presided over by one of the most distinguished chemists of the age, Albert Berg Prescott, whose portrait is given in this column. Mr. Prescott was born in New York sixty years ago, is of revolutionary descent, among his ancestors being the

RECRUITS FOR JESUS.

"And there came of the children of Benjamin and Judah to the hold unto David. And David went out to meet them, and answered and said unto them, If ye be come peaceably unto me to help me, mine heart shall be knit unto you: but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no wrong in mine hands, the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it, etc."—1. Chronicles 12: 16-18.

AT this time David was in the hold—I suppose in the stronghold of Ziklag, which the king of the Philistines had given to him. It was in that fortress-town that he received a welcome addition to his band. David was an exile; and it is not every man who cares to cast in his lot with a banished nobleman. He was outlawed, and his sovereign would have slain him with his own hand if he had found opportunity: few care to stake their all with a man in such a condition. The fortunes of David were at a low ebb, and hence when these men came to David they did a valorous action—an action which he would be sure to remember in the after-days of his triumph.

I want to run a parallel between the case of David and that of our Lord Jesus Christ. At the present moment our Lord Jesus, the Son of David, is ### Still in the Hold.

Among the men of this world Jesus is not yet enthroned: their hearts go after another prince, and as yet the kingdom has not come to the Son of David. I know that he reigns in heaven, and that he is in very deed King of kings and Lord of lords; but before the eyes of the mass of men he is still despised and rejected. His people, as yet, are but a feeble folk, and often hard put to it; while his kingdom is ridiculed, his claims are derided, and his yoke is scorned. The doctrines which he preached are tossed to and fro like a ball; and men at the present time are glorying in science or tradition, in reason or in speculation; yea, they speak as if human wisdom would soon wipe out the very name of Christianity. It is not so in truth before God; but it is so in appearance before men. I say, blessed are they who, like these men of Benjamin and Judah, are willing to go to the King in the hold, and take up his cause though it be at a low ebb, and stand up for him when the many are ready to trample him down, and are ridiculing his work and his cause. For my own part, I never loved my Lord better than now that he is defamed; and his truth is all the dearer to me because it is flouted by the worldly-wise.

I. First, then, here is

A Very Commendable Example.

Many of these men of Benjamin and Judah, in the first place, went to join themselves to David because they had heard that he was the Lord's anointed. They understood that Samuel had gone down to Ramah, and, in the days of David's youth, had anointed him in the name of the Lord to be king instead of Saul. Therefore they said, "Whom God anoints we will follow," and they came after David. It was fit that they should be loyal to David if they would be obedient to God.

Now, it is within the belief, I trust, of all assembled here, that the Lord God Almighty has anointed "one chosen out of the people" to be his King in Zion—the King of his church for ever and ever; and that one chosen out of the people is Jesus of Nazareth, of the house of David, who is himself, as man, the servant of God, but who is also divine, and counts it not robbery to be equal with God. We have, I trust, all of us drunk in this doctrine, that the Lord Jesus is the Anointed of God, the very Word of God, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Now, it seems to me that if it be so, the next inevitable step for men who fear God is to the Lord's Anointed. If Jesus be the Messiah, the sent One of God, in the name of everything that is gracious and right let us follow him. Oh, my dear hearers, I am perplexed about some of you: you call Jesus Lord, and yet you do not obey him; you own that he is the Saviour, and yet you do not trust in him for salvation.

Next, these men, no doubt many of them, followed David because of his personal excellences. They had heard of him—of what he was in his youth, what he had been at home, and at court, and in the army, and in the day of battle. He had behaved admirably everywhere, and these warriors had heard of it. A good soldier should have a good captain: a good captain deserves good soldiers. These men of war argued well when they enlisted under David. But how shall I commend the Lord Jesus Christ to you that are of a noble spirit? Was there ever any like unto him? Who among the good, the great, the brave, the beautiful, can be likened unto him? Oh, could all men know how good he is, how gracious he is, as some of us do know; even if they only went to that partial extent, surely no men would stand out, but the Prince Immanuel

Would Win all Hearts!

There was a third reason why brave spirits resolved to enlist under David, and that was, that he was so cruelly persecuted by Saul—so misrepresented and abused by his enemies. Sadly true is it that the Lord Jesus Christ is still of so little account in this world. His name, ah, I am sick of the way in which they use his name to-day! Shame on some that are called Christian ministers! They believe in Christ, but it is a Christ without his crown, his atonement, his judgment-seat, or even his Godhead. They mock us with orthodox phrases, from which the essential truth is gone. They pretend that they believe in the atonement, and when we listen to their atonement we find that it does not effectually atone for any one. It is a mere fiction, and not a fact. It saves nobody, but is a mere sham. They have eviscerated the gospel, and then they hold up the empty carcase, and claim that they are Christians still. Christians who have murdered Christianity! Believers who doubt whether there is anything to be believed! Yet we are entreated in our charity to hug such traitors to our bosom. We shall do nothing of the kind. We would sooner believe in infidels outright than in those who pretend to be Christians and are

Infidels at Heart.

I loathe to hear our true Lord praised by false lips. They deny the doctrines which he taught, and yet prate about believing him. It is a shallow trick, but yet it deceives shallow souls. Poor, weak minds say, "The man speaks so beautifully of Jesus, surely he cannot be in error." I tell you it is the old Judas trick—the Son of man is betrayed with a kiss. How nauseating their praises must be to him whom they are betraying. Think not that they are honest; their designs are far other than appear upon the surface. They laud him as man that they may dishonor him as God: they cry up his life, and his example, that they may cast his atoning sacrifice into the ditch. They lift up one part of the divine revelation with no other intention than that they may dash down the other: they crouch at his feet that they may stab at his heart.

Future Greatness.

Once more. These men came to David because they believed that David had a great future before him. He was very poor when they came to him, an exile, as we have said, an outlaw, one who could not return to his land because the king himself had a personal feud with him. But they said, "It doth not yet appear what he shall be. This son of Jesse will be king yet, and his enemies shall beg their lives of him." So, looking to the great future that awaited him, they determined to take shares with him in his present low estate that they might be raised with him in his exaltation. Now, I think that I can say to every one here, "I would that ye would come over to David's side—to Jesus's side—for there is a future awaiting him, a glory, a triumph, even here on earth, such as shall make those men gnash their teeth who throw away this opportunity of enlisting in his host." Who does not desire to be with him and to behold his glory? Cast in your lot with him, then, O ye undecided! Let his cause be as it may in the eyes of worldlings, espouse it at once right heartily; for they that are with him in his humiliation shall be with him in his triumph.

II. Now, I have just a few words to say upon the second head:

A Cautious Inquiry.

These men of Benjamin and of Judah came to David, and David met them as a warrior standing upon his guard. The times were not such as to allow of a negligent confidence in all who professed friendship. The Benjamites were of the same tribe as Saul, and it was singular that they should come and join with David, the rival of their own leader. The men of Judah belonged to the same tribe as those men of Keilah who had betrayed David: therefore the hero was cautious and made careful inquiry. My Lord Jesus Christ is never so eager after disciples as to enroll those who cannot bear to be questioned. He did not go abroad sweeping up a heap of nominal followers who would increase his apparent strength and prove a real weakness to him. He said to those who offered themselves, "Count the cost." "Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest," says one. Jesus does not there and then enlist him, but calmly replies, "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." He wants followers, but he wants them of the right kind; therefore to enter upon a course which they will, before long, renounce. I would in this matter imitate my Lord: I have pressed you to come to my banner, but at the same time I would cautiously inquire of you.

Now, see what David said to them: he set before them the right way. He said, "If ye be come peaceably unto me to help me, mine heart shall be knit unto you." If you wish to join with Christ's people, and have your name numbered with them, one main question is—Do you come unto him? Do not profess to be a Christian if you have not come to Christ, for Christ is the soul of Christianity. To come to Christ is this: confessing your sins, look to him as the sin-bearer, trust him with your future, trust him with your soul altogether. By a sincere, simple, undivided faith, you do really come to Jesus: have you such a faith? If it be so, come along with you, for our host will be glad to have its number increased by your coming. If you do not thus come to our Lord, pray do not come to us.

Then David puts the question, "If ye be come peaceably unto me," and this was needful, for some are captious and quarrelsome. Some profess to come to Christ, but at the very first. They would make terms with him, and they come intending to dispute with his people. From the first they are discontented and fault-finding, rather patronizing Christ and his cause than humbly uniting with him and his people. They do not think half as much of God's people as God thinks of them. When I hear people say, "Oh, there is So-and-So, who is not what he ought to be, and he is a member of the church," and then they begin finding fault with this and with that, I say to myself, "That critic is no true friend." The church is not perfect, but woe to the man who finds pleasure in pointing out her imperfections. Christ loves his church, and let us do the same. If you are a faultless man I do not ask you to join the Christian Church, because I am sure that you would not find anybody else there like yourself. If you are coming to pick holes, and quiz, and question, and find fault, and talk about inconsistencies and so forth, then you may pass on and join some other army; but if you be come peaceably to our Lord and to us, then I offer you a hearty welcome.

They Quarrel with Christ

Helping and Helped.

Again David puts the question, "If ye be come peaceably to me to help me." Mind this and mark it well: they that join with Christ must join in his battles, join in his labors, join in his self-sacrifice. We must come to his church not only to be helped, but to help. It is of no use your entering the army if you do not mean to fight; and it is of no use your uniting with the host of God unless you mean to take your share in the holy warfare. They that do not labor in the cause of Christ will very soon find that they are not fed in the house of God. Why should they be? I count it no office of mine to carry bread and meat to sluggards and lie-a-beds: I would sooner feed swine. They who never do a hand's turn among us ought to be turned out from us. If ye be come peaceably to help us, then I speak for my Captain, and bid you welcome; but if you do not mean real service, please to march on.

There are the three questions then. Do you come to Christ and accept him? If so, come along. Do you come with a desire to maintain peace among your Christian brethren? If so, come! Do you come with the intent of helping the Lord Jesus Christ to spread abroad his truth? Then come, and welcome, and the Lord be with you and with us!

The Promise.

Do you know what Jesus says to you who come to him aright? "My heart shall be knit unto you." Oh, I think that if I had been Amasai, I should have felt the spirit come upon me to speak just as Amasai did when he so heartily declared that he and his brethren came to join heart and soul with David. With all that loving warmth which was so natural to him, David said, "My heart shall be knit to you." Now when the Lord Jesus Christ says, "Will you espouse my cause? Will you accept me for leader? Will you come and join with my people? Then my heart shall be knit unto you"—do not your hearts leap within you? What a charming promise it is! What union of soul it sets forth!

Notice how David put the other side of it, and set before them the wrong way;—"But if ye be come to betray me to my enemies, seeing there is no wrong in mine hands, the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it." Will persons ever join the church to betray the Lord Christ to his enemies? I say not that such is their present purpose; but a great many have acted as if they were from the beginning traitors to him and to his truth. Some have proved themselves the enemies of the cross of Christ by their inconsistent lives. People have pointed at them, and said, "Those are followers of Christ, you see. They can lie, and cheat, and get gain as the basest rogues do." They say that they are Christians, and yet you cannot trust them in trade. They are just as gay, and worldly, and false as if they were not Christians at all; why, then I suspect that they are not Christians at all, but like Judas Iscariot, they are children of perdition.

III. But time fails me, and therefore I must finish up, thirdly, by describing from the text

A Cordial Enlistment.

The captain of these brave men felt the Spirit come upon him, and he spoke up as warm-heartedly as David had spoken, saying, "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: peace, peace, be unto thee, and peace be unto thine helpers; for thy God helpeth thee." He began thus:—"Thine we are, David." Now, that is the first thing I want of those who are going to join the church—"Thine are we, Jesus. We are not our own; we are bought with a price." Well may that man avow himself to belong to Christ who has been bought with the blood of Christ.

"And peace be to thy helpers." We desire all good for all good men. We pray for the peace of the peaceful. The day that we were converted we felt that we loved every Christian. I used to say of the little village where I first preached, that I had such an attachment to every inhabitant in it that if I had seen a dog that came from Waterbeach I would have given him a bone. Do you not feel the same towards all

The Lord's People?

The proverb hath it, "Love me, love my dog;" and when you love Christ you love the very lowest of his people. Ay, if Jesus had a dog, you would love that dog for Christ's sake. I am sure that it is so. When a man is always cavilling, I fear he has not the spirit of Christ, and is none of his. May those that come among us always be those that can say, "Peace be to thy helpers." Whatever helps Christ I would help. Wherever I see anything of Christ there my heart shall rest. Oh, to have a large increase to this church and all the churches of hearty, loving, peace-making people!

The last word that they said to David was, "For thy God helpeth thee;" and I shall keep that last sentence very much to myself; I want to feed upon it as my portion of meat: you must not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn, and I am that ox at this time. "Thy God helpeth thee." How I do rejoice to think that God is of David. All the powers of the God of nature and providence are working to aid the Lord of grace. The stars in their courses are fighting for our Immanuel. Everything is being overruled for the advance of Christ's kingdom.

Cast in your lot with "the Leader and Commander of the people," who has God with him. It is the glory of Christ's cause that the Lord God is involved in it. Mr. Wesley's dying words were, "The best of all is, God is with us!" As I repeat the truth my heart cries, "Hallelujah! Blessed be the name of the Lord!" O Anointed of the Lord, thy throne shall endure for ever! To-night thy servants salute thee again, thou Son of David, Wounded Christ, we lay our fingers in the print of the nails, and say, "My Lord and my God." Risen Christ, we look upward as the heavens receive thee, and we adore. Ascended Christ, we fall at thy dear feet, and say, "Thine are we, O Son of David, anointed to be a Prince and a Saviour." Coming Christ, we wait and watch for thine appearing! Come quickly to thine own! Amen and amen.

A FRIEND OF THE POOR.

Rev. F. B. Meyer the Bible Teacher at Northfield and the Apostle of the English Working Men.

WHEN Mr. Moody announced in the spring of this year that he expected to have the assistance of the Rev. F. B. Meyer of England, in the approaching meetings at Northfield, few people could understand why he laid so much stress on the fact. To him, evidently, it was a matter of profound satisfaction and one from which he anticipated great profit, but why it was so, few among us could explain. Some, who had heard Mr. Meyer in London, or at Leicester, understood it and others who had read the two little books of his, entitled respectively, Christian Living and The Shepherd Psalm, had some idea of the singular power and spirituality of the man; but it needed one to be at Northfield where Mr. Meyer seemed to receive fresh unction from his surroundings, fully to realize how great a teacher had come among us. His power as an expositor was astonishing. Favorite texts which had been the subject of so many sermons, that it seemed impossible to say anything new on them revealed unsuspected depths of meaning in his hands. Scripture men and women as he drew them became alive, and delicate shades of character that were unnoticed before, were revealed. His style, too, was a surprise. There was an entire absence of self-consciousness, of oratorical display, or of straining after sensational utterances. His sermons were talks, so simple that a child could understand them yet their diction so chaste that the critic gained as he listened a new idea of the wealth and power of the pure Saxon vocabulary.

Frederick B. Meyer, whose portrait appears in this column is but little over forty years of age. He is one of those Christians whose experience should be quoted for the encouragement of some who are troubled by doubts as to their own standing. Though so eminent in service and so truly spiritual in life, he has no recollection of his conversion. He loved the Saviour from a child and in the atmosphere of a godly home, he passed unconsciously from a state of nature to a state of grace. After a brief business experience, he entered Regent's Park College to study for the ministry. He graduated and passed the severe examination by which alone the coveted London University degree of B.A. can be obtained. His first charge was at Liverpool as co-pastor of Rev. C. M. Burrell, pastor of Pembroke Baptist Church. Thence he went to York where he had the happiness of assisting Messrs. Moody and Sankey in one of their most remarkable seasons of blessing. But it was in 1874 when Mr. Meyer settled at Leicester that the great work of his life began. Leicester is a town of hard-headed, studious workmen. Their condition weighed heavily on the young pastor's heart. They would not come to church and the church was too conservative to approach them, or hold out a hand cordially to them. The Salvation Army reached some, it is true, but the more intelligent, those who were best worth winning, looked with contempt on the tambourine-playing, banner-waving, semi-military companies. Mr. Meyer wanted to win them and to do so he resigned his pastorate, quitted the sheep in the sheepfold to go after the straying ones.

The pile of buildings known as Melbourne Hall was erected for him when the Christian employers of the town discovered what he was trying to do. The central building is a large octagonal hall capable of holding 1400 persons, and the one regret about it has been that it was too small. Sunday and week-nights the men and women who knew that Mr. Meyer had given himself to them, crowded it to suffocation. In a few years eight hundred of them made a profession of faith and were actively working with their pastor for the rescue of others. They confessed that until Mr. Meyer preached to them they had misunderstood Christianity and had opposed it in ignorance of its value. Twenty-three hundred children were gathered in the Sunday School of which Mr. Meyer himself was Superintendent. Lectures and classes were held in the adjoining buildings every night of the week, and a library and reading-room and restaurant occupied another adjunct. Then Mr. Meyer carried the war into the enemy's country by open-air services in other parts of the town, by mission visitors and other agencies, and these too, were much blessed. Another novel feature of the work was the "prison breakfasts." The pastor was a daily visitor at the prison and he was always there in the early morning when the prisoners who had served their terms were discharged. They were invited to breakfast at Melbourne Hall, and after the meal Mr. Meyer gained their confidence in his happy genial way and offered to help them to lead honest lives. The number of men rescued from criminal lives by these means is astonishing. Beside these instrumentalities, Mr. Meyer opened a wood-yard for the temporary employment of men out of work, a home for destitute boys, a home for working boys, and other philanthropic institutions.

It was a mournful day for Leicester when Mr. Meyer, believing that the work so thoroughly organized could be carried on by others, accepted a call to London where a still larger and neglected field was open to him. As minister of Regent's Park Chapel he has been similarly blessed, and the work is still growing. Such is the man whose words were mighty for good at Northfield, and who is now laboring for a brief space in Chicago before returning to his work on the other side the Atlantic.

PREJUDICE YIELDING.

MEMORIES of help received from China during the terrible famine of two years ago, are operating now in some districts of the country to mitigate the prejudices against foreigners. In a letter to the Church at Home and Abroad, the Rev. B. C. Henry of Canton, writes: "I have been attending a large fair held about fifty miles from here, during the past three days. It was with great fear and trembling that I started out on the journey for I had never done work of this kind before, and didn't know how to go about it; besides, I didn't expect to see any immediate results, and I did expect harsh treatment and reviling. It reminded me very much of my journey two years ago, when I took with me five cart-loads of silver for famine-relief, and had a guard of several soldiers with me. When we reached the famine region, we were treated with profound respect, persons sitting by the roadside, villagers sitting on door-steps and along the streets, seeing us coming in the distance, would rise and remain standing while we were passing by. If they get over their notion that we are veritable 'foreign devils,' surely something is gained. One intelligent young man told me there were fifty or sixty persons in his neighborhood who are ready to study the Gospel, and thought he could lead that many to a knowledge of the truth. He said they would say to him, 'Now you go and learn this doctrine, and try these foreigners, and if they don't revile you or abuse you, we will go too.' So, as we didn't have occasion to revile him or abuse him while with us, perhaps others will be led to seek light through us."

HOW A FIGHT ENDED.

At a recent missionary meeting in London, England, a missionary just home from China said: "Two boys were fighting one Sabbath evening, when a little girl on her way to school interfered and tried to separate them. She succeeded, and after they were pacified she invited them to Sunday School with her. They willingly consented, and the three walked off together, the best of friends. That Sunday School proved to be the great turning-point in the lives of those boys. I am one of them, and that little girl has since become my wife." How strangely God works. This little girl by one kind action not only led those two boys to Jesus' feet, but also was the means of one of them preaching the Gospel to thousands of people. "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God." (Matthew 5:9).

NEARING THE END.

The Prophetic Periods Revealed to Daniel Approaching Fulfillment.

BY REV. E. R. CARSWELL.

SEVERAL passages of Scripture seem to favor the Sabbatical scheme of the ages. "There remaineth therefore a rest [literally 'a keeping of the Sabbath'] to the people of God." (Heb. 4:9). In its deepest sense this will be fulfilled, as it is thought by many expositors, when, after six thousand years have elapsed, the seventh thousand will be spent as a glorious Sabbath—the Millennium. And when Peter pauses in the midst of prophecies that relate to the last times to say, "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day," he seems to aim at a deeper meaning than is usually assigned to his words. Every thousand years of the era of man in this world counts a day with God. This argument receives weight from the fact that the conclusion thus reached accords so nearly with the argument from fulfilled prophecies and apparent signs.

There can be no doubt that the sixth day of the world's week is near its close, because all careful students of the chronology of the ages agree that 6,000 years have well-nigh rolled out their cycles. Prof. Totten of Yale has done his best figuring along this line. His "Ominous Exegesis" that has so worthily attracted attention of late, and that impresses me favorably, has fallen under my eye too late to be satisfactorily tested before committing these pages to the printer. In a scientific way he has gone over the entire chronology of the world, keeping his practiced and studious eye on the Scriptures all the while, and concludes that March, 1899, will close the sixth thousand years and usher in the seventh day of the world's week of thousands.

Missing the final date which my own calculation, from altogether different figures, has reached, by less than two years, he agrees with me that during the last seven years before this final date and nearer the beginning of the seventh than the end, our Lord will come and lift all the righteous up to meet him in the air, preparatory to the fiery destruction of the wicked of the whole earth.

In harmony with the argument from fulfilled prophecy and the appearance of the signs, the numerical prophecy of Daniel proclaims the early coming of him who is King of Saints and the rightful Ruler of this world. There can be no question that which is fixed (Dan. 9:25) upon "the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," is the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, which corresponds to our 445 B. C. (Neh. 2:1). A similar command preceded this in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:7-11), but the design was not successfully prosecuted until undertaken thirteen years later by Nehemiah, who, indeed, as the prophecy expressly declared, built the wall in "troubled times" (Dan. 9:25, and Neh. 4:1-23), and finished the temple in "seven weeks [i. e. 49] of years," according to the terms of the prophecy. And this term of forty-nine years, allowed for the building of the temple, beginning in 445 B. C., confirms our choice of the above as the chronological starting point of Daniel's mathematical prediction. This prophecy was given to Daniel by Gabriel about ninety years before the first event suspended upon it.

The First Event

was the "command to restore and to build Jerusalem," which was actually published in Nisan (April) of 445 B. C. The Second Event, the crucifixion of Christ, was fixed by this prophecy 483 years (69 weeks of years), after the date of the first event, or 483 years counting from 445 B. C., which takes us to 38 A. D., as the date of the death of Christ (Dan. 9:26). This harmonizes with the views of leading exponents of our A. D. chronology, that is at least four to six years wrong. This allows for a correction by four and one-half years. So that Messiah was "cut off" in the month of April (Nisan) A. D. 38.

The Third Event, or the "Cleansing of the Sanctuary" (Dan. 8:24), was set for 2300 years from the same prime date, 445 B. C. This takes us to 1856 A. D. And it was on April 11, 1856, that the Crimean Treaty of Peace was signed, securing religious liberty to Jews and Christians in Palestine for the first time since Mohammedanism invested Jerusalem, twelve hundred years before. This was the inchoate cleansing of the sanctuary—or the holy city and temple. The 2300 years of prophecy were completed to a day in this significant event.

The Fourth Event, or the end of this dispensation, when "all these things shall be finished," is fixed 45 years after the last event. Dan. 12:7-12. The 45 years are the excess of the 1335 over 1290. The 1290 are the last of the 2300, and the 1335 are gained by adding 45 to 1290. By adding 45 years to April 11, 1856, we come to April 11, 1901, as the end of this age and the opening of the next.

And now, if the application of this calculation to this last of the four events has been as accurately made as to the former three (which I believe, but would not positively assert) the close of this Gospel Age and opening of the Millennial Age will come on April 11, 1901. A three out of four have come to pass precise on the date indicated by the prophetic number. It is but rational to conclude that the fourth event—the end of this age—will fall on this date. And if this final date—April 11, 1901—be correct, 2345 days before its arrival may be expected an order to rebuild the temple—which, according to the calculation, will be Nov. 8, 1894, or three years from next November. Here is another

Prophetic Double.

It was to be 2,300 and forty-five years from the first command to restore and to build Jerusalem to the end of this age; and 2300 and forty-five days from the second order to rebuild the temple (yet future) to the same concluding date—the end of this age. A fulfillment of the 2345, in years and in days. And if this last come true, then just as it was 483 years from the former order to rebuild the city and temple to the death of Messiah, so it shall be 483 days from the second order to restore the temple (yet to come) to the second coming of Jesus—this time with a sin-offering, as at the first, unto final deliverance. This will be March 5, 1896. Another double—the 483 (69 weeks) fulfilled in years and to be fulfilled in days.

In the midst of the last week of years (or seven years)—the awfully decisive period of this world's history—or 1280 days before the miraculous destruction of Anti-Christ the temple sacrifices shall be abolished by order of the personal Anti-Christ. "He shall confirm a Covenant with many [of the Jews], for one week." [Seven years], and "in the midst of the week," he, who is the prince that shall come, will violate his compact with the Jews.

After the destruction of Anti-Christ and of five-sixths of his Confederacy upon the Mountains of Jerusalem it will be yet 45 days [the excess of 45 over 1290, making 1335] to the glorious end. "Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." All who arrive safe and unharmed to this date participate in all the joys of the Millennial Age.

The author wishes to be understood. He does not affirm that these great final events will certainly and assuredly fall upon the dates respectively assigned them in the above interpretation of the numerals of Daniel. But if no mistake has been made in applying the figures to the last of the four great events suspended upon the calculation, things will come as indicated above; namely, the Order to rebuild the Temple, may be expected to be published Nov. 8, 1894; the Coming of Jesus in the Air for the righteous, dead and living, March 5, 1896; and this Age will give place to the next, or Millennial Age, April 11, 1901. These are the most probable dates.

If these events miss their dates, we will know that our calculation is defective, but our faith in the early coming of Jesus will not be shaken. The truth is, the reader may emphasize these dates more than the writer does. The figures are presented in the honest belief that they are derived from a clear interpretation of God's word, and specially to aid our dull, obtuse faculties to realize more than could be done in view of mere abstract statements that "He is near even at the doors." This is the voice of fulfilled prophecy. This is the announcement of the apparent signs. And with these accord the conclusions reached by interpreting these prophetic figures according to the accepted principles of interpretation that apply to such scriptures.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE SHEPHERD LORD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 20.
John 10: 27, 28. Isa 40: 9, 11.

THE Shepherd Lord is one of the most beautiful of the relations in which Jesus stands to those who love him. It implies so complete a recognition of their need. He is their King, their Redeemer, their Intercessor, their Friend, and in each relation he is precious to them; but it is as their Shepherd that they most love to think of him. Conscious of their helplessness, of their defencelessness, of their weakness and proneness to wander, they are aware of their need of support and protection and strength and guidance. All these are combined in our conception of a shepherd. It is he, especially in Oriental lands, who finds pasture for the sheep, who cares for the weak ones of the flock, searches for the straying ones, and watches over the safety of them all. Jesus must have often seen the shepherds of Palestine with their flocks, and have marked their ways and the qualities required of a good shepherd. He saw that he must be faithful and tender and strong and, knowing the character of the men who would follow him and bear his name, he said of himself, as symbolical of the relation he would sustain to them, "I am the Good Shepherd."

His faithfulness. No quality has been more tried. The highest proof known to man he gave to us while upon earth; He was faithful unto death. He laid down his life for the sheep. Since then, how it has been tried by the sheep themselves! He who led Israel like a flock and bore with their murmuring and repining in the wilderness, who loved them and kept them, though they deserted him, rebelled against him and set up the golden calf saying, "These be thy Gods, O Israel," yet who fed them, guided them and led them to the Land of Promise, was above all, a faithful, covenant-keeping God. Our Shepherd Lord has been similarly tried. His early disciples forsook him and fled; his church in all ages has been unfaithful to him, and is to-day, worldly-minded, indifferent to his love, and careless of his honor and glory. Yet still he watches over it and will ever do so, for when John's prophetic eye saw him in the golden future, it was as a Lamb leading his flock to the rivers of waters of life. (Rev. 7: 17.)

His tenderness. A bruised reed he does not break, smoking flax he does not quench. The trembling sinner, the weak, halting follower, the faint-hearted, the repenting backslider are welcomed by him so gently, so kindly, so tenderly that they find rest to their souls. As one whom his mother comforteth so are they comforted. His yoke is easy and his burden light and none that come to him does he cast out.

His strength. "They shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." As strong against the enemy as he is gentle to the flock. "The wrath of the Lamb" is a stupendous wonder, a combination which fills those who witness it with terror. He is strong to support the weak. We go to him in temptations, which are too potent for us, and we gain power from him to resist. We go to him bound by the chains of evil habit, and he is strong to deliver us; we go to him crushed under the burdens of sin and sorrow and he sustains us. To Paul, in his agony, he says, "my grace is sufficient for thee." It has been proved sufficient in all times by all who have trusted in it. And at the last when we meet the mighty conqueror before whom all must bow, we can say, "I know in whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him." He who triumphed over death and the grave is able to raise us up at the last day.

A FLOURISHING SOCIETY.

THAT the Christian Endeavor movement tends to draw Christians of various denominations into friendly relations has always been believed by its friends. An instance is mentioned in the Church Record of the Columbia Avenue Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

At one of the recent meetings of the Christian Endeavor Society of that church, the President of the C. E. Society of the Messiah Lutheran Church attended, and brought with him more than twenty members of his society. The friendly visit was a decided success. The visitors were cordially welcomed and their President was invited to lead the meeting. The same society has an active Social Committee, an earnest Lookout Committee, and an energetic Relief Committee. The Chairman of the latter, in concluding the latest report, uses words which show that the Committee is working in true Christian Endeavor Spirit and with gratifying results. The report says: "Could you but know the good that is being done through this committee, you would feel doubly blessed; you would see as I have, that even the gift of a cup of cold water, in His name, can prove a blessing not only to the receiver but also to the giver." The work of this committee is an excellent one, going out of the Society as it does, furnishing the necessities of life to worthy families, clothing a little girl so that she could come to Sunday School, and doing such other acts of mercy and love, as come within their reach.

Work of this character has been done in bygone years by individual members of churches and in some cases there have been agencies connected with churches by which such work has been done; but the Christian Endeavor movement has the merit of having extended it, made it a business and organized the workers in practical co-operation.

AN INGENIOUS SOLUTION.

AN interesting exhibition of tact is described by our friend Rev. Henry M. Simpson of Paterson, N. J., in a letter to the Christian Advocate. It was designed to meet a difficulty which has often been raised by critics. As other pastors who have adopted the Christian Endeavor or the Epworth League movement have probably encountered the same difficulty we give Mr. Simpson's solution a wider publicity.

The objection raised was that there were already so many existing societies that if the Epworth League was added with its various departments there would be more machinery than motive power—"more harness than horse." There was sense in this objection and a real basis for it; but the pastor formed the League notwithstanding. The iron-clad pledge was taken, badges secured and members enrolled. Then the pastor suggested the plan of organization. He had a successful Sunday Afternoon Men's Bible Class; that should be the Department of Bible study. A ladies society was already in existence which in parties of two or more visited homes in every section of the city and reported results; that should be the Department of Christian Work. The pastor's Saturday afternoon class of boys and girls might be constituted a Junior League. All that remained was to organize the Department of Mercy and Help and the League was complete. Thus the League added only one new society to the number already existing, while uniting them all in one strong helpful organization bound to work and labor together for the common good.

THE WORK OF A LIFT-UP CIRCLE.

A FAMILY at Lindley, Pa., has reason to bless God for the devotion of a circle of King's Daughters in that place. In September of last year the family was in bad circumstances. The bread-winner of the household was sick and there was no prospect of his getting better. That fell destroyer—Consumption, had laid its hand upon him and marked him for a victim. Worse still, the man had no hope beyond the grave. Dire poverty was added to the trial, so dire that there were days when both father and mother went without food that their children might have a little. It would be difficult to imagine a household more sad and miserable.

But that Fall, a Look-up and Lift-up circle of King's Daughters was organized in Lindley. They were chiefly factory girls whose incomes were the product of their own hard work.

They found out the situation of the afflicted family and with Christ-like compassion they went to the relief of the suffering. They carried them baskets of groceries and other necessities, and continued their visits of ministrations. They spoke to the suffering man and told him that they came "in His name." It set him thinking. Religion in the guise of ministering angels was a new aspect of it to him. He knew that he had no hope of heaven. How better could he learn about the Saviour than by inquiring of these servants of his, who were, like him, going about doing good. He talked with them and learned the way of salvation. Light broke upon his soul and when he died some four weeks ago he was rejoicing in Christ.

The Circle then interested themselves in the widow and children. A benevolent society, connected with one of the churches in the neighborhood, was appealed to, and a grant of twenty-five dollars was obtained. With this a stock of groceries was purchased and the widow's front-room was turned into a store. This is prospering, for the King's Daughters are enlisting the sympathy of the neighbors in the widow's business. The widow herself has been brought to Christ and has therefore a double reason for blessing God for the Christ-like spirit of these young disciples.

Miss C. Graham, from whom these facts were learned, says that the Circle is prospering and has "a good account in figures to send to the Headquarters of the Order." This we can well believe, and if, as is likely, the incident we have described is a fair specimen of the Circle's work, the girls may be assured that angelic messengers have already carried to Headquarters a report with which He in whose name they are working is well pleased.

EPWORTH NATIONAL CONVENTION.

A PROPOSAL for a grand national convention of Epworth Leagues is published by the Epworth Herald of Chicago. The project is to have the Board of Control of the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church issue an invitation to the Epworth Leagues in other Methodist bodies to a united convention. The Epworth Herald appears to favor the project and recommends Chicago as a suitable place of meeting. Difficulties have arisen at the outset. The Christian Advocate of New York reminds the Leagues that the organization has not as yet received the endorsement of a General Conference. It is endorsed by the Board of Bishops and by several powerful societies, each of which is represented on the Board of Control; but it cannot claim that it has the authority of the Church, which only a General Conference can give. This fact precludes it, the Christian Advocate contends, from issuing invitations to the Leagues of other Methodist bodies and suggests the propriety of waiting for even its own National Convention until after the General Conference. The same journal appears to think that the project is not only premature but in a sense ill-advised. It holds that while the Leagues of Methodist bodies other than the Methodist Episcopal rejoice in the common history of Methodism and in its spirit and doctrine they contemplate no organization under a common headship. They are content to wait for Methodist Church union before attempting Methodist young people's union. Denominational conventions should in any case precede a general convention.

THE Johnstown, Pa., Y. M. C. A., has purchased for $9,600 a fine lot for a new building and a convass for funds for the structure is actively going on. A nucleus of the building fund, amounting to $2,000, has already been raised by means of entertainments. A prominent citizen has recently subscribed $1,000, various business houses will contribute the foundation stone, the lumber, the brick and the hardware that will be required for the structure. Young Men's Era.

ACCOMMODATION has been secured nearly a year in advance for some of the delegates to the next International Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies. The Golden Rule says that Mr. Holdrege, the Secretary of the State Union of Illinois, has engaged the Park Avenue Hotel, New York, for the use of the Illinois delegation during the sitting of the Convention. There will certainly be five hundred delegates from that State and possibly nearly a thousand.

We shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

HELP ONE ANOTHER.

LET you and me try, as we journey through life,

Which e'en at its best, has its worry and strife,

With more of the darkness than light,
With far more of cloud than of sunshine bright,

And far more of sadness than song,

To bear well in mind, this advice so trite:

Help one another along,

The path may be rugged, and narrow and steep,

While treacherous pitfalls lie hidden and deep,

And thornbriars 'tangle our feet;

While highly above us the arched bows meet,

And the road seems dreary and long.

Yet e'er may our ears these glad words greet:

Help one another along.

For a hand outstretched may help over a stile,
A kind word whispered enkindle a smile;

E'en a sigh may an echo wake—

Of sympathy true for some dear one's sake,

Adrift in the world's busy throng,

Then ever these words for your motto take:

Help one another along.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells about a Wonderful White Queen and Her Castellated African Capital.

SOME member of the household had been reading about a child, which, straying from its home in the great city, had lost its way, and the young folks were full of sympathy over the incident.

"Yet I have known of creatures very much smaller than any little boy or girl, who lived in a city a thousand times larger in proportion to its inhabitants than New York, and they never lost their way," said Uncle John, jocosely.

The young folks looked incredulous.

"The city I speak of is built in the air, though its foundations rest on the ground," he added. "It has thousands upon thousands of streets; it is full of very small people, some of them workers, others soldiers, while still others occupy royal station, for this strange city has a king, a queen, and a court. When the soldiers march out they are so numerous that you could not count them in a year. The topmost pinnacle of their city is a thousand times higher than the height of a soldier. If the pyramids had been built as high in proportion, they would reach a mile straight upward, instead of being only ninety-six times as high as a man."

"But where is this wonderful city?" cried Tom, while the others watched for the answer with breathless interest.

The traveller held up his hand to check their impatience.

"Let me tell you first a little more as to what it is like. When the builders start, they first erect true columns, surmounted by a roof or dome. They are skilful architects. These columns are made of clay, and are about two feet high and ten inches wide. They are as hard as our burned brick, hollow and very strong. Within each column is a great number of corridors and little apartments, for the accommodation of the workers. Then for the main structure, a proper piece of ground is selected and soon a conical tower is seen springing up, and another and still another. Their number, size and diameter increase till they touch one another and become cemented together. This rises sometimes as high as 20 to 25 feet and has a dome-shaped summit. It is proof against attacks, the walls being nearly two feet thick, yet the whole interior is hollow. On top stand the sentinel soldiers while the miners and builders labor inside."

"It's bees!" exclaimed little Ted. "I knew it! I knew it!"

"Twenty-five of these soldiers scarcely weigh a grain," continued Uncle, as Ted's smile died out in new surprise. "They are crushed by the slightest touch, yet they are armed with weapons that can penetrate anything except stones and metals.

"Now as to the city itself. It is surely the most wonderful city in the whole world. It has streets, public squares, well-filled stores with provisions for common use, foundling hospitals, and a palace for the king and queen, who are not only the rulers, but actually the parents of this great population. Galleries run into galleries and many lead to the domes on top, below which there is a large free space. There are cupolas which they reach by cunning little fairy-like staircases. The royal chamber has the appearance of a miniature cathedral, with massive pillars. The queen, who never goes outdoors, is equal in weight and bulk to thirty thousand of her subjects. The king is not given half the attention she receives from her devoted people, who constantly wait upon her."

"And what is her name, Uncle John?" asked

Milly, who sat resting her dimpled chin on her palm and drinking in every word.

"She is the great white African ant, my dear. She has the largest and most industrious city in the wide world to reign over, yet she never sees it, nor does she walk through its streets. She cannot leave her own room. But all her people, like good subjects, come to visit her. She gives them life and they, in return, render loving duty and care."

"Have you ever visited one of those wonderful cities?"

"I have seen many of them in Africa, principally in Guinea, where the hills or cities of the termites, or white ants, are common. They are found in Loango, Angola, Mandingo, and Benguela, and all along the Slave Coast. Here is a photograph of one of those structures."

"What's in the stores?" inquired Tom. "Anything good to eat?"

"Well, that depends. If you were an African little boy, you would think so. These chambers of clay are filled with provisions that look like the filings of wood, but which are really the gums and juices of plants kept in little masses. They seem to the eye like the sugar that comes about preserved fruits. Some are transparent, some like gum and still others the color of amber. The natives eat the ants, too, and even white men who have tried them declare them an exquisite delicacy."

"I never looked at one of those insect cities without recalling the advice of the Proverb: 'Go to the ant, thou sluggard,' for surely if the wisdom of littles is anywhere demonstrated, it is there. Industry, intelligence, fidelity, affection, courage, and artistic ingenuity are all displayed by these insect people. So you see, little folks, that go where you will, God's tiniest creatures are full of beautiful lessons for us, which it would be well to apply in our daily lives."

How Suffering Develops Character.

QUITE lately we came across two very beautiful fables, illustrative of the development of Christian character by suffering. In a sculptor's studio lay a block of pure marble. And as it lay there, it bemoaned its sad lot, telling the articles that surrounded it how it had suffered. The cruel sculptor, who had received it from the quarry a virgin block weighing a ton, had cut and hammered it for weeks and was now mutilating it at such a rate that the poor diminishing marble was in a great state of trepidation lest nothing should be left of its once noble proportions. It was beyond its ken that such a thing as a beautiful statue could be taken out of it by that sculptor's chisel—a form fair as an angel, that would stand on a pedestal and be worshipped by lovers of art. It could not see the end of the chiseling nor the meaning of the mutilation; nor could it comprehend how, reduced to less than half its weight, it lifts. When the last touch was given, and the poor flute had resigned itself to physical ruin, it was lifted to the lips of the master and there issued forth from the slender pipe so sweet and pure and mellow a note, that the birds stopped their songs to listen. It had received a new life, and it swelled and trilled and sobbed and wept in sympathy with the master. It was no longer a mere piece of wood, unbroken in grain and unweaved by knife or chisel. Its grosser shell had been dropped and it had developed into an instrument with a spirit that could touch the hearts of men. So is the Christian made perfect and fit for the work of his Master through suffering.

GLADSTONE AS A BOY.

THE boy shows forth the man. On one occasion, many years ago, William Gladstone and his sister Mary disputed as to where a certain picture ought to be hung. An old Scotch servant came in with a ladder, and stood irresolute while the argument progressed; but, as Mary would not yield, William gallantly ceased from speech, though unconvinced. The servant then hung up the picture where the young lady ordered, but when he had done this, he crossed the room and hammered a nail into the opposite wall. He was asked why he did this.

"Aweel, miss, that'll do to hang the picture on when ye'll have come round to Master Willie's opinion."

The family generally did come round to William's opinion, for the resources of his tongue-fencing were wonderful, and his father, who admired a clever feint as much as a straight thrust, never failed to encourage him by saying:

"Hear, hear! Well said! Well put, Willie!" If the young debater bore himself well in the encounter. William early learned the value of fair-play even in debate. His Christian training taught him never to take undue advantage of an opponent, and never to misrepresent. If he could not state facts he would say nothing. To these and the other sound religious principles he inherited from his parents, he attributes his success in public life.

A Sweet, Low Voice.

CHILDREN catch cross tones quicker than parrots. Where mother sets the example, you will scarcely hear a pleasant word amongst the children in their plays with each other. Yet the discipline of such a family is always weak and irregular. The children expect just so much scolding before they do anything they are bid, while in many a home where the low firm tone of the mother, or a decided look of the eye, is law, the children never think of disobedience, either in or out of her sight.

O mothers! it is worth a great deal to cultivate that "excellent thing in a woman"—a low, sweet voice. If you are ever so much tired by the mischievous or wilful pranks of the little ones, speak low.

Impatient, angry tones never did the heart good, but plenty of evil. You cannot have the excuse for them that they lighten your burdens any; they make them only ten times heavier. For your own, as well as for your children's sake, learn to speak low. They will remember that tone when your head is under the willows.

Home Companionships.

THERE is nothing more pleasant than to see a family whose members are thoroughly devoted to each other, and who think that home companionship is the most delightful of all companionships. Yet it is well to remember that even congeniality has its dangers. A case comes to mind of a family so self-centered as hardly to think of outsiders. Their affection has become decidedly selfish, and while their home life is almost ideal, it is purchased at the sacrifice of all social life and church work. The mother has not been in another person's house for months.

"I am so happy at home," she says, "that I have no desire to go elsewhere."

That it may be her duty to go does not seem to occur to her. While such a case as this is rare, we constantly see cliques or groups of people who are thoroughly congenial, and who selfishly enjoy each other, to the exclusion of many who would gladly join their ranks, and who are fully worthy of admittance. A closed circle of acquaintance is hardly the Christian idea of brotherhood.

"Thou shalt enjoy again and not alone
Their friendship but the love of every one Of those blest men and women who both were,
And are and shall be till our Judge appear."

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

ROBERT'S definition of riches did not impress his juvenile hearers. They regarded it as a mere quibble. As he admitted that his father was rich they thought he should consider himself as rich and not do anything to curtail the pleasures and privileges of his station.

"What's the use of cutting and drying that way, boy? You'll grow up into a rich young man, and will enjoy yourself, and go to and give dinners, balls, suppers. How will you get on tied up by an old-fogy pledge? Who can have a dinner without wine and toasts and speeches, I say?"

"Then I won't have the dinners. It is not necessary to have them, but I must keep my pledge."

"Don't you suppose temperance people have any dinners, or suppers, or any good time, Cocker?" asked North.

"No. They are a weakly, dull, sickly, short-lived lot."

"Once I knew a man ninety years old," said Cocker, "and he told me that he had lost both of his legs in a railroad accident when he was fifty, and that proves that it is healthy to lose your legs in a railroad accident, and if you want to live to be eighty, you should have your legs cut off."

All the boys who had gathered about laughed.

"See here," said North, "I never saw a merrier, jollier lot of men together than a lot of ministers, and you'll hardly find a minister that drinks. My father is president of an insurance company, and they won't take drinking-men risks. And the rates for habitual abstainers are less than for occasional drinkers. And the assurance societies, you know, have got it all down to a fine point."

"And I know this," said Robert, "the life assurance society called the Sceptic, in London, found that in twenty-four years the average of deaths among teetotalers was only five in a thousand yearly, and that is less than half the average of those who are not total abstainers. So, Cocker, you are all out about the temperance people being short-lived and sickly. Try your wits on another charge."

Sometimes Robert would forget his homesickness and talk in this way, or frolic heartily with the other lads, but too often he withdrew to a window-seat or a corner and sat alone, longing for Lal's Mountain. Nostalgia had seized on him. The daily walks of the boys, two and two in line, a tutor at each end of the procession, were a misery to Robert, whose exercise had been so free of all restraint as he ranged the dear mountain and romped about the mill.

One day in the school session the lads in a class above Robert had a particularly hard problem in measurement. Three failed on it at the board.

"Is there any boy in the school who can do this problem?" asked the teacher, intending to give the algebraists a chance to revive their arithmetical practice.

All the boys looked up, Robert among the rest.

"I can do it," said Robert.

"You! Why, it is 'way at the end of the book."

"Yes. But I have done it."

"Come 'p, and try it," said the teacher.

Robert went up to the board, wrought the example out, and the Principal came in just as he was explaining the problem and its working in admirable style.

"What, Murray, 'way along there so soon?" he said.

"I was along there a year ago," said Robert. "I went all through that arithmetic and reviewed. I worked out every example in it by myself."

"Then you should be in Algebra. You are very wrongly placed in that class in interest. What other books have you been through?"

"I have been through all I am studying in now, only the Latin and French. I was in a more advanced Grammar than the one we use here. And I have been through the High-school Geography."

"Why did you not say so, and not be put back in that way?" demanded the Principal.

"No one asked me. I was told to go in those classes because I did not know any Latin."

"We have graded on the Latin generally, but you are an exception. I will revise your classes to-day, Murray."

Great was Mr. Murray's joy when he found that Robert belonged in a higher class, and was not so backward in his studies as his teacher had supposed.

"I knew he had made a mistake," he said. "I knew my boy better than he did. People should not take so much for granted."

But Mr. Murray himself had been at the root of the teacher's error, for he had assured him that "Robert had been at a very poor school, where they taught absolutely nothing, and that he was far behind other boys of his age in all that he ought to know."

"Now, Robert," said the pleased father, "show them what you can do. Let them see how they have underestimated you. I wish you would try and take one of the prizes. How proud I should be of you if you would take all three! You know, there is the prize for good conduct, one for greatest improvement, one for highest class standing. Each is a gold medal, or its worth, twenty dollars. Of course you would not take the money instead of the medal, but I will tell you what I will do. I will give you twenty dollars for each medal that you win."

An idea entered Robert's mind. If he could get sixty dollars and save his ten dollars a month, why could he not make a payment of one hundred and eighty dollars on that terrible mortgage that hung over the mill? If Mr. Wick would live long enough, or his heir should prove merciful, why, in five or six years, might not Robert free the dear home of its incumbrance? A very fury of money-earning and saving seemed to possess the boy at this thought. The mortgage was ever before his eyes, like some huge, hideous debt of his own. The rich man's son was burdened by poverty and cares of money as sorely as any poor man's son. The letters from the mill contained little hints unconsciously dropped, and spaces where Robert read dire poverty between the lines. "Father was so worried. Pink wished she was grown up, and knew enough to teach a school. She could then give poor father all her salary." It "was so good of Robert to send them those dresses. If he had not they could have had none. Now they looked as well at church as other folks."

"Poor mother seemed low-spirited. Pink had found her crying." "Mr. Wick had had another attack of paralysis—a slight one—but the doctor said the third would carry him off."

"People said Mr. Wick's nephew was in great want of ready money, and was all the time looking up purchasers to take all his Uncle's property as soon as the old man should die."

Reading such news, Robert felt as if he could not wait for the slow progress of his own accumulations. He ventured to ask his father for help.

"Father, would you give me a whole thousand dollars?"

"That depends upon how you would use it, my son."

"I'd buy the mortgage on our mill, and give it up to mother and father Allen."

"Then I certainly should not give you money to use so."

"But, father, they were so good to me—and you used to like them so much."

"That was before I knew how abominably they were treating me. Think, Robert; for years I begged Captain Allen to give you up to me. I told him all my miserable story. I offered him money; all in vain. He refused to give me my own child."

"But, father, he did not know that I was your own child."

"He kept you after he knew. He came very near keeping you altogether, and letting me go off to die alone of a heart-break. He would have been my murderer. I remember against him my month of heartache, I can tell you. I will do nothing for him, I promise you."

This was on a Sunday afternoon. It was the Sunday of the month which Robert spent with his father. They had been at church in the morning, and the Scripture read had been, "I forgave thee all that debt because thou desiredst me. Shouldst thou not have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee?" To Robert it seemed that the words fitted this case exactly. Oh! why did not his father so apply them? He dared not make the application himself, but he said, "It was because he was so fond of me, father."

"Yes, so fond that he was willing to keep you in patches, sleeping in a carpetless room, working along with that one-legged fellow, instead of putting you in your right place where you could have whatever you liked. A queer kind of love, that! And, Robert, I am amazed at you that you do not resent Captain Allen's keeping you parted so long from your own father. It is your duty to feel angry that he caused me so much needless sorrow. I wish you would never speak of those Allens to me again."

Poor Robert! if he could have talked of them, could have seen them now and then; could have known that their goodness was appreciated and their burdens were lifted, he could have borne his separation from them better.

That had been a very happy life at the mill. In spite of poverty it had been a life of love and joy, a true home-life—free, genial, innocent. Robert longed for it, as the exile Switzer longs for his mountains, his herds, the chalet perilously hung on the cliff's side. He had no hope of seeing his dear family until he should be grown up. Oh, weary years! He had no hope of relieving their straits but by the slow progress of his own savings. He took up the burden, but it looked a long and hopeless way which it must be carried. And if he tried to pay the mortgage he could not educate Pink. He began morbidly to measure everything by the money which it cost, and that money by the good it might do to the Allens. On Saturdays his father took him to see what progress was made in the house that was being built for them in West Philadelphia. As Robert saw its large proportions and expensive work he counted up how many times it might have paid the mill mortgage and built a good house for his dear, faithful mother Eliza, and he took but little satisfaction in the new structure.

As his father had assured him that progress at school was the high-road to speedy entrance into business and money-making on his own account, as the three prizes represented at least sixty of the dollars which he wanted, Robert entered into a very fury of application to his studies. He studied early and late. The boys called him a "prig," a "mufi," and all manner of names because he refused to take a share in their sports. Even the tutor said, "Don't overdo this, Murray; you go from one extreme to the other."

Then, as Robert felt that he must save every penny to aid in averting ruin from those who had saved him from misery, he spent nothing on little treats and gifts as the other boys did; he refused to join in testimonials; he put nothing into the outstretched palms of beggars; he took no share in surreptitious suppers called "spreads." The fellows called him a "cad," a "curmudgeon," a "miser." Robert knew that he was at an immense disadvantage; generous in the extreme, he was especially mortified at being considered selfish. All the consolation he had was in adding each month a clean, new ten-dollar bill to his hoard.

Desperate to help those so dear to him, the boy wrote to Deacon Britt, asking if he would not buy the mill mortgage, and take on it, from Robert, ten dollars a month, and whatever else he could pay. He asked the Deacon to keep his letters secret. The Deacon replied that he had not money in hand for this matter, but that he would look out, and try and avert the fore-closure of the mortgage. That little correspondence with the old Deacon was Robert's one venture through the secret post-office at the naughty stationer's.

ocean, the great hotels, the fine cottages, and all the adjuncts of the huge, bustling summer-resort. Still the Allen preoccupation was over Robert's mind. If turned out from the mill, could father 'Zekiel come here, and be a fisherman, or sail pleasure-boats for summer parties? Could mother Eliza come here and keep a boarding-house? He laid all manner of plans, built castles in the air, and down they fell at the breath of common-sense. Father Allen knew nothing of fishing, or of the sea; mother 'Liza had no money to buy furniture for a cottage.

While Robert strolled on the beach and hopelessly revolved such plans as this, Mr. Murray walking by him, too happy to notice the lad's unnatural silence and gloom, built castles also. In truth, Mr. Murray knew little about boys, and Robert's staid, quiet demeanor, the result of grief and care, only made him a more orderly listener, and better companion for his father. Thus Mr. Murray suspected nothing wrong. He planned and planned for Robert's almost heedless ears.

"In the summer, Robert, we will make a trip North. We will go down the St. Lawrence; we will see first Niagara, then the Thousand Islands, then Montreal and Quebec. That will be a trip! How would you like that, my boy?"

"Very well, father, thank you," said Robert, indifferently.

"Perhaps you have heard of some other place that you would prefer. Very likely the boys at school have told you of some of their vacation trips."

"No, sir."

"If there is any place you would prefer, speak up, my son."

"Oh, father! What I should prefer would be to go to Lal's Mountain for vacation. We could go to your nice little home there. Pink, and Bop, and the twins could come and see us every day. I could run in and out of the mill, when I liked. We could have a camp, father, as the tourists and artists did. Oh, I should like that."

Robert held up his head; his brown eyes flamed, a glow lit his cheeks, he held his breath, waiting for his father's answer.

Mr. Murray was simply provoked.

"I certainly shall not go back to Lal's Mountain! We have both had too much of that place, and of those people. It is time you were weaned from them, Robert. You are absolutely foolish about them. I'm ashamed of you! It is proper for you to see more of the world. If you are so fond of the woods, boy," he added, relenting at Robert's miserable face, "we will go up and have all the camp you like in the Adirondacks, where you can catch salmon-trout and shoot venison."

Robert said no more. He hung his head, and kicked little shells out of the shingle. Life offered him nothing worth living for except to lift the mortgage and build his mother a white house. But that was not an undertaking for a sixteen-year-old boy! Presently, seeing some quite pretty shells, he thought Pink would like them. Pink had almost never seen shells. So he stuffed his pockets with the best, and as his desk was always kept supplied with postage-stamps, he packed a box of shells while his father was napping after dinner, and sent them off to Pink. Not that he wished to be secret, or do anything underhand; if it had come into question, he would have freely stated what had become of stamps and shells, but he saw that his father was only vexed at being reminded of the Allens, and that iteration of their claims only increased his hostility. Robert wished he could paint pictures, or write stories, or sing in a choir, or do something to earn money. But he was fully conscious of being no genius—only life's most ordinary paths were open to him. By no lofty tumblings could he reach his goal. He must just plod. He was glad when the vacation was over, and he could go back and plod again.

All this was very unnatural for a lad of Robert's age and constitution. He had been full of fun and frolic, given to vigorous out-of-door exercise. Now his life was all work and work and no play, and it began to tell heavily upon him.

"I think, Mr. Murray," said the proprietor of the hotel where Mr. Murray lived, and where Robert spent one Sunday a month "that school-life does not suit that boy of yours. He is getting very thin."

"He is growing fast," said Mr. Murray.

"And he is pale—and has a worried look and great dark circles under his eyes. I wonder you don't see it. He is a very different boy from what he was when you brought him here last fall. School-life doesn't suit him."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. M., Ottawa, Kan. Where can you find in the Bible the name Dives, and where do you find mention of the Seventh Heaven? I hear them often used by very learned preachers.

We are not aware that either can be found in the Bible.

F. L., Pembina, N. D. What are the necessary qualifications for admission to Mr. Moody's Training School, at Northfield, Mass? What are the course of study, duration and terms, and can students enter at any time?

We would advise you to address Mr. Moody, Northfield, on the subject.

Wesley Rawlings, Rectortown, Va. Was there any rain previous to the Flood, and is there any record of it in the Bible?

There was no rain in the Garden of Eden but only a mist. (See Gen. 2: 6.) It is supposable, however, that there must have been rain between the Fall and the Flood.

L. Sedgely, Cloverdale, Cal. What was the name of the young lad who had the five loaves and two small fishes that Jesus used to perform the miracle by the sea?

The evangelists who report the miracle do not report the lad's name. There is no tradition that we know of which does give it and there were, it would not be reliable.

D. Fletcher, Chester, Vt. Was Christ immersed or sprinkled in the river Jordan?

It is impossible to tell. The words used by the evangelist were that he came "up out of the water," which might be taken as indicating that he had been standing in the water. (See Mark 1: 10.)

ra Smith, Odessa, Ont., Can. Was John the Baptist correct when he said he was not Elias nor that prophet? If so, why did the Saviour say he was the Elias that was to come?

Edersheim in his Life and Times of Christ, which see, interprets the words of the Saviour to mean that John came in the spirit of Elias, not that he was Elias in person.

L. L., Nashville, Tenn. What became of the nations not included in the Covenant made with Abraham and what becomes of the people who do not hear the Word of God preached?

They are in the hands of God. We may be sure that he will deal justly and mercifully with them according to his nature. "He that snew not and did commit things worthy of stripes," said our Lord, (Luke 12: 48) "shall be beaten with few stripes." The matter does not concern us. Our duty is to preach the Gospel to every creature. What becomes of those to whom we do not preach it, God determines.

Young Subscriber, San Francisco, Cal. Is it possible to lead a Christian life when those around seem so indifferent? Must we confess Christ no matter how we are situated?

It is quite possible. Thousands have done so. You will find that an open confession of Christ will help you. It is due to him that you make your stand openly. His command is to confess him before men and of them who are ashamed to do so, he will be ashamed at the last. (Mark 8: 38.) If you believe on him and love him and are trying to follow him, make a public profession of the fact by uniting with a Christian Church and bearing any reproach that may result, as he suffered reproach for you.

E. D., Blue Earth City, Minn., asks advice under these circumstances: He has a desire to serve God, but has very little education, no financial means save those he earns by labor, has his mother depending on his earnings and is troubled by many discouragements.

Are you not justified in accepting these circumstances as indications of God's will concerning you? There must be Christian work to be done in your neighborhood such as Sunday School teaching, speaking personally for Christ to your neighbors and unconverted acquaintances. Do that, and if God needs you or a larger sphere he will open the way. You remistaken if you think, as your letter implies, that there is no way of serving God beside going out as an evangelist.

W. W., Houtzdale, Pa. Did the blessed Jesus die of a broken heart?

That is the general opinion of physicians. It is certain that the crucifixion did not kill him, as that was a death by exhaustion. Jesus was not exhausted, for we are told (Matt. 7: 50) that he "cried with a loud voice" when he yielded up the ghost. The fact that when the soldier pierced his side there came thereout blood and water; (John 19: 34) indicates, according to eminent surgeons, that the heart was ruptured. The most probable way of accounting for the blood and water flowing from a wound in the side of a dead body is that the spear pierced the pericardium—or sac which contains the heart—which would contain blood and water if the heart were ruptured. The severe strain in the garden the night before, the intensity of which was indicated by a sweat of blood, probably prepared the physical nature of Jesus for the sudden collapse, which caused Pilate to "marvel that he was dead already." (Mark 15: 44.)

Wm. Purcell, Passaic, N. J. What evil power tempted the angels to rebel, as the fallen angel, Lucifer, was, I believe, the first evil spirit?

While the Scriptures are explicit as to the apostasy of the angels, of whom Satan was the leader, they tell us scarcely anything as to the time, cause and manner of the fall. (See Rev. 12: 7, 9; 11. Peter 2: 4; Jude 6; Matt. 25: 41; Luke 10: 18; 1. Tim. 3: 6.) From these and other collateral evidence, it would appear that pride and ambition were the causes. There is, however, a wide difference of opinion among theologians on the matter. Milton, treating the subject from a poetic standpoint, declares that ambition was at the root of the angelic rebellion.

W. P., Lonsdale, R. I. Do you think it is right for women to preach? Paul, in the first epistle to Timothy, is decidedly against it. I have heard women preach and know of them doing a great amount of good and I thought they would not be doing right to keep them silent.

Paul evidently did not think it proper for women to speak publicly, but it is unquestionable that much good has been done through the instrumentality of women, and it is not for us to forbid them to preach. There may have been reasons for the prohibition in the time of the Apostles, that do not exist in our own day. Paul was preaching in Oriental countries, where women were not educated as they are here, and where they were in a state of slavish subjection.

Reader, Pisgah P. O., Ky. Why do writers use so many Latin words, when commonly educated people do not understand them?

The too frequent use of Latin or other foreign languages by writers is regarded as pedantic and objectionable. There are, however, many subjects that cannot be treated without recourse to Latin terms. During the darkness of the Middle Ages (from the overthrow of the Roman Empire in the fifth century, to the fifteenth century) all that remained of art, science and literature were preserved to the world in Latin. It is the universal language of the colleges and of science to-day, and the languages of France, Spain, Germany, England and several other nations are largely based on Latin, a knowledge of which is considered essential to a complete education.

D. W., Hillsboro, O. Do you think it is right to hold entertainments in the church, or house dedicated to the worship of God; such as ice cream suppers?

If the entertainments are decorously conducted, there seems to us no impropriety in holding them in the church. There is no special sanctity in the walls themselves. Churches have often been used as hospitals or for other purposes beside the worship of God and there appears no reason why joyous assemblages should not meet there. The church should not be let out for hire to irreligious people to make merry in, but if the congregation meet together to partake of tea or ice-cream or anything else, in Christian fellowship, there is no sacrilege in it.

E. M. B., Westerly, R. I. Who, according to the Word of God, should have the appointing of the pastor for the church? And how should pastors be supported?

There is no definite system of church government laid down explicitly in the Bible or there would be no divergence between many of the denominations. Do you suppose that Methodists in conference would assign ministers to churches and Congregationalists would give the power to individual churches to choose their own ministers, if the Bible explicitly stated in whom the power of choice should lie? Certain broad principles are laid down from which Methodists and others draw one inference and Congregationalists and others draw a different inference, and both are sincere and anxious to do what the Bible directs.

CHRIST, MY ALL.
(For the Christian Herald.)

C

HRIST, the refuge of my soul!
What a blessed, precious thought!
When deep sorrows o'er me roll,
When with danger life is fraught,
To my refuge, Christ I'll flee;
Safely may I hide in Thee.

Christ, my fortress and my tower!
When temptations strong assail,
When dark storm-clouds o'er me lower,
When mine enemies prevail,
To my fortress I will fly;
Naught to fear, when thou art nigh.

Christ, the Lord, my life and light!
When my soul is wrapped in grief,
When around me falls the night.
Of despair and unbelief,
When my trusted watchers flee,
Thou wilt cheer and comfort me.

Christ, my Saviour, strength and hope!
As on couch of pain I lie,
With disease too weak to cope,
Still on Christ I will rely.
Sufficient, thy grace for me;
Strength in weakness, Thou wilt be.

Christ, Redeemer, Friend, most dear!
Oh, the joy, the bliss untold,
As I feel Thy presence near,
Sweet communion with Thee hold.
Thou art all in all to me;
Ever will I trust in Thee.

—A. C.

TWENTY YEARS FOR A SOUL.

A SCOFFING politician recently endeavored to cast ridicule on the cause of missions by calculating the cost in money of the converts, dividing the expenses of the Missionary Societies by the number of native members. A similar reproach was once made to a devoted minister by a grumbling deacon. "See here, sir, you have been living among us for over twenty years now, and I know of only one person who has been converted through your agency." The aged man regarded him for a moment with tears in his eyes, and then with trembling voice enquired, "Do you know of one?" "Yes," was the reply, "I may say that there is one of whom I am sure; but that is all." The clergyman, unmindful of the presence of the man, clasped his hands, and turning his eyes towards heaven, exclaimed, "Lord Jesus, I thank thee for that one, and with thy gracious permission here goes another twenty years' labor for another." Who but God alone can estimate the value of one soul? "He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins."

TALKS ON MARRIAGE.*

Wealth not the Chief Object.

DO you regard wealth, and have an eye single to the amount of property to be gained by your wife? Marrying for money is a thing I hold in such contempt that I hardly dare trust myself to speak of it.

What language can fitly describe the taking a solemn institution of God and making it a mere means of money getting? The man who sells his vote for money betrays the great trust of his citizenship, and forfeits the respect of all right-thinking people. But what is that to a man's marrying for money and thus selling himself? No matter how much wealth a young lady may have, unless you are man enough to give her a decent support, have too much respect for her and for yourself to ask her to become your wife. The most unmanly and the most contemptible thing in this world, so full of baseness, is to sponge one's living out of his wife or her relatives. The man who does this is an Iscariot who betrays his manhood and barter his soul for thirty pieces of silver.

The Wife Should be Worthy of Honor.

You must honor her, and you have no right to marry a woman whose character you do not honor. You would not for a moment think of marrying a vicious woman, and I would to God that women were as careful in this as men. But you may be in danger of wedding a wife who is vain, and selfish, and frivolous, though she may be rich, and beautiful, and accomplished.

The wife is to be a helpmeet for her husband. In choosing a wife, therefore, God requires that you seek a helpmeet for you—a woman who will devote herself to your highest good here and hereafter, and by whose molding influence you will become nobler and purer as the years go on. Men need wives more than women need husbands.

The Wife the Light of the Home.

It is the wife who makes the home. She gives to it its order, comfort and loveliness. And there are in our language no dearer words, as there are in the world no dearer things, than mother, wife and home. To be a helpmeet for her husband, to make him purer, wiser and nobler; to give him intelligent sympathy and to make his home happy, this is the wife's great obligation. A beautiful and accomplished lady may make an elegant parlor ornament, but only a woman with an unselfish heart and a noble soul, sanctified by grace, can make a true wife; who is neither a servant, a plaything, nor a pet, but a helpmeet as God intended her to be. It was said of one of the truest women and best wives in this century: "Nobody could help loving her, and nobody but was the better for doing so. She had the gift of calling forth the best qualities that were in people."

A Character Worthy of Reverence.

What are the qualities which true women honor in men? Truth, bravery, purity and strength—these four—with all they involve. That firm strength of character which is the foundation of all integrity and steadfastness: who honors a weak minded, weak-souled man? That truth to God, his fellow-men and to her, which is the foundation on which her faith in him can rest. That purity, which she has a right to demand, shall be as stainless in him as he demands in her, and that bravery which quails not before danger, and heeds neither men's sneers nor their threats. These are what women reverence in men, and these our youths must strive to possess ere they are worthy to ask noble women to become their wives.

The Family Altar.

First, after marriage, erect a family altar, and pray to God together for his blessing and guidance. The great Robert Hall is credited with saying that family prayer "is the hem and border that prevents wedded life from unraveling;" and the hem should be there when the garment is first made. It can never be so well put on after the unraveling has progressed. Do you say, "Yes, but I never prayed aloud in my life?" Alas, that this should be true; but, if true, immediately after marriage is the best time to begin. It will be easier than ever afterward. Many a man who has not maintained a family altar has bitterly regretted that he did not begin at the commencement of his married life. You may answer, "But I do not know what to say." Think of your needs, remember God's willingness to bless, and ask him to enable you to live rightly. You can at least read a selection of Scripture, and then kneel down and repeat the Lord's prayer.

And to you who have been married for years, and for all this time have had no family altar, I would say, set up one at once. You cannot undo the past, but by God's grace you can take care of the future. You can find no greater help to right living and to domestic happiness.

Two Birds of Paradise.

It has been said that marriage and the Sabbath are the two birds of Paradise that flew over the walls of Eden, and have, through all the centuries, blessed the world by their presence. In these two institutions lies the hope for the future of the world. The family is the one government God established in the earth, and whose perpetuity he decreed. In these days it is fiercely attacked by infidelity, as in the cases of Hume and Strauss; and by false religion, as Mormonism and Mohammedanism. It is also assailed by lax laws concerning divorce. The family is the foundation of all that is good in government and all that is worth saving in society. Nothing is more plainly written in the records of history and on the pages of revelation. A true home is the fairest flower Christianity has planted in the garden of the world; a place where the husband loves and honors the wife, while she reverences him with true devotion, and the children are dutiful and obedient to both, as they are being trained "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." "There is no place like home," we are fond of saying; but, thank God, there is a place which home is like—a place of which our brightest and happiest home on earth is but the shadow and symbol—the home of "Our Father in Heaven."

Love the Great Lubricator.

The longest and closest companionship known to man is that of husband and wife in marriage. Therefore it is of the highest importance that those who walk together "till death do them part" should be agreed. The greater the agreement the more harmony and peace will there be in the home. Some friction there will be, for two human beings will never be in such accord as angels would have; hence the necessity for securing the greatest amount of agreement possible. Love is the great lubricator. Love is essential to the smooth working of mental and moral machinery everywhere, and it is needed most of all in the family. Yet no amount of love between husband and wife can make up for the want of harmony in character and in the purposes of life. In choosing a companion regard must be paid chiefly to these points, and woe to who ever neglects them.

"Can two walk together except they be agreed?" Losing sight of all human relationships, which, at longest, will vanish in a few years, fix your thoughts on the great question: How can you walk with God? If you do not, if you walk contrary to him, he has said he will walk contrary to you. Think what that means.

Artists use Ivory Soap for a special purpose. All paintings get dusty and the colors seem to lose their brilliancy and tone. They should be restored with Ivory Soap, water and a soft brush. Scrub carefully, rub off first with a wet flannel and then with a dry one, and you will be surprised at the improvement. The colors reappear in all their original, fresh beauty.

Never experiment with ordinary soap; the painting may be ruined. Ivory is absolutely safe to use, as Prof. Cornwall, of Princeton, says, "Ivory Soap is very well made and can not injure anything."

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

THE ACT OF PRAYER.

The act of prayer includes three separate forms of activity; an exercise of the understanding, an exercise of the affections, and an exercise of will. And first, to pray is to direct the understanding to the highest object to which it can be addressed. He who prays with the understanding engages in an educating exercise more edifying and instructive than all the studies of the schools. Next, to pray is to put the affections in motion by opening the heart; and the affections are ennobled by their worship of the king in his beauty, and exalted by their vision of the land that is very far off. As a man's heart thrills in the presence of his friend, so prayer, which lifts us to the presence of infinite love and loveliness, expands the heart and fills the soul with rapture; and as love transforms and beautifies, so the rapture of prayer does not merely fill the soul with tenderness and joy, but irradiates the very countenance and lends a new grace to the outer man. Lastly, to pray is to put the will in motion. That sovereign power which we call the will enters into the very action of prayer. It is the will which presses the petition. It is the will which strives against its own sluggishness and encounters the antagonism of passion. This matter of prayer, believe me, is no child's play; it demands all our energy of mind and heart and will. Therefore, we ought to learn to pray while we have the strength and nerve for it. When sin shall have smitten the spirit into nerveless decrepitude, it may be too late. It may be too late when death shall have begun to enfeeble the mind and palsify the heart. The hour of death is an ill time to begin to spread the eagle pinions of prayer. Sad is the condition of that man, who, enfeebled by suffering and about to enter the presence of God, knows not how to pray.

CONVERTS IN UGANDA.

SPECIAL interest attaches to missionary effort in Uganda on account of its being the scene of the martyrdom of Bishop Hannington six years ago, and of the cruel persecution of native Christians. A very cheerful letter has now come from that land from Rev. F. C. Smith, who is laboring there. He reports the kindly feeling of the King—the very man who killed the Bishop and speaks hopefully of the interest of the people. “One chief,” he says, “now wishes to be taught, and so twice I have sent a teacher who has slept at his place for one or two nights, and he is quickly learning to read. The boy referred to in my letter is now afraid to go home, for when he last went his father said, as he had begun to read, if he came back again, he would kill him. This is no mere threat, they assure me, so his home is henceforth with us, for he will not go back again.”

“We have a piece of pretty, good, healthy ground, and near plenty of water. This he (the Wakoli) gave me last Saturday, and sent his chief man to show me the boundaries clearly. Upon this he built me a good house, and it is exactly the same as the natives themselves live in. Near to this I have had permission to use a vacant piece of ground, and have myself had built upon it a substantial good kitchen, a good “summer-house,” deliciously cool, and now I am putting up a good house for breeding fowls, so that eggs and agreeable meat may be at hand. You must understand the Wakoli gave us willingly the bare site for the houses when I came with Gordon, but no plot; now we have both, and now we only want workers to come up with all speed, and go on with the work that God so plainly promises to bless.”

A HINDOO TRADITION.

In a recent letter from Calcutta the Rev. H. Whitehead of Bengal says: “Before I leave this city for my own field I should like to tell you of a remarkable tradition I have heard during my visit here. On February 8th last there was a great Hindoo festival. It occurs at rare intervals, only when certain conjunctions of particular planets happen to fall on Sunday at this season of the year. The last one took place twenty-six years ago. On this festival all the Hindoos who can possibly do so try to bathe in the Ganges, whose waters, at all times sacred, then are supposed to acquire an extraordinary sanctity, so that they do not only wash away the sins of all who bathe in the river, but also release from torments the souls of three millions of generations of ancestors. So on that Sunday the pilgrims flocked into Calcutta by the thousands. It was calculated that there was as many as 100,000 in the city. And during the whole of Sunday the river bank presented an extraordinary spectacle, being simply packed with men and women going through the various ceremonies with the utmost devotion. But what gave a special significance to this particular festival was the fact that there is an ancient tradition which says that ‘before the next similar festival the waters of the Ganges will have lost their sanctity.’ If, therefore, as some of the Hindoo pundits have said, the sanctity of the Ganges will be a thing of the past in about ten years, we may see a great blow dealt from within at Hindooism as a popular system of religion within the next ten years. A Hindoo pundit (learned man) was asked the other day by a friend of mine what the Hindoos would do when they could no longer wash away their sins in the Ganges. His answer was, ‘Oh! then we will pray to God like the Christians.’ God grant that it may be so.”

A CONVERT'S FAITHFULNESS.

CABLE messages from Calcutta report a more discontented condition of the people as existing there than at any time since the mutiny in 1857. This is due to the fact that the Government, at the suggestion of the missionaries, is endeavoring to break up the cruel custom of child-marriage by raising the age at which a girl may consent to be married, from twelve to fourteen years. Great indignation has been manifested by the people against the Christians both foreign and native, as they rightly conjecture that the innovation originated with them. A missionary writes: “One of our students, a married man of about thirty years of age, and the very meekest and mildest man imaginable, walked down to the Maidan and came across a crowd who had been discussing the change. Some of his old Hindu acquaintances (he is a convert) happened to see him, and came up and began to taunt him with being a Christian. Some rascals in the crowd then suddenly cried out, ‘A Christian, kill him, crucify him!’ and in a moment, before he could escape, they fell upon him and knocked him down. They then told him to renounce Christianity and say he was a Hindoo. He stood firm, however, and replied, ‘I cannot do that, I am a Christian.’ Then they all rushed upon him again and kicked him and beat him. He told me afterwards that he quite despaired of his life, and was kicked till he became insensible. However, fortunately there were two Sikhs close by who came up and rescued him and took him off to the house of a Hindu gentleman, where he remained insensible for three hours. Happily no permanent injury has been done and he is now all right again. But I think that his firmness, under what actually was to him the immediate prospect of death, reflects the highest credit on him.”

LAZARUS AT THE GATE.

The Beneficent Work being Done by the New York Skin and Cancer Hospital.

“THERE was a certain beggar named Lazarus,” said our Lord in that most thrilling of all his parables, “who was laid at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man’s table.” Whether his desire was gratified we are not told. The only attention paid to him that is recorded, he received from the dogs. Lazarus is at our gates to-day in the shape of numberless afflicted mortals, some of whom could be cured by the skilled hands of the surgeon, but the majority are without hope in this life, and are only waiting until death mercifully ends their sufferings. What is our duty toward them? Can we afford to be indifferent? Many of the sufferers are in abject poverty. The excruciating pains which tear their bodies might be mitigated in many ways could their friends afford the expense. The tedium of the weary days and nights might be relieved by pleasant cheerful surroundings, books, pictures or flowers, but in many cases the sufferer must lie almost uncared for, in a room ill ventilated and bare of all luxuries. We boast of the national wealth and prosperity, and on all hands there is a prodigality of luxury and display; shall it be said of us that Lazarus who lies at our gate full of sores does not get the crumbs that fall from the table?

For many years the reproach might justly have been brought against us. Men, women and children were stricken with the terrible cancer, or the skin-disease scarcely less loathsome or hopeless, bore their affliction with what fortitude they could, and passed away without regard from Dives and without any effort on his part to have them cured; or if incurable to have them waited on and cared for during their sorrowful journey to the grave. In 1882, there were in New York alone no less than 731 deaths from cancer, and in the fourteen years immediately preceding that year 6,843 died of that disease in the city. There was no public place where they could be treated, nor any institution where such as were incurable could be nursed and skillfully tended. But in 1882, a few noble-minded Christlike men and women were moved with compassion for these pitiable sufferers and secured a small home in which, at least, a few could gain some relief. It contained accommodation for only twenty-nine patients, not half a tithe of those who were suffering from the disease in the city at the time; but it was an effort, though a small one, in the right direction. The house, which is in Thirty-fourth Street, New York, was economically furnished, subscriptions were raised to provide nurses, resident surgeons and the medical appliances necessary. Eminent physicians were interested, who with the generous self-sacrifice more common in their profession than in any other, undertook to serve gratuitously as consulting physicians, to give up a portion of their valuable time to examining and treating cases of the special varieties to which they had devoted special study. Prominent among these was Dr. Duncan Bulkley, the world-renowned dermatologist, whose portrait appears on this page, and who has been from the beginning one of the most devoted and useful of the medical friends of the hospital.

The value of the institution was speedily realized and it appeared in unexpected ways. Some of the patients who had been informed by busy practitioners, after hasty examination, that they were afflicted with cancer, learned with glad surprise from these skilled specialists, that their disease was not cancer, but some variety of skin disease so closely resembling it as to deceive any but a trained and practiced eye. Medical treatment without operation could cure them, and they were cured. The physicians, too, became more skillful in treating cancer itself, and discovered new curative agents and new ways of relieving the disease. The one grievous and distressing feature of the institution was its incapacity to meet the demand. The twenty-nine beds were continuously occupied, and the operations were performed in a small hall-room, so that no room suitable for the occupation of a patient might be withdrawn from that use. But day by day patients came begging for admission, whom the surgeons sorrowfully turned away, though they knew that if there had been room in the institution to receive them they might have been cured or, at least, relieved. Not less distressing was it to refuse admission to the incurable cases, which no hospital would receive, and which were so sorely in need of such mitigation of suffering as science could give.

In the presence of such an extent of pain and misery which the existence of the institution revealed, the necessity for a new and securing another in the city, a site in the country should be acquired. His reasons were that it would be less costly, would be more healthy for the patients, and would give an opportunity for the erection of convenient, detached pavilions, so that the patients could be classified according to their disease and the various stages it had reached. His suggestion was accepted and developed into the present institution on Fordham Heights, which was opened in February, 1886.

The site contains about seventeen acres in a most salubrious neighborhood at an elevation of nearly two hundred feet above the level of the Harlem River. It contains a large central stone building, a picture of which is here given. This is used for administrative purposes and the general purposes of the hospital. The unique and most successful feature of the institution is the seven wooden pavilions picturesquely grouped around the central building. In these the patients are accommodated. There, trained nurses minister to their wants, the resident Medical Superintendent, Dr. Amos C. Lewis, visits them frequently, and Dr. Bulkley and the other physicians come periodically to advise and prescribe. Two of these Pavilion and endow a bed in perpetuity. Mr. John D. Rockefeller gave $2,500. The same amount was given by Mr. John D. Archbold, the President of the institution, and $1,403 came from the Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections. But for the current expenses of the work the funds have come in small sums from those of the public who know how noble is the mission the hospital is engaged in, and how large are its needs. Some of these gifts are in stores, clothing and food. Every Friday a hospital wagon calls at the residence of Mrs. George Lewis, 411 Fifth Avenue, and carries away the fruit, flowers and delicacies which have been sent there for the patients. Thence the wagon goes to 12 West 36th Street, the residence of Mrs. Richard Irwin, who receives donations of linen, clothing, books and papers with which it goes back freighted to the sufferers at Fordham. Several Tens of King’s Daughters sew for the institution and contribute to its stores and funds. Contributions of small amounts come from long distances, for patients from every State in the Union have been received and treated there and have spread abroad its fame.

But the work of the Hospital and the demands for its help grow faster than its resources. Dr. Lewis, the Medical Superintendent says that although every bed is occupied in the original institution in Thirty-fourth Street, which is now used as a receiving hospital for patients whose cases have not been pronounced incurable, and although the pavilions at Fordham are filled, if there were a hundred more beds available they would be speedily occupied by incurable patients. Especially help is needed for the maintenance of the patients. Mrs. Elsefer of the New York Flower and Fruit Mission, who takes an active interest in the Hospital says, “It is now in especial need of sympathy and support. It never dismisses its chronic cases however poor they are, and new patients are constantly coming. It needs sheets for the beds, pillow-cases, night-gowns and blankets. Old linen (which is not purchasable) is at all times required. Contributions in any of these departments or in money are sorely needed.” They may be sent direct to the Hospitals at Fordham Heights, N. Y., and 243 East 34th Street, New York, or to the Secretary Mr. Frederick Haas, 60 East Twenty-first Street, New York. Work of this kind will commend itself to every follower of the Master. It has his special blessing, a blessing which includes also the helpers. It belongs to the category of those whom he especially commended to our care—the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind and to every one of his followers who would relieve their wants he said: “They cannot recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.”

further effort to relieve it lay like a burden on the hearts of the noble men and women who were supporting the hospital. At the first annual meeting, Dr. Bulkley, having reported that “the accommodations were totally inadequate for the needs of the service,” went on to say: “The object of our thought is the means of extending the capacity and efficiency of the hospital, that it may approach somewhat to the size and requirements demanded by the large number of sufferers who call for our sympathy and aid.” He advised that instead of enlarging their present building or pavilions are shown in the accompanying illustration. On fine days, such of the patients as can leave their beds, are drawn in invalid chairs about the grounds to be cheered and invigorated by the bracing air. Everyone who visits the place is delighted with the excellent arrangements, and is impressed with the gratitude of the patients for the benefits they receive. The greater part of them are of the class most in need of such aid. For their board, nursing and medical attendance they can pay nothing, but their treatment is the same as that of the few who contribute in

KINDNESS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon preached at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday morning, Sept. 13, 1891, from the Text: "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness." Acts 28 : 2.

HERE we are on the Island of Malta, another name for Melita. This island, which has always been an important commercial centre, belonging at different times to Phœnicia, to Greece, to Rome, to Arabia, to Spain, to France, now belongs to England. The area of the island is about one hundred square miles. It is in the Mediterranean Sea, and of such clarity of atmosphere that Mt. Etna, one hundred and thirty miles away, can be distinctly seen. The island is gloriously memorable, because the Knights of Malta for a long while ruled there, but most famous because of the apostolic shipwreck. The bestormed vessel on which Paul sailed had "laid to" on the starboard tack, and the wind was blowing east-northeast and the vessel, drifting probably a mile and a half an hour, she struck at what is now called St. Paul's Bay. Practical sailors have taken up the Bible account and decided beyond controversy the place of the shipwreck. But the island which has so rough a coast is for the most part a garden. Richest fruits and a profusion of honey characterized it in Paul's time as well as now. The finest oranges, figs and olives grow there.

When Paul and his comrades crawled up on the beach, saturated, and hungry from long abstinence from food, and chilled to the bone, the islanders, though called barbarians, because they could not speak Greek, opened their doors to the shipwrecked unfortunates. Everything had gone to the bottom of the deep, and the barefooted, bareheaded apostle and ship's crew were in a condition to appreciate hospitality. About twenty-five such men a few seasons ago I found in the life station near Easthampton, Long Island. They had got ashore in the night from the sea, and not a hat or shoe had they left. They found out, as Paul and his fellow voyagers found out, that the sea is the roughest of all robbers. My text finds the ship's crew ashore on Malta, and around a hot fire drying themselves, and with the best provision the islanders can offer them. And they go into government quarters for three days to recuperate, Publius, the ruler, inviting them, although he had severe sickness in the house at that time, his father down with dysentery and typhoid fever. Yea, for three months they stayed on the island watching for a ship, and putting the hospitalities of the islanders to a severe test. But it endured the test satisfactorily, and it is recorded for all the ages of time and eternity to read and hear in regard to the inhabitants of Malta: "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness."

Kindness! What a great word that is. It would take a reed as long as that which the apocalyptic angel used to measure heaven to tell the length, the breadth, the height of that munificent word. It is a favorite Bible word, and it is early launched in the book of Genesis, caught up in the book of Joshua, embraced in the book of Ruth, sworn by in the book of Samuel, crowned in the book of Psalms, and enthroned in many places in the new Testament. Kindness! A word no more gentle than mighty. I expect it will wrestle me down before I get through with it. It is strong enough to throw an archangel. But it will be well for us to stand around it, and warm ourselves by its glow as Paul and his fellow voyagers stood around the fire on the Island of Malta, where the Maltese made themselves immortal in my text by the way they treated these victims of the sea. "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness."

Kindness! All definitions of that multipotent word break down half way. You say it is clemency, benignity, generosity; it is made up of good wishes, it is an expression of beneficence, it is a contribution to the happiness of others. Some one else says: "Why, I can give you a definition of kindness: it is sunshine of the soul. It is affection perennial, it is a climacteric grace, it is the combination of all graces. It is compassion. It is the perfection of gentle manliness and womanliness." Are you all through? You have made a dead failure in your definition. It cannot be defined. But we all know what it is, for we all felt its power. Some of you may have felt it as Paul felt it, on some coast of rock as the ship went to pieces, but more of us have again and again in some awful stress of life had either from earth or heaven hands stretched out, which "showed us no little kindness."

There is kindness of disposition, kindness of word, kindness of act, and there is Jesus Christ the impersonation of all of them. Kindness! You cannot affect it, you cannot play it as a part, you cannot enact it, you cannot dramatize it. By the grace of God you must have it inside you, an everlasting summer, or rather a combination of June and October, the geniality of the one and the tonic of the other. It cannot dwell with arrogance or spite or revenge or malevolence. At its first appearance in the soul all these Amalekites and Gergishites and Hittites and Jebusites must quit, and quit forever. Kindness wishes everybody well, every man well, every woman well, every child well, every bird well, every horse well, every dog well, every cat well. Give this spirit full swing and you would have no more need of societies for prevention of cruelty to animals, no more need of protective sewing woman's association, and it would dull every sword until it would not cut skin deep, and unwhet every battery till it could not roll, and make gunpowder of no more use in the world except for rock blasting or pyrotechnic celebration. Kindness is a spirit divinely implanted, and in answer to prayer, and then to be sedulously cultivated until it fills all the nature with a perfume richer and more pungent than mignonette, and, as if you put a tuft of that aromatic beauty behind the clock on the mantel, or in some corner where nobody can see it, you find people walking about your room looking this way and that, and you ask them, "What are you looking for?" and they answer, "Where is that flower?"—So if one has in his soul this infinite sweetness of disposition, its perfume will whelm everything.

But are you waiting and hoping for some one to be bankrupted or exposed, or discomfited, or in some way overthrown, then kindness has not taken possession of your nature. You are wrecked on a Malta where there are no oranges. You are entertaining a guest so unlike kindness that kindness will not come and dwell under the same roof. The most exhausting and unhealthy and ruinous feeling on earth is a revengeful spirit or retaliating spirit, as I know by experience, for I have tried it for five or ten minutes at a time. When some mean thing has been done me or said about me, I have felt "I will pay him in his own coin. I will show him up. The ingrate! The traitor! The liar! The villain!" But five or ten minutes of the feeling has been so unnerving and exhausting I have abandoned it, and I cannot understand how people can go about torturing themselves five or ten or twenty years, trying to get even with somebody. The only way you will ever triumph over your enemies is by forgiving them and wishing them all good and no evil. As malevolence is the most uneasy and profitless and dangerous feeling, kindness is the most healthful and delightful. And this is not an abstraction. As I have tried a little of the retaliatory feeling, so I have tried a little of the forgiving. I do not want to leave this world until I have taken vengeance upon every man that ever did me a wrong, by doing him a kindness. In most of such cases I have already succeeded, but there are a few malignants whom I am yet pursuing and I shall not be content until I have in some wise helped them or benefited them or blessed them. Let us all pray for this spirit of kindness.

PAUL'S SHIPWRECK.

It will settle a thousand questions. It will change the phase of everything. It will mellow through and through our entire nature. It will transform a lifetime. It is not a feeling gotten up for occasions, but perennial. That is the reason I like petunias better than morning-glories. They look very much alike, and if I should put in your hand a petunia and a morning-glory you could hardly tell which is the petunia and which the morning-glory; but the morning-glory blooms only a few hours and then shuts up for the day, while the petunia is in as wide-spread a glow at twelve o'clock at noon and six o'clock in the evening as at sunrise. And this grace of kindness is not spasmodic, is not intermittent, is not for a little while, but it irradiates the whole nature, all through and clear on till the sunset of our earthly existence. Kindness! I am resolved to get it. Are you resolved to get it? It does not come by hap-hazard, but through culture under the Divine help. Thistles grow without culture. Rocky Mountain sage grass grows without culture. Mullen stalks grow without culture. But that great red rose in the conservatory, its leaves packed on leaves, deep-dyed as though it had been obliged to fight for its beauty and it were still reeking with the carnage of the battle, that rose needed to be cultured and through long years its floral ancestors were cultured. Oh, God! implant kindness in all our souls, and then give us grace to watch it, to enrich it, to develop it!

The King of Prussia had presented to him by the Empress of Russia the root of a rare flower, and it was put in the royal gardens on an island, and the head gardener, Herr Fintelmann, was told to watch it. And one day it put forth its glory. Three days of every week the people were admitted to these gardens, and a young man, probably not realizing what a wrong thing he was doing, plucked this flower and put it in his button-hole, and the gardener arrested him as he was crossing at the ferry, and asked the king to throw open no more his gardens to the public. The King replied, "Shall I deny to the thousands of good people of my country the privilege of seeing this garden because one visitor has done wrong? No, let them come and see the beautiful grounds." And when the gardener wished to give the King the name of the offender who had taken the royal flower, he said, "No, my memory is very tenacious and I do not want to have in my mind the name of the offender, lest it should hinder me granting him a favor some other time." Now, I want you to know that kindness is a royal flower and blessed be God, the King of mercy and grace, that by a divine gift and not by purloining, we may pluck this royal flower and not wear it on the outside of our nature but wear it in our soul and wear it forever, its radiance and aroma not more wonderful for time than wonderful for eternity.

Still further, I must speak of kindness of word. When you meet anyone do you say a pleasant thing or an unpleasant? Do you tell him of agreeable things you have heard about him, or the disagreeable? When he leaves you, does he feel better or does he feel worse? Oh, the power of the tongue for the production of happiness or misery! One would think from the way the tongue is caged in we might take the hint that it has a dangerous power. First it is chained to the back part of the mouth by strong muscle. Then it is surrounded by the teeth of the lower jaw, so many ivory bars; and then by the teeth of the upper jaw, more ivory bars. Then outside of all are the two lips with the power of compression and arrest. And yet notwithstanding these four imprisonments or limitations, how many take no hint in regard to the dangerous power of the tongue, and the results are laceration, scarification, and damnation. There are those if they know a good thing about you and a bad thing, will mention the bad thing and act as though they had never heard the good thing. Now there are two sides to almost every one's character, and we have the choice of overhauling the virtue or the vice. We can greet Paul and the ship's crew as they come up the beach of Malta, with the words, "What a sorry looking set you are! How little of navigation you must know to run on these rocks! Didn't you know better than to put out on the Mediterranean this wintry month! It was not much of a ship anyhow, or it would not have gone to pieces so soon as that. Well, what do you want? We have hard enough work to make a living for ourselves, without having thrust on us two hundred and seventy-six ragamuffins." Not so said the Maltese. I think they said: "Come in! Sit down by the fire and warm yourselves! Glad that you all got off with your lives. Make yourselves at home. You are welcome to all we have until some ship comes in sight and you resume your voyage. Here, let me put a bandage on your forehead, for that is an ugly gash you got from the floating timbers, and here is a man with a broken arm. We will have a doctor come to attend to this fracture." And though for three months the kindness went on, we have but little more than this brief record: "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness."

Oh! say the cordial thing! Say the useful thing! Say the hospitable thing! Say the helpful thing! Say the Christ-like thing! Say the kind thing! I admit that this is easier for some temperaments than for others. Some are born pessi-

mists, and some are born optimists, and that demonstrates itself all through everything. It is a cloudy morning. You meet a pessimist and you say: "What weather to-day?" He answers, "It's going to storm," and umbrella under arm and a water-proof overcoat show that he is honest in that utterance. On the same block, a minute after, you meet an optimist, and you say: "What weather to-day?" "Good weather; this is only a fog and will soon scatter." The absence of umbrella and absence of water-proof overcoat show it is an honest utterance. On your way at noon to luncheon you meet an optimistic merchant and you say: "What do you think of the commercial prospects?" and he says, "Glorious. Great crops must bring great business. We are going to have such an Autumn and Winter of prosperity as we have never seen." On your way back to your store you meet a pessimistic merchant. "What do you think of the commercial prospects?" you ask. And he answers: "Well, I don't know. So much grain will surfeit the country. Farmers have more bushels but less prices, and the grain gamblers will get their fist in. There is the McKinley bill; and the hay crop is short in some places, and in the Southern part of Wisconsin they had a hail storm and our business is as dull as it ever was." You will find the same difference in judgment of character. A man of good reputation is assailed and charged with some evil deed. At the first story the pessimist will believe in guilt. "The papers said so, and that's enough. Down with him!" The optimist will say: "I don't believe a word of it. I don't think that a man that has been as useful and seemingly honest for twenty years could have got off track like that. There are two sides to this story and I will wait to hear the other side before I condemn him." My hearer, if you are by nature a pessimist, make a special effort by the grace of God to extirpate the dolorous and the hypercritical from your disposition. Believe nothing against anybody until the wrong is established by at least two witnesses of integrity. And if guilt be proven find out the extenuating circumstances if there are any. Kindness! Let us morning, noon and night pray for it until we get it. When you can speak a good word for some one, speak it. If you can conscientiously give letter of commendation, give it. Watch for opportunities for doing good fifty years after you are dead. All my life has been affected by the letter of introduction that the Rev. Dr. Van Vranken, of New Brunswick Theological Seminary, wrote for me, a boy under him, when I was seeking a settlement in which to preach the Gospel. That letter gave me my first pulpit. Dr. Van Vranken has been dead more than thirty years, yet I feel the touch of that magnificent old professor. Strange sensation was it when I received a kind message from Rev. Thomas Guard of Baltimore, the great Methodist orator, six weeks after his death. By way of the eternal world? Oh, no, by way of this world. I did not meet the friend to whom he gave the message until nearly two months after Thomas Guard had ascended. So you can start a word about some one that will be on its travels and vigorous long after the funeral psalm has been sung at your obsequies. Kindness! Why if fifty men all aglow with it should walk through the lost world, methinks they would almost abolish perdition.

Furthermore there is kindness of action. That is what Joseph showed to his outrageous brothers. That is what David showed to Mephibosheth for his father Jonathan's sake. That is what Onesiphorus showed to Paul in the Roman penitentiary. That is what William Cowper recognized when he said he would not trust a man who would with his foot needlessly crush a worm. That is what our assassinated President Lincoln demonstrated when his private Secretary found him in the Capitol grounds trying to get a bird back to the nest from which it had fallen, and which quality the illustrious man exhibited years before when having with some lawyers in the carriage on the way to Court passed on the road a swine fast in the mire, after awhile cried to his horses "Ho!" and said to the gentlemen, "I must go back and help that hog out of the mire." And he did go back, and put on solid ground that most uninteresting quadruped. That was the spirit that was manifested by my departed friend Hon. Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia, (and lovelier man never exchanged earth for heaven), when at Washington. A senator's wife who told my wife of the circumstances, said to him: "Mr. Stephens, come and see my dead canary bird." And he answered, "No, I could not look at the poor thing without crying." That is the spirit that Grant showed when at the surrender at Appomattox he said to General Lee, "As many of your soldiers are farmers and will need the horses and mules to raise the crops to keep their families from suffering next winter, let each Confederate who can claim a horse or a mule take it along with him." That is the spirit which last night ten thousand mothers showed to their sick children coming to give the drink at the twentieth call as cheerfully and as tenderly as at the first call. Suppose all this assemblage, and all to whom these words shall come by printer's type, should resolve to make kindness an overarching, undergirding and all-pervading principle of their life, and then carry out the resolution, why, in six months the whole earth would feel it. People would say: "What is the matter? It seems to me that the world is getting to be a better place to live in. Why, life after all is worth living. Why, there is Shylock, my neighbor, has withdrawn his lawsuit of foreclosure against that man, and because he has had so much sickness in his family, he is going to have the house for one year rent free. There is an old lawyer in that young lawyer's office, and do you know what he has gone in there for? Why, he is helping fix up a case which is too big for the young man to handle, and the white-haired attorney is hunting up previous decisions, and making out a brief for the boy. Do you know that a strange thing has taken place in the pulpit and all the old ministers are helping the young ministers, and all the old doctors are helping the young doctors, and the farmers are assisting each other in gathering the harvest, and for that farmer who is sick the neighbors have made a 'bee,' as they call it, and they have all turned in to help him get his crops into the garner. And they tell me that the older and more skilful reporters who have permanent positions on papers are helping the young fellows who are just beginning to try and don't know exactly how to do it. And after a few erasures and interpolations on the reporter's pad they say: 'Now here is a readable account of that tragedy; hand it in and I am sure the managing editor will take it.' And I heard this morning of a poor old man whose three children were in hot debate as to who should take care of him in his declining days. The oldest son declared it was his right because he was the oldest, and the youngest son said it was his right because he was the youngest, and Mary said it was her right because she better understood father's vertigo, and rheumatism, and poor spells, and knew better how to nurse him, and the only way the difficulty could be settled was by the old man's promise that he would divide the year into three parts, and spend a third of his time with each one of them. And neighboring stores in the same line of goods on the same block are acting kindly to each other. It seems to me that those words of Isaiah are being fulfilled when he says, 'The carpenter encouraged the goldsmith, and he that smoothes with the hammer, him that smote the anvil, saying, it is ready for the soldering.' What is the matter? It seems to me our old world is picking up. Why, the millennium must be coming in. Kindness has gotten the victory."

My hearers, you know and I know we are far from that state of things. But why not inaugurate a new dispensation of geniality. If we cannot yet have a millennium on a large scale, let us have it on a small scale, and under our own vestments. Kindness! If this world is ever brought to God that is the thing that will do it. You cannot fret the world up although you may fret the world down. You cannot scold it into excellence or reformation or godliness.

The East wind and the West wind were one day talking with each other, and the East wind said to the West wind: "Don't you wish you had my power? Why, when I start they hail me by storm signals all along the coast. I can twist off a ship's mast as easily as a cow's hoof cracks an alder. With one sweep of my wing, I have strewn the coast from Newfoundland to Key West with parted ship-timber. I can lift and have lifted the Atlantic Ocean. I am the terror of all invalidism, and to fight me back forests must be cut down for fires, and the mines of continents are called on to feed the furnaces. Under my breath the nations crouch into sepulchres. Don't you wish you had my power?" said the East wind. The West wind made no answer, but started on its mission, coming somewhere out of the rosy bowers of the sky, and all the rivers and lakes and seas smiled at its coming. The gardens bloomed, and the orchards ripened, and the wheat fields turned their silver into gold, and health clapped its hands, and joy shouted from the hill tops, and the nations lifted their foreheads into the light, and the earth had a doxology for the sky, and the sky an anthem for the earth, and the warmth and the sparkle and the gladness and the foliage, and the flowers, and the fruits, and the beauty, and the life, were the only answer the West wind made to the insolence of the East wind's interrogation.

Kindness to all! Surely it ought not to be a difficult grace to culture when we see towering above the centuries such an example that one glimpse of it ought to melt and transform all nations. Kindness brought our Lord from Heaven. Kindness to miscreants, kindness to persecutors, kindness to the crippled and the blind and the cataleptic and the leprous and the dropsical, and the demoniacal characterized him all the way, and on the Cross, kindness to the bandits suffering on the side of him, and kindness to the executioners while yet they pushed the spear, and hammered the spikes, and howled the blasphemies. All the stories of the John Howards and the Florence Nightingales and the Grace Darlings and the Ida Lewises pale before this transcendent example of him whose birth and life and death are the greatest story that the world ever heard, and the theme of the mightiest hosanna that Heaven ever lifted. Yea, the very kindness that allowed both hands to be nailed to the horizontal timber of the Cross with that cruel thump! thump! now stretches down from the skies those same hands filled with balm for all our wounds, forgiveness for all our crimes, rescue for all our serfdoms. And while we take this matchless kindness from God, may it be found that we have uttered our last bitter word, written our last cutting paragraph, done our last retaliatory action, felt our last revengeful heart-throb. And it would not be a bad epitaph for any of us if by the grace of God from this time forth we lived such beneficent lives that the tombstone's chisel could appropriately cut upon the plain slab that marks our grave a suggestion from the text: "He showed us no little kindness." But not until the last child of God has got ashore from the earthly storms that drove him on the rocks like Mediterranean Euroclydons, not until all the thrones of heaven are mounted, and all the conquerors crowned, and all the harps and trumpets and organs of heaven are thrummed or blown or sounded, and the ransomed of all climes and ages are in full chorus under the jubilant swing of angelic baton, and we shall for thousands of years have seen the river from under the Throne rolling into the "sea of glass mingled with fire," and this world we now inhabit shall be so far in the past that only a stretch of celestial memory can recall that it ever existed at all, not until then will we understand what Nehemiah calls "the great kindness," and David calls "the marvellous kindness," and Isaiah calls "the everlasting kindness" of God!

GOD'S FEW.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter
I. Cor. 1:21-31. Golden Text, II. Chron.

LORD it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power." (II. Chron. 14:11.) Such is the language of faith. "Woe unto them that go down to Egypt for help: and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many, and in horsemen because they are very strong." (Isa. 31:1); such is the practice of unbelief. Through the prophet Isaiah, God warns the nation, "Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; . . . gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces. . . . Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought;" and immediately after, the prophet writes these remarkable words, "The Lord spake thus to me with a strong hand, and instructed me, that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying,

Say Ye Not, a Confederacy,

to all them to whom this people shall say, a confederacy, neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid.—Don't take the world's way of overcoming by mustering all the human resources which are available.—Sanctify the Lord of Hosts himself, and but "let him be your fear, and let him be your dread." And the prophet's response was, "I will wait upon the Lord." (Isa. 8:9-13, 17.) The prophet counted him for more than all that associations could be. It is true that the Church of Christ is an association but it is God-made; it is not man combining with man to strengthen himself: it is not a multitude of divided interests in which each seeks his own, and combines with others because it is the best way of securing his own interests. The Church of Christ is a combination gathered by Christ, to himself, and in himself, for his interests, and not their own. The principle of numerical power and of combination is creeping into the work of God, the Church is imitating the world, and quantity rather than quality is the result. The power and resources of man are gathered against the powers of the enemy, and yet how little is accomplished! Christian countries are overcrowded with churches, missions, open-air services, until the difficulty has come to be, not missions to which to invite the people, but people enough to justify the keeping open of the missions! There is quantity, but what about the quality? Why do so few comparatively attend the churches and the missions? Listen for a few moments to an open air service. Somebody is praying; the tone may be very fervent, but the words are familiar; you have heard these sentences again and again, and you feel it has become

A Mechanical Thing.

It is not like that grip which commands one's attention when a man is holding a real, deep communion with his God, and when all one's soul goes out with his prayer, for a solemn conviction lays hold of one that his prayer is begotten of the Holy Ghost. You go into a mission hall; somebody is speaking; it is a kind of general discourse which the people present know as well as church-goers know their liturgy; there is no freshness in it, nothing to arouse the indifferent; nothing to meet any special needs of those present. Some thousands of such meetings are held every day. If all these speakers spent the whole evening alone with God, asking for his own love to those souls, and drinking in his Word, they would come on the morrow anointed afresh for the service of their Lord. Everywhere these powerless, lifeless meetings are being carried on, yet drunkenness and immorality do not decrease, Sabbath observance does not increase, there is no general power of God upon the people.

Whenever God has undertaken to do some great thing, he has never sought for anything of human strength or greatness to accomplish his purpose. Before Moses, the man "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and mighty in word and deed" could be an instrument such as God could use, he had to send him to Midian, that during forty years, his learning might grow rusty, and his mighty words and deeds be forgotten, and that as a man who knew more about keeping sheep than of the recognized science of the day, he might give room to his God to manifest himself. Then Egypt and Egypt's king could not stand before him; the sea, the dry rock, the very heaven above him, became, through God, subservient to the man ### Whom God had made Little!

God did not need thousands, one man who understood him was enough. There was quality, not quantity. When he had fully trusted his God, and brought out the people from Egypt, then God could use numbers; and he put his spirit upon the seventy elders: but those elders could never have done what God did by the one Moses. There are plenty of second class men and women amongst us, but where shall we find a Moses? When will men understand that, while the command is to all, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," it is not the fact of numbers going out that we may count upon to accomplish great things. One Jonah, a very imperfect prophet, but one who believed in the power of the message he carried, was used of God for the conversion of the mighty city of Nineveh. The heathen were as unspiritual then as now, and as difficult to convince, and God did not send an army of preachers who should make a thorough onset upon the place, but one very foolish man, who should confound the wise, one especially weak man who should confound the mighty, one man, base and despised through his selfishness, and yet believing in the conquering power of a message from God, and Nineveh bowed before the message!

When God wanted to bring back Israel from Baal worship, he did not seek for numbers, and institute schools of the prophets; this came about afterwards,—but he took one Elijah, who did not count it waste of time to spend three and a half years learning the lesson he was to teach the people on Mount Carmel. When God would overcome the Midianites, he could not use the hosts of Abiezer and those which joined them; by the three hundred, the few and not the many, he wrought the victory. (Judges 7.) Again, God used quality rather than quantity.

That which we need in our day is depth; fewer missions, but more of the power of God; less work, but that which is done more effectual. Many of the modern workers have never really graduated from the school of Christ. How many there are who attempt to lead souls to Christ, and pray in meetings that God will break the hard hearts of sinners, while their own hearts are so hard in their home life, and so selfish, that their own relations do not believe in their profession, and their words fall powerless upon their hearers! There is something about the preaching of those whom God leads through deep waters, and who prove daily his power to deliver from their own will and choice, that penetrates the hearts of the hearers, and makes men conscious that God is with his child, and they cannot but have a sense of awe at his nearness.

The Lord is at hand, the time is short; how may it be best economized? Surely by getting the mind of the Master. He has declared that by the cross of Christ God has "made foolish the wisdom of this world." Man's wisdom says, "the more men there are in the field the more work will be done." The testimony of past history says to this, a thousand times, No. "It is nothing with God to help, whether by many, or by them that have no power." In Elijah's day, the majority were on the side of Baal;

One Man with God

won the day. The wisdom of man says; The more highly men are educated, the more power they will gain over the minds of others, but it was not the educated Paul, but the unlearned and ignorant Peter, who was the Holy Ghost's instrument when three thousand souls were converted. "We preach Christ crucified," says the once learned Paul; his cross crosses out our wisdom—"unto them which are called both Jews and Greeks, Christ is the Power of God and the wisdom of God. Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men."

One Elijah, weak enough and foolish enough to do nothing in public, nothing which men could mark for three years and a half, counted for more with God, and accomplished more for him in one day than all the schools of the prophets in a generation! Are we not needing Elijahs now? If, in the providence of God, numbers are going out amongst the heathen, and we thank our God for sending them, let us not trust in them "because they are many," but rather pray that God will raise up from amongst them some whom he can trust like these men of old. And let us not forget how much time these men of God spent in learning the mind of God. Moses was essentially a man of prayer; his power was that he knew God face to face. Elijah was a man of prayer more than anything else; the few recorded acts of Elijah are only the consequence of his real inner life with God; his history, were it written in all its details, would be more the history of a soul's communings with God than that of a prophet's utterances. Paul, busy man that he was, became, more especially in the end of his life, when he was "the prisoner of the Lord," a man of prayer. This he was all through, all his life shows it, but the last few years, out of which issued his epistles, were times of special dealing with God. Evangelists and missionaries who live the chief part of their life in "the secret place of the Most High," (Ps. 91: 4), cannot fail to carry the atmosphere of heaven with them into their meetings, and wheresoever they go. No flesh can glory in his presence who is in them, but the glory of God rests upon them, and he "is made unto them wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption."

A DESPERATE ATTACK.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Sept. 27.
"It is nothing for thee to help whether with many or with them that have no power," Etc. II. Chron. 14: 11.

ONE of the most thrilling stories ever told of adventure in Africa is that related by a famous writer concerning the savage Masai tribe in the Galla country. It was the Masai warriors, as will be remembered, who, in the spring of 1886, murdered the Rev. John Houghton, the missionary, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on January 7, 1887. Briefly summarized the story is as follows:

A party of three white men with one Zulu and a few native carriers arrived at the missionary's house and were hospitably entertained. On their way thither by boat an attempt had been made by the Masai tribe to rob them, but the white men had beaten off their assailants and severely wounded some of them. Unknown to the white men the Masai followed them and saw them safely lodged within the stockade which surrounded the mission buildings. The missionary's daughter, a child of some twelve years of age, took her usual ride on her little pony on the morning after the arrival of the party but did not return. The missionary was somewhat anxious as the hours passed, but thought she must be safe as she was accompanied by a faithful native convert who worked on the farm.

The sun set, and still the child did not come back, but as night closed in, terrible news of her arrival. A Masai warrior presented himself at the entrance to the stockade and demanded speech with the missionary. He said that the child had been captured by his tribe and was held prisoner. A ghastly proof of the fact he produced in the head of her attendant who had been killed in trying to defend her. The Masai warrior announced that the child would be killed at daybreak if the missionary did not surrender the three white men who were then his guests. If the white men were sent down to the camp in the valley below, the child would be released unharmed. The Masai messenger having delivered his message, departed.

A consultation was held and the three white men decided to surrender themselves, resolving that as soon as the child was safely out of the Masai camp, they would fight for their lives. There was no hope of their succeeding, for the Masai numbered more than a hundred men, but the thought that otherwise the girl would be slaughtered seemed to leave them no alternative. The missionary, however, protested. It was giving three lives for one, he said, and his child, young as she was, had given her heart to God and was fit to die.

The discussion had continued for nearly half an hour when the Zulu interposed. "How many men have you at your command?" he asked of the missionary. The latter said that most of his people were away conveying a quantity of produce to the coast. He could not count on more than ten. "And you are one, there are three white men and myself—fifteen. Let us attack the camp and rescue the little one."

The odds in a fight of fifteen men against a hundred seemed too great, but the Zulu insisted that the chances of success were good and finally his proposal was adopted. The missionary went out to summon his ten retainers and returned to the house with them and they were informed of the service required and were asked if they were willing to help. They spoke together for a few moments and then one of them answered for the rest. The missionary had been their friend, he said, he had told them of heaven and had taught them things which had changed their hearts and lives. They loved him and all his, and they would gladly fight for the life of the beautiful white child.

"Let us pray," said the missionary solemnly. All knelt and the good man pleaded with the God who had enabled Gideon to overthrow the Midianites, to be with the little band in its perilous expedition. He prayed for any who might be killed in the fight and with a shaking voice asked God's protection for his child. It was a touching prayer which brought tears to the eyes of the white men who listened. After it was finished there was a council to decide on the mode of attack and that being settled, all retired to rest for an hour or two, as they were not to start until an hour before daybreak.

At the appointed time the little band sallied forth, halting when they came within sight of the camp-fires. There they separated into three parties each under the command of a white man. All were armed with guns and there hope was that the Masai had no firearms. They crawled noiselessly through the brush, one party making for the edge of the camp nearest the mission, the other parties moving, one to the right and the other to the left. They silently clasped each other's hands at parting, not knowing who might die within an hour. The suspense was almost intolerable. Not more than twenty minutes passed before the note of a bird was heard. It was so like, that the white men thought it was really a bird, but the missionary's retainers recognized it as the imitation of the Zulu. It was an intimation that his party had reached the station assigned to it. It was answered from the opposite side of the camp.

All was silent again for a minute and then the cry was heard again. At that instant every man was on his feet and was firing into the Masai camp. The Masai warriors who had spent the evening feasting on one of the missionary's oxen, were still heavy with sleep, but they sprang to their feet, terrified and confused by the sudden roar on each side of their camp. Before they could collect their thoughts, a second volley was poured upon them. They saw the flashes of fire from the guns in the darkness, but could not see the number of their assailants. A general panic seized them and those who had not been hit rushed from the camp like stampeding cattle. As the day broke, the three bands advanced cautiously into the camp and the missionary had the joy of clasping his daughter in his arms and carrying her safe to his home. There he gathered the whole party together and with glad hearts they gave thanks to God who had given them the victory.

MR. SPURGEON'S WORK IN AN ALMS-HOUSE.

A MAN of some education, who had held important situations, became so utterly impoverished, and so infirm, that he was compelled to seek admittance into the county almshouse. A lady who knew him sent him Mr. Spurgeon's "Around the Wicket Gate." He was delighted; and after pouring over its pages again and again, he, like Bunyan's Christian, saw "Yonder shining light." It has gladdened his saddened life. He shared his treasure, and thinks he must have read it aloud to other inmates of the house at least forty times.

* Mrs. Baxter suggests this lesson for use in schools where the choice of a subject is optional with the teachers. The International Lesson for the day is Review of the Quarter's Lessons; or Temperance, Prov. 4:13-19; or Missions, Acts 20: 25-35.

PROPHETIC PROGRAMME

An Outline of Future Events Connected with the Lord's Coming by the Rev. J. Dawson.

CHRIST'S Second Advent will consist of two parts or stages. The first, his coming to the air for his Church. The second, his coming to the earth with his Church. Let us for a moment look at each of these separately.

In the first place, what are we taught respecting his coming to the air for his Church? In the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, St. Paul not only declares that there will be a resurrection, but he details the very steps by which it will be accomplished, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order. Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." The teaching of this passage is very plain: "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept." And then, after a long and uncertain interval, to be terminated by the appearing of the Lord, the righteous dead shall also rise when this "corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality."

Resurrection and Translation.

But what about the saints who are living at this blessed time? As the Apostle has in 1 Corinthians 15 only been treating of the resurrection of the bodies of the righteous dead, he has naturally omitted all reference to those who are alive at the coming of the Lord. But he does not leave the question unanswered. In his first epistle to the Thessalonians, the 4th chapter and in verses 15, 16 and 17, he writes respecting both the living and the dead: "The dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

The Second Stage of Christ's Advent.

And now what does Scripture teach us respecting our Lord's coming on earth with his Church? In II. Thess. 1: 7, 8, St. Paul says, "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." St. Jude gives similar testimony. He declares that Enoch prophesied, saying, "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all." In accordance with this is the vision of St. John, given in Rev. 19: 11, 12, 13: "I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse, and he that sat upon him was called faithful and true, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war." We can have no doubt that the rider of this horse was our blessed Lord. And who are the armies that follow in his train? Not the angels, for they are clothed in fine linen, white and clean; and in the eighth verse, this linen is explained as being "the righteousness of saints." The Lord's followers therefore are his people.

Now in the above-quoted prophecies and in the Apocalyptic Vision, our Lord is represented as coming not for but with his saints; not to the air, but to the earth; not for the purpose of receiving and rewarding, but to take vengeance and punish.

The Interval.

Between these two stages of our Lord's Advent an interval will take place. How long it will endure it is, of course, impossible precisely to say. But that there will be such an interval and that it will continue for some considerable time, is, I think, clear from some of the earlier visions of St. John. In the 7th chapter St. John says he saw "a multitude whom none could number, of all nations and kindreds and people," they "stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands." Now the fact brought out here is that at a period of the Church's history which St. John desired to delineate, the saints, the redeemed ones, were with Christ, living in his actual presence, and so entirely delivered from all the powers of evil that they are no more to be subject to hunger and thirst, and "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." But they are in heaven, that is to say Jesus had come to the air, taken them to himself, and returned with them to heaven, previous to the opening of the seals, the sounding of the trumpets, and the pouring forth of the vials of God's wrath. In other words, the Lord's people, at least the hundred and forty and four thousand of the pre-eminently holy Christians, who are watchful and waiting for his coming, are then safe in their eternal home, before the appearing of the personal Antichrist and the establishment of his kingdom, and before the accomplishment of that event as foretold in Zach. 14.

In Acts 3: 19, 20, 21, we find St. Peter addressing the following exhortation to the Jews who were filled with wonder at the miracle he had wrought on a lame man at the gate of the temple, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and he shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached unto you, whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things." From these inspired utterances we gather that when the Lord appears a second time in glory. He will come as

The Restorer.

He will deliver groaning creation from the usurped dominion of Satan. He will set up the throne of righteousness and peace, and he will reign as King of kings and Lord of lords. But in that kingdom, he will not reign alone. His saints will share the inheritance and partake of the glory. Seated upon thrones and wearing crowns of gold they shall rule the nations. Then shall be fulfilled the master's loving promise: "I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also."

With such a prospect as this before us, well may we "look up and lift up our heads." The very signs, so full of terrible import to unconverted men, are to us the sweet echo of the approaching footsteps of our Lord. He comes to deliver and to bless and to exalt. He comes to bestow on us the full privilege of redemption. We shall, then, in its widest sense, be the redeemed of the Lord—redeemed from sin and all its attendant evils, redeemed to God and now altogether his. Now, no more sorrow and suffering, no more weakness and decay, no more sickness and death; and best of all, no more temptation and sin.

But I speak not only of our own exaltation, wonderful and glorious though that will be. I would rather regard that aspect of the Lord's approach which was prominent in the apostle's mind, when he summed up the blessings of the Advent day in these words, "and so shall we be ever with the Lord." Here is the accomplishment of our heart's desire. Here is the answer to our constant cry, "we would see Jesus." We shall see the king face to face in all his beauty, in the full radiance of his glory; we shall see him robed in his infinite perfections. We shall hear him, too, listen to his voice, and as he looks upon us our joyful hearts will prompt the loud song which bursts from our lips, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." (Rev. 5: 12.) Surely, then, "when these things begin to come to pass," announcing that we are drawing nigh the Heavenly Zion, we may well "look up and lift our heads," assured that our "redemption draweth nigh."

ONE PATIENT'S WORK.

THE value of Medical Missions in China and other dark lands is not yet fully realized. Patients who are cured there go back to their native towns carrying the good seed with them. The missionaries hear nothing of it for a time but when they are passing through a strange town years afterward they find to their surprise that Christ is already known there and when they come to make inquiries as to the origin of the work they find that it was started by some man who had been a patient in a Christian hospital. One such case is reported by Dr. Lowe, who says that twenty years ago a man from an unevangelised part of China came to the Amoy Dispensary. While undergoing treatment for his disease, he received spiritual instruction, with the result that, as soon as he regained his health; he went back to his native district as a home missionary. At first he was mocked and persecuted, but his earnest persistence won for him a hearing in the end. Some hearts opened to his message. The number of converts grew until a congregation was formed. Then a request was sent to Amoy for an English missionary and a man was sent. And now, to use the words of the Rev. Mr. Macgregor, of Amoy, "there are seven congregations, each numbering from thirty to upwards of a hundred persons, all the outcome of God's blessing upon the good seed sown in one patient's heart while in the mission hospital."

AN OFFICER'S DIARY.*

THE REFLECTIONS OF A MAN WHO HAD ONLY A MONTH TO LIVE.

"A Regular Facer."

FOUR p. m.—A regular facer. . . . Is it any use keeping a diary longer? After doing it for twenty years may as well finish it out. What a fool I was to go and see Tintern! Why could I not let matters alone? If I have lost twenty odd pounds of flesh, many a man would have given his eyes to do the same. It began in June, and here we are in October, and I can't say I feel bad. Tire perhaps a bit easier than I did. However, it is just like my luck. I never thought for a moment there was anything serious the matter, till Tintern asked me if I had any near relatives—after my telling him I was a widower without children—and when I said, "Not a soul," I half began from his face to guess. But a month! If he had said a couple of years it would have been different. What can a fellow do in a month? Fact is that I fancied I had taken it rather well. Wished him good-day, and paid him his two guineas for his first visit, as if he had recommended me to have a tooth out. Yes, I really believe I should not have taken it so well if he had simply told me I must go for the winter to the South of France, and give up this season's hunting! But a month more only to live! Well, I am glad I took it so well before Tintern. It was not really till I got into a hansom, and was asked "Where to?" that I began to realize it. I was going, of course, to have said "Bank," but what is the use of investing money for a month? Then I thought of Tattersall's but no man in his senses would buy a hunter for a month. If only I had never gone near a doctor, I should have gone down to Market Harborough as usual, and gone off, I suppose, on a sudden without any warning. I wish with all my heart I had been left in the dark about it. Never mind, John H—, you have taken a good many awkward fences, and you will have to take this, the last, like a man. The only question is, What is to be done to prepare? First, I must make a will. To whom am I to leave my money? Second, I must make the best use of my month as regards the future. I cannot say that I fear death. At least I thought not. That time in Afghanistan, when I was so nearly put out jumping over that wall, and had to defend myself with an unloaded revolver and a broken sword, I cannot say I funk'd. Or, again, when that tiger so nearly got me—but meeting death in a certain time, by yourself—well, it is unsettling. I suppose the proper thing to do would be to buy a Bible?

Groping for Light.

OCTOBER 7TH.—I have found it. I am not so certain. Let me put on paper what has occurred. I went this morning to hear a well-known Mission preacher.

OCTOBER 8TH.—I found last night that I could not describe what had happened. Is it worth while trying to do so? As to that, what is the use of keeping a diary at all? The game is so nearly played out that I might as well finish the job. So here goes.—Well, I went to the place I mentioned to hear a well-known Mission preacher. I had heard Annie, in time past in India, talk of missions and bewail her fate that there were none in India, and that set my mind thinking. I got in pretty late, and the fellow had begun to speak.

By-and-by a man came to me, sitting down alongside, and asked if I was a Christian. I said, of course, that I was. He asked me why I thought I was one. I replied, that I was neither Turk, infidel, nor heretic, as far as I knew, nor Mussulman nor heathen either. That did not satisfy him, so he asked how I became one. I said I was born one.

While speaking to me, he opened his Bible in a mechanical manner—by the bye, it was marked all through, and I did just covet it—and I saw the 3d chapter of St. John scored all over. So as soon as I got to my rooms I sat down to have a look at it in my own Bible. But before I began to read I asked God to make me understand it. And I half believe he answered that prayer; if I had written this last night I should not have written "half," but this morning I am hardly so certain. Yet the chapter is plain enough, and the last verse plainer than all.

"He that believeth on the Son hath life." I do believe in one sense; I believe Christ came to save the world, and I believe in his intentions, so to speak, to save all that he can; but what I do not quite see is how about my past life. Can I tell God that I do really believe that Christ is the Son of God, and that he died to save sinners, of which I am one? The Bible says, "He that believeth hath this life;" can I claim the promise? That's the point.

"Believe! Believe!"

OCTOBER 18TH.—Awake half the night. Believe! believe! believe! kept ringing in my ears. What is it to believe?

10 p. m.—Made a discovery to-day. There's a poor wretch of a man who comes in to clean boots and do all sorts of odd jobs, and passing him in the passage I happened to see a Bible in his side pocket—at least, it looked liked it. I might have spoken to him there and then, but it only struck me later that it must be a Bible, for people never carry any other book about till it is nearly worn through. That's strange.

I had begun by asking him if that was a Bible he carried in his pocket. "Yes, it was." Read it? "Should think he did." "Would try his best to answer a question. What was it?" I hardly knew how to put it, but said at last, "What does the Bible mean by saying 'believe?' I can't believe." "Yes, he could answer that; it meant to trust Christ." "How about our past sin?" I asked. "If we confess our sin, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sin," he said slowly. "Did I believe Christ was faithful?" "Yes." "Did I believe God was just?" "Yes." "Then he could not punish both me and Christ for my sin." "Believe in my heart and confess with my mouth—is that it?" "That's it—nothing else."

Opened the book once more. John 6: 47. "Verily, verily,"—that's pretty positive, certainly—"he that believeth on me hath everlasting life." Why not believe on him this very moment? Can I? He that believeth on the Son hath life. I do believe that he died for my sins, took my punishment, my death, and so I am acquitted. That's clear. I do believe on the Son of God. Have I eternal life? What shall I write? Let me look at the book. What does it say? "Hath everlasting life?" Then I may write yes.

"I Have Found Him."

OCTOBER 20TH.—Thirteen days ago I wrote "I have found it." Now I write, "I have found HIM." A stupendous difference. Then I thought I had found a thing; now I have found a Person. Then the thing slipped from my grasp; now I am held by Christ. The boot-cleaner advised my going to call on the Vicar of St. John's, where it appears he goes to church. He met me warmly, but said I had little need for his help. He put the matter much as my previous informant had. That evening I took the communion at his church, to commemorate my Saviour's death and resurrection. I came home walking on air.

Dr. Tintern, you have opened the door of heaven to me. This week I am walking the streets of London. Next week I may be treading the golden streets of Zion.

HEALTH AND RELIGION.

SPIRITUAL condition so mightily affected by the physical state!

What a great opportunity this gives the Christian physician, for he can feel at the same time both the pulse of the body and the pulse of the soul, and he can administer to both at once, and if medicine is needed he can give that, and if spiritual counsel is needed he can give that—an earthly and a divine prescription at the same time—and call not only the apothecary of earth, but the pharmacy of heaven. Ah, that is the right kind of doctor I want at my bedside when I get sick, one that cannot only pour out the right number of drops but one who can also pray. That is the kind of doctor I have had in my house when sickness or death came. I do not want any of your profligate or atheistic doctors around my loved ones when the balances of life are trembling. A doctor who has gone through the medical college, and in dissecting-room has traversed the wonders of the human mechanism, and found no God in any of the labyrinths, is a fool, and cannot doctor me or mine. But, oh, the Christian doctors! What a comfort they have been in many of our households. And they ought to have a warm place in our prayers, as well as praise on our tongues. Let all Christian physicians unite with ministers of the Gospel in persuading good people that it is not because God is against them that they sometimes feel depressed, but because of their diseased body.

CHEERFULNESS A DUTY.

I ENJOIN upon all those whom these times find in comfortable circumstances two things: First, helpfulness to the helpless—and the next, cheerful talk. This experiment has been made by medical scientists. A dozen men conspire to tell a well man he looks sick. They are to meet him on a journey and by the time the fourth man is giving him melancholy salutation, he feels he is doomed, and the twelfth man comes up with his melancholy salutation just in time to help carry him home on a stretcher. Then twelve men conspire that they will meet a man in uncertain health and tell him how well he looks. By the time the fourth man has met him with a cheerful salutation, his nervous system is all toned up, and by the time the twelfth man has met him with his cheerful salutation, he says to his wife: "Throw out that apothecary shop from our shelves: I don't want any more medicine." The nation is only a man on a larger scale. If you want to prostrate business and keep it prostrated, talk in dolorous tone and keep on talking. Let all the merchants sigh, and all the editors prognosticate a hard winter, and all the ministers groan in the pulpit. In the great orchestra of complaint those who play the loudest trombones are those who have the fullest salaries and the completest wardrobe. They are only made because they have to fall back upon the surplus resources of other years, or because they cannot make as large investments as they would like to make. Did you have your breakfast? Yes. Did you have your supper last night? Yes. Did you have a pillow to sleep on? Yes. What are you complaining about? The genuine sufferers, those who are really in destitution, for the most part suffer in silence; but the loudest cries against hard times are by the men to whom the times are not hard. Artists tell us it is almost impossible to sing well on a full stomach, but it has been demonstrated over and over again that it is possible for men to groan well on a full stomach! Now, in these days let all the comfortable classes exchange the Lamentations of Jeremiah for the exultant Psalms of David. "Praise ye the Lord, let everything that hath breath praise the Lord," and we will have a different state of things in this country. I wish there might be a conspiracy formed—I would like to belong to it—a conspiracy made up that all the merchants and editors and ministers of religion in this country agree that they would have faith in God and talk cheerfully, and there would be a revival of business immediate and tremendous and glorious. Stop singing Naomi and old Windom, and give us Mount Pisgah and Coronation.

THE EARLY RISING DELUSION.

FOR farmers and those who live in localities where people can retire at eight or nine o'clock in the evening, the old notion about early rising is still appropriate. But he who is kept up till ten or eleven or twelve o'clock, and then rises at five or six, because of the teachings of some old ditty about "early to rise," is committing a sin against God and his own soul. There is not one man in ten thousand who can afford to do without seven or eight hours' sleep. All the stuff written about great men who slept only three or four hours a night is apocryphal and a lie. They have been put upon such small allowance occasionally and prospered; but no man ever yet kept healthy in body and mind for a number of years with less than seven hours' sleep. Americans need more sleep than they are getting. This lack makes them so nervous and the insane asylums so populous. If you can get to bed early, then rise early. If you cannot get to bed till late, then rise late. It may be as Christian for one man to rise at eight as it is for another to rise at five. We counsel our readers to get up when they are rested. But let the rousing-bell be rung at least thirty minutes before your public appearance. Physicians say that a sudden jump out of bed gives irregular motion to the pulse. It takes hours to get over a too sudden rising. It is barbarous to expect children instantly to land on the centre of the floor at the call of their nurses, the thermometer below zero. Give us time after you call us to roll over, gaze at the world full in the face, and look before we leap.

THE JADED QUILL.

THERE are many new kinds of pen being manufactured, but no man has yet been able to invent a pen that will not get weary. We have often had hold of a pen that seemed determined to skip and gambol. It leaped from paragraph to paragraph. It flew from simile to trope. It made a dash as it went. It slurred unimportant events. It threw interjections of surprise, and interrogations of inquiry, and hour after hour rushed along the line. But after a while it was sure to get weary. It stumbled. It dragged. It blotted. It staggered. And after a while it dropped as though dead. Talk of weary legs and arms; let some one tell us the story of weary pens. They may be found late at night in editorial rooms, and on reportorial desks, and in the hand of poet, essayist, romancist, and historian. For the most part they hunger for more bread, and yawn for more sleep, and, worn out, long for the grave of obliteration. Kept in a fine case at Abbotsford, you may find the expired pen of Walter Scott, and in the venerable Hall of Philadelphia the pen which signed the Declaration of Independence. But post mortem honors are seldom awarded to deceased quills. They are generally thrown away. They drop into the dust and are trod on, and the places that knew them once know them no more. But our chief sympathy is for the living pens, which write and write, and wish they could die. Nothing in all the world has such hard work in making a livelihood as pen and pencil. The one languishes in the picture gallery, the other faints in the study. May the day speed on when literature and art shall come to higher appreciation. That will be the Elysium of pen and pencil.

A SUGGESTION.

WOULD it not be well if all the grumbling of the world could be delegated? Instead of having the spirit of complaint so broadly spread through the world, why not a few do all the fault-finding? When such an arrangement can be made, one pulpit will do all the grumbling for all the pulpits in the town; one newspaper all the grumbling for the journalists; one prominent citizen the grumbling for all the citizens. Such an one becomes the pet growler of the community. All the scandal-mongers carry to him forage. They feed him with all the disagreeable things of the community. His capacity for offal is awful. They rub him down with the ragged edge of a slander. Job describes this wild ass of the forest as snuffing up the East wind. Like others of his kind, he eats thistles. These champion growlers of communities do all that kind of work, leaving others nothing to do but to be agreeable—Delightful arrangement! Let us have the fault-finding in Church and State done by a committee. Take the most powerful "bear" out of Wall Street and let him do the croaking for all the brokers. Take some ecclesiastic, who has swallowed his religion crosswise and got it strangely fast in his windpipe, to hunt down all the heresy, real or fancied. Get some one newspaper to do all the work of mauling reputations, exposing domestic infelicities, and reporting divorce cases. Let one female "gad-about," gathering all the gossip, put it up in bottles properly labelled, and peddle it about from house to house in small phials for those who could stand only a little, or in large bottles, as it may be required. Let her be known as the championess of tittle-tattle. So men and women might delegate to one or more the disagreeables of the world. And, as at different times America and England have disputed with each other for supremacy with oar, and bat, and rifle, let the champion American growler go forth to dispute with the champion English growler for the belt of the world. Let the day chosen for the contest be a commingling of Scotch mist and English cloudiness and American drizzle. I think neither would gain the victory. Indeed, I would like to see them both go down together in the contest and both slain. Then would perish from the earth the bickerings and the suspicions, and snarlings, and the backbitings of the world. Bury the two champions in the same grave, their clubs with them, covering them up with a bank of nettles. Read for their funeral service the report of the Stock market just after some great failure. Plant at the head of it a little nightshade, and at the foot of it a little nux vomica. For epitaph, "Here lies complaint and hypercriticism. Born in the year 1. Died in the year 1891. May the resurrection trumpet that blows others into light, blow these miscreants deeper down into oblivion."

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. B. Fay Mills is holding Evangelistic services at Terre Haute, Ind.

The Board of Lady Managers of the World's Fair in Chicago has voted fifty-six to thirty-six in favor of Sunday Closing.

The next U. S. Teachers' Convention is to be held at Helena, Mont., not at Helena, Ark., as has been incorrectly stated.

Mr. K. Obatu, a Japanese student from Tokyo, has arrived in Baldwin, Kan., to enter Baker University. He has been a student in an Anglo-Japanese School in Tokyo and is preparing for Christian work.

The census returns in England and Wales show that there were in the two countries 3,000,000 more persons in 1891 than there were in 1881. There were, however, not so many paupers by about 20,000 and not so many convicted criminals by about 2,000.

A successful work in Utah is being done by the Presbyterian Church. Work is going on in twenty-eight towns outside of Salt Lake City and Ogden, and there are now twenty-one ministers, fifty-eight teachers, thirty schools in the Territory. In the schools there are about 2,100 pupils, seventy-five per cent. of whom are from Mormon or ex-Mormon families.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is holding united meetings at Birmingham, Conn. It has been found necessary to hold the meetings in a huge tent as no church in the town is large enough to hold the numbers who come. The Evening Transcript says that the services so far have exceeded the hopes of the most sanguine both as to the numbers who attend and the number of converts.

Rev. N. B. Randall, D. D., of Long Island City, N. Y., is now ready to make engagements for Evangelistic service during the coming months. He labored during last season in four States and his meetings were successful far beyond his expectations. He has the hearty endorsement of Ira D. Sankey, Rev. Drs. A. B. Earle, E. P. Hammond and others prominent in this field as well as of the pastors with whom he has labored.

Cable reports of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's condition last week were more hopeful. On Tuesday he was so much stronger as to be able to sit in his garden for about half an hour and was not so much exhausted by the effort as might have been expected after so severe an illness. He and his family and church are deeply grateful to American Christians for their sympathy and prayers and beg that the latter especially may be continued.

Rev. E. P. Telford is now laboring at Wakefield, Mass. His work at the Sing Sing and Asbury Grove Camp meetings was much blessed. After the conclusion of his work at Wakefield, the Evangelist goes to Woburn, Mass., for a series of services continuing three weeks. They will be held in the M. E. Church of which the Rev. Hugh Montgomery is pastor. Mr. Telford writes that all the signs point to a great harvest of souls to be gathered in during this fall and winter.

The Christian Alliance of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is President will hold its annual Convention in the Gospel Tabernacle, 692 Eighth Avenue, New York, October 4-12. Large numbers of our readers are in the habit of attending these Conventions at the Tabernacle, and have found them very blessed and helpful seasons. The coming Convention will be one of unusual interest. Persons coming from a distance may have board, etc., secured for them by remitting to the Secretary, 692 Eighth Avenue, New York.

Rev. C. H. Yatman is having much success in his meeting at Trenton, N. J. On Sunday, September 6th he held six services one of which was a meeting for men only, which was held in the Taylor Opera House. More than a thousand men were present. At the close of the address, when he asked all who desired to be Christians to rise the audience rose in a body, and a great many were converted in all the meetings. If these meetings prove an index to what is to follow, this will be the greatest soul-winning year of the famous evangelist's life. He next goes to Newton Mass., and Newburgh, N. Y.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

England's Labor Congress—The Crops—Chili's New President—"Carmen Sylva," the Poet Queen—An Emperor on Drunkenness—Ex-President Grevy Dead—General Notes.

PROBABLY the biggest Labor Congress ever held in Britain is now in session at Newcastle, where 1,500,000 skilled and unskilled workers are represented by 500 delegates. So important is the Congress in the politicians' eyes that it has been termed the "Workmen's Parliament." Princess Beatrice, Lady Dilke, several members of Parliament and a few prominent officials have watched its deliberations with keen interest. The leading questions to be decided are: the eight-hour day, arbitration by the state, the best means of preventing strikes, organizing the women workers, and the best means for bringing about a more equitable distribution of wealth. The Congress by a large majority, adopted a resolution in favor of an international eight-hour law, and declaring that the British government should endeavor to bring it about, in conjunction with foreign governments. It also demanded that an international conference be convoked for that purpose. On the following day, the Congress reconsidered its action on the eight-hour day and voted that the laws on the subject should be made to conform to the special needs of each trade. This is regarded as ending the eight-hour agitation in Britain for the present.

The Crop Outlook.

This year, as in 1890, the crops are exceptionally large, while those in Europe are below the average. As a consequence, grain prices are good and dealings active, the harvest being the largest ever gathered. In Minnesota, and North and South Dakota the wheat crop, according to reliable estimates, will amount to 150,000,000 bushels; the total for the whole country being put at 500,000,000 and the entire grain crop at 3,177,000,000 bushels. The effect of this hopeful prospect has already been to stimulate industry everywhere.

Chili's New Government.

ON Sept. 7th, Minister Egan telegraphed to our State Department from Chili that a provisional government had been organized, with George Montt as President, and universally accepted by the people. He added that he was in very cordial communication with it. Acting on instructions from Washington he has recognized the new government and opened communication with President Montt to that effect. George Montt has been one of the leading spirits of the revolutionary movement. As Chief of the junta de Gobierno, and as Admiral of the Navy he, probably more than any other representative of the Congress party, became offensive to the Balmacedists, who had tried in every way to destroy his popularity. He is a man of exceptional ability as well as high courage, and is a leader eminently fit to command during the disturbed and unsettled period that must follow the ruinous war into which Balmaceda's cupidity and ambition plunged the nation. A portrait of President Montt appears above.

GEORGE MONTT.

An Emperor on Drunkenness.
WHATEVER else may be laid to his charge, Emperor William certainly can never be accused of being uninteresting. He has again stirred up Germany, not by donning his student's gown and sitting down at a kneipe, as he did not very long since, but by drawing up a law for the regulation of the drinking traffic, which contains features that will prove startling to many of his subjects. The law contains twenty-three paragraphs and provides, among other things, that no man of immoral character can have a license, nor any one who is connected with gambling in any form; no saloon can be near a church; in cities of over 5,000 inhabitants, the liquor seller must not be connected in any other trade, (a blow at drug-store and grocery saloons); the police can forbid the sale of liquor before 8 A. M., and the sale to persons under 18 years of age is absolutely forbidden. Inn-keepers and others are forbidden to sell to one who has been convicted of drunkenness and they cannot expel a drunken man except by sending him to his home or to a police station.

A Poet-Queen's Illness.

ROUMANIA'S famous Poet-Queen, Elizabeth, better known in the world of art and letters as Carmen Sylva, is dangerously ill at Venice.

CARMEN SYLVA.

She has a remarkable history and her career shows to what extent the eccentricities of a beautiful woman, with wealth and influence at command, may lead. Excitable and imaginative, she has almost worn out her nervous system, although her brain is unaffected. For a time her poems were extremely popular all over Europe and even in this country, but the popularity is now dying out. She recently wrote a drama which was produced in Venice, but met with a tame reception. At the age of nine she wrote verses. When still very young she was married to King Charles of Roumania. Her romantic nature and lovable disposition won the hearts of his subjects and she was a great favorite. Her only child—a daughter—died in 1874, and the blow seems to have been a lasting one. She is intensely fond of children, and one of her chief pleasures has been to gather about her the young people of some little Roumanian village, and read to them, or tell them childish stories. Studious, exclusive and disposed to solitude, she could not harmonize with her husband and with the brilliant court life, so she made herself a voluntary exile and preferred a quiet life at Venice to the duties and responsibilities of a throne. A portrait of Carmen Sylva is given above. The poet-Queen is now forty-seven years of age and is a beautiful woman, with a strongly intellectual face and a deep religious nature.

Hayti's New Cabinet.

THE "Black Republic" has a new ministry and the members have united in promises which, if fulfilled, will greatly aid in restoring peace and prosperity to the distracted country. When the new Cabinet appeared in the Chamber of Deputies at Port-au-Prince a few days ago, its policy was outlined in a speech by the Minister of Foreign Affairs. It declares that it will be honest, straight-forward and dignified, will respect international relations, and will be conciliatory toward all engaged in the recent rebellion. In return for these pledges, it asks undivided support for Hippolyte as executive. It looks as though the government, fearful of the threatened revolution, were attempting to avert it by fair promises, since despotic practices fail to overawe the spirit of the people of Hayti.

The Anti-Lottery Crusade.

EXACTLY a year ago, the law excluding lottery matter from the United States mails became operative but not till very lately was it acted upon. Now, however, the energetic attitude of the Post Office Department gives hope that the country at large may have the full benefit of the statute. Post Office Inspector Maynard, in charge of the Louisiana District, recently arrested President Conrad, of the Louisiana Lottery, for violation of the mails, and he also assisted the Mexican government to evidence that resulted in the arrest by Mexican officials of the President of the Mexican Lottery. Mr.

Maynard says the Governor of Louisiana is on the side of the people and that the proposed amendment to the State Constitution, which will be submitted to the people next spring, and which would have the effect of renewing the charter of the Lottery Company, will assuredly be defeated.

Dethroning a Crazy Monarch.

THE little kingdom of Bavaria has had the misfortune to be ruled over by two insane monarchs in succession, for Otto, the present king, like Ludwig the recluse of Hohen-Schwangau, is a potentate whose eccentricities betray undoubted lunacy. It is an open secret in Bavaria that the visit of Emperor William to Munich is for the purpose of conferring with Prince Regent Luitpold with a view to deposing Otto and elevating Luitpold to the throne. The Kaiser, it is said, has expressed his decided opposition to a continuance of Otto's sovereignty. A Commission of three physicians will make an examination of the afflicted monarch and, should their report confirm the apprehensions of settled insanity, Otto's deposition may be announced forthwith. Under the laws of Prussia governing the succession to the throne, a prince afflicted with insanity cannot succeed, and the next heir assumes the crown. Emperor William has a high regard for Luitpold's ability and believes that that prince, being friendly to Prussia, can do much to soften the ancient feeling of the South Germans against the North. King Otto is now 43 years of age. Before his malady asserted itself he was a handsome, soldierly ruler. While Luitpold may govern as Regent during Otto's lifetime, on the latter's death, the crown will go to Prince Ludwig, Luitpold's eldest son and, failing him, to Prince Ruprecht, the young son of Ludwig. The Bavarian Crown is hereditary in the male line, and there are princes enough to make the prospect of an unclaimed throne very remote indeed.

KING OTTO.

To Close the World's Fair on Sundays.

THE Board of Lady Managers of the World's Fair, appreciating the prevailing sentiment among Christian people all over the country in behalf of closing the Fair on Sundays, last week discussed the matter among themselves. A vote was taken, the result being in favor of closing the Fair by 56 to 36.

Ex-President Grevy Dead.

THE sudden death of ex-President Francois Paul Jules Grevy, of the French Republic, at Paris on the 9th. inst., removes from the scene of active affairs one of the leading statesmen of a stormy political period. M. Grevy was born in 1813 at Mont-Sous-Vaudrey. He studied law in Paris, and at the breaking out of the war in 1848 was appointed by the Provisional Government as Commissioner of the Department of the Jura and afterwards became Vice-President of the Constitutional Assembly. He strongly opposed the expedition to Rome, and believed in limiting the powers of the Executive. When the Napoleonic coup d'etat took place in 1851, Grevy was arrested and confined in Mazas prison. On being released he retired for a time from political life and practised law. In 1868 he reentered politics, being elected to the Assembly, and in 1871 he was elected President of that body. This was immediately after the close of the Franco-German war. He was again elected President of the Chamber in 1876, and on the resignation of Marshal McMahon was chosen President of the Republic in 1879 and re-elected in 1885, resigning in 1887. M. Grevy was always considered a conservative and safe leader in French politics. He was a notable worker and an honest, faithful servant, although his administration was distinguished more for its mediocrity than any brilliant achievements. There were many political malcontents who derided the quiet old President and his retiring ways, and who would have preferred as Executive some one who could conduct an establishment with a more lavish expenditure and display. M. Grevy however, retained the support and confidence of the great body of the French people, and his administration must be classed as one during which the new Republic made very great strides toward permanent prosperity.

War Talk in Europe.

HARDLY a day passes which does not increase the gravity of the war situation in Europe. M. De Freycinet, President of the French Council and Minister of War, at a banquet on the 10th of September, made a very significant speech in which he declared that France's splendid army was the chief element of her influence, and that "no one doubts that she is strong, and that she will be wise." At the approaching military manoeuvres 110,000 soldiers will take part. The German Emperor while in Munich, Bavaria, last week, openly intimated that it would be well for the entire country to hold itself in readiness for war at any moment. All German army horses are being examined, and the general feeling throughout the army is that a collision is not far off. Meanwhile, Russia is manufacturing millions of new rifles hurriedly in France.

THE TIMID BELIEVER.

"If I may." Matthew 9: 21.

THE woman in the narrative was fully persuaded that if she did but touch our Lord's garment she would be made whole. What she had heard and seen concerning Jesus made her sure of his superabundant power to heal the sick. A touch would do it. Yea, even a touch of his clothes. Her one and only question was, might she touch him? Could she touch him? She would surely be healed if she could touch; but was this allowable? Was this possible? I know that multitudes of sin-sick men and women are vexed with the same question. Oh that I could help them over the difficulty!

This poor diseased woman did not utter this "if" of hers with her lips. Perhaps if she had it might not have troubled her so much; for a silent doubt usually eats right in the heart. But the sufferer now before us had the courage to put the question to a practical issue; she tried whether she might or not. She had the good sense, the grace-given wisdom, not to wait until she had solved that question in her mind, but she went and solved it, as a matter of fact, whether she might or not: she went and actually touched the hem of the garment of the Saviour, and she was made perfectly whole. Oh that those I am now addressing would have the bravery and the earnestness to do the same! I would to God that every unconverted person here would lean forward and say, "God grant that salvation may come to me." I am going, therefore, in the simplest way possible, without any attempt at a sermon, to try to talk so as to meet this rankling question which lies within, festering and irritating many an earnest heart—this doubtful inquiry, "If I may."

Permission in Doubt.

I. First, take it as we have got it here: If I may be allowed, or permitted, to touch the hem of his garment, I shall be made whole." That is your difficulty, is it?—whether you have liberty and warrant to come and trust Christ—whether you, such a sinner as you are, are permitted to repose your soul upon his great atonement and his finished work. Let me reason with you a little.

In the first place, you are quite sure of this—that there is nothing to forbid your coming and resting your guilty soul upon Christ. I shall defy you, if you will read all the Old and New Testament through, to put your finger upon a single verse in which God has said that you may not come and put your trust in Christ. Now, he has bidden you over and over again to seek his face, but he has never said that you shall seek his face in vain. Dismiss that thought. Again I return to what I have said: there is nothing in the Scripture that refuses you permission to come and repose your soul once for all upon Christ. It is written, "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." Does that exclude you? It is written, "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." Does that shut you out? No, it includes you; it invites you; it encourages you.

Furthermore, do you not think that the very nature of the Lord Jesus Christ should forbid your raising a doubt about your being permitted to come and touch his garment's hem? Surely, if any one were to paint the Lord Jesus Christ as an ascetic, repelling with lofty pride the humbler folk who had never reached his dignity of consecration—if any were to paint him as a Pharisee driving off publicans and sinners, or as

An Iceberg of Righteousness chilling the sinful and sorrowing, it would be a foul slander upon his divine character. If any one were to say that Jesus Christ is exacting—that he will not receive to himself the guilty just as they are, but requires a great deal of them, and will only welcome to himself those who are, like himself, good, and true, and excellent, that would not be truth but the direct opposite of it; for, "this man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them," was thrown in his face when he lived here below; and what the prophet said of him was most certainly true, if anything was ever true, "A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench." Little children are wonderful judges of character; they know intuitively who is kind. And so are loving women. They do not go through the processes of reasoning, but they come to a conclusion very soon as to a man's personal character. Now, the children came and clambered our Redeemer's knee, and the mothers brought their infants for his blessing. How can you dream that he will repel you? I pray you, then, take it for granted that you may come boldly to him without fear of rebuff.

Abundant Power.

Will you think, yet again, of the fulness of Christ's power to save, and make a little argument of it. Christ was so full of power to bless that the secret virtue even saturated his clothes. If the touch was a touch of faith it mattered not where the contact was made. Well now, you often judge of a man's willingness to help by the power that he has. When a person has little to give he is bound to be economical in his giving. He must look at every penny before he gives it, if he has so few pence to spare. But when a nobleman has no limit to his estate you feel sure that he will freely give if his heart be generous and tender. The blessed Lord is so full of healing power that he cannot need to stint himself as to the miracles of healing he shall work; and he must be, according to the goodness of his nature, delighted to overflow, glad to communicate to those who come. Your question is, "May I? May I?" I answer that question by this: there is nothing to forbid you; there is everything in the nature of Christ to encourage you; and there is such a fulness of mercy in him that you cannot think that he can have the slightest motive for withholding his infinite grace.

Moreover, suppose you come to Christ as this woman came, and touch the hem of his garment,

You Will Not Injure Him.

You ought to hesitate in getting good to yourself if you would injure the person through whom you obtain the good. But you will not injure the Lord Jesus Christ. He perceived that virtue had gone out of him, but he did not perceive it by any pain he felt: for rather do I believe that he perceived it by the pleasure which it caused him. Something gave him unusual joy. A faith-touch had reached him through his clothes, and he rejoiced to respond by imparting healing virtue from himself. You will not defile my Lord, O sinner, if you bring him all your sin. You cannot injure him though all your injurious thoughts, and words, and speeches be laid upon him. You will not be robbing him of anything though your faith-touch should convey a life into yourself.

None Refused.

Might not this also help you? Others just like you have ventured to him, and there has not been a case in which they have been refused. I thought, like you, when I was a child, that the gospel was a very wonderful thing, and free to everybody but myself. Yet, soon after I began to cry for mercy I found it. My expectations of difficulty were all sweetly disappointed. I believed and found immediate rest unto my soul. When I once understood that there was life in a look at the crucified one, I gave that look, and I found eternal life. Nobody ever bears a contrary witness. I challenge the universe to produce a man who was chased from Christ's door, or forbidden to find in him a Saviour. I pray you, therefore, observe that, since others have come this way to life and peace, God has appointed it to be the common thoroughfare of grace. Poor guilty sinners, there is a mark set up, "This way for sinners. This way for the guilty." This way for the hungry. This way for the thirsty. This way for the lost. Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Why, surely, you need not say, "If I may."

Now listen, friend: there is no room to say "If I may," for, first of all, you are invited to come and accept Christ as your Saviour—in the word of God. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." "Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." Jesus Christ invites all those that labor and are heavy laden to come unto him, and he will give them rest. God is honest in his invitations. Be you sure of that. If God invites you, he desires you to come and accept the invitation. After reading the many invitations of the word of God to such as you are, you may not say "If I may." It will be a wicked questioning of the sincerity of God.

Invited Over and Over Again

"If I may"—why, I think that this questioning ought to come to an end now. Will you not give it up? May the Holy Ghost show thee, poor sinner, that thou mayest now lay thy burden down at Jesus' feet, and be at once saved. Thou mayest believe. Thou hast full permission now to confess thy sin and to receive immediate pardon: see if it be not so. Cast thy guilty soul on him, and rise forgiven and renewed, henceforth to live in fervent gratitude, a miracle of love.

A Doubt of Power.

II. But then there arises in other hearts this equally bitter question, "But can I? I know that I may if I can; but I cannot." This woman, seeing the press, might have said, "If I can touch the hem of his garment, I shall be made whole; but can I get at him? Can a feeble person like myself force my way through the throng and touch him? Now, that is the question I am going to answer. The will to believe in Christ is as much a work of grace as faith itself, and where the will is given and a strong desire, a measure of grace is already received, and with it the power to believe. I say not that it is all, but I do say this—that if the power of God has made a man will to believe the greater work has been done, and his actually believing will follow in due course. That entire willingness to believe is nine-tenths of believing. I would have said to that woman, had I been there and known then what I know now, "Oh, woman, that faith of yours, that if you can but touch the hem of his garment you will be made whole, is a greater thing than the actual touch can be. It is not at present so operative, but it is a more singular product of grace. You have within you already the greater work of grace, and the less will follow. A thousand persons could press through the crowd and touch the hem of the Saviour's robe, but you are the only person in whom God has wrought the faith that a touch will make you whole.

But mark this, faith in Christ is the simplest action that anybody ever performs. I venture to put it very plainly when I say that faith in Christ differeth in no respect from except as to the person upon whom that faith is set. Thou believest in thy mother: thou mayest in the same manner believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Thou believest in thy friend: it is the same act that thou hast to do toward thy higher and better friend. Thou believest the news that is commonly reported and printed in the daily journals: it is the same act which believes the Scripture, and the promise of God.

The reason why faith in the Lord Jesus is a superior act to faith in any one else lies in this fact—that it is a superior person whom thou believest in, and superior news that thou dost believe; and thy natural heart is more averse to believing in Jesus than to believing in any one else. The Holy Spirit must teach thy faith to grasp the high things of Christ Jesus; but that grasp is by the hand of a simple child-like faith. But it is the same faith; mark thou that. It is the gift of God in so far as this—that God gives thee the understanding and the judgment to exercise it upon his Son, and to receive him.

The faith of a child in his father is almost always a wonderful faith; just the faith that we would ask for our Lord Jesus. As the child never thinks where the bread and butter is to come from tomorrow morning, and it never enters its little head to fret about where it will get new socks when the present ones are worn out, so must

You trust in Jesus

Christ for everything you want between here and heaven—trust him without asking questions. He can and will provide. Just give yourself up to him entirely, as a child gives itself up to a parent's care, and feels itself to be at ease. Oh, what a simple act it is!—this act of faith.

Oh, friend, do not think that faith is some difficult and puzzling thing, for then these senior wranglers and doctors of divinity would have it. It is the simplest act that the mind can perform. Just as a babe lies in its mother's bosom, unconscious of the thunderstorm, or of the rocking of the ship, quite safe and happy because it rests in the bosom of love; all fear and care laid aside because of that true heart which beats beneath: even so do thou just cast thyself altogether upon Christ, and that is all that thou hast to do—just, in fact, to leave off doing. "But shall I not have to do many good works?" says one. You shall do as much as ever you like when you are once saved; but in this matter of your salvation you must fling all self-righteousness away as so much devilry that will ruin and injure you, and come simply to Christ, and Christ alone, and trust in him.

A Doubt of Power.

"Oh," says one, "I think I see a little light. If I am enabled,—if I do but get power enough to trust in Jesus, I shall be made whole." I will ask thee another question. Dost thou not know that thou art bound to believe in Christ—that it is due to Christ that he be believed in? I would not make extensive claims upon your faith for myself. Often have I said to friends who have told me that they could not believe in Christ, "Could you believe in me? If I were to tell you that

A LONG SEARCH ENDED.

A CITIZEN of Newark, N. J., has just succeeded in a long and persistent quest. About thirty years ago he was living with his parents and a brother and sister in New York. The parents died within a few months of each other, and the children were separated. The mother's sister undertook the charge of the girl and the boys were adopted by two of their uncles. One of them went to live at Livingston, N. J., and the other lived in Michigan. The latter grew up in Michigan, but after he was able to support himself, he returned to the East and sought out his brother. He settled in 1871 at Newark, N. J. He frequently spoke to his brother about their sister and made many attempts to find her. Several times he made long journeys West and South on this business, beside exploring New York, Philadelphia, and other cities near home. He seemed never to weary of the search, though nothing came of it but loss of time and money. A few weeks ago he inserted an advertisement in a local journal and then for the first time he had a response. It came from Irvington, N. J., only five miles from Newark. He went thither immediately and had the joy of meeting his long lost sister. She was married, and had been living within five miles of his home all the twenty years that he had been searching for her in distant cities. It was a strange discovery, and his joy in finding her was alloyed with vexation that he had not sooner looked near home. The awakened sinner often makes an analogous mistake. He is apt to think he has a long and difficult journey of self reformation and painful conflict to travel before he can come to Christ, and is surprised to learn that Christ is near to him waiting to receive him. (Rom. 10: 6-8.)

THE PARACHUTE FAILED.

A SHOCKING fatality occurred near Cincinnati on Aug. 15. An immense crowd assembled to witness a daring parachute descent by a young woman who had achieved fame as an acrobat. She was to ascend in a balloon to a height of five hundred feet and thence descend by the aid of a parachute. At the appointed time she stepped into the car of the balloon which was soon rising rapidly. The crowd watched it with eager eyes. The excitement increased when the aeronaut was observed making preparations to descend. The parachute slowly unfolded and the figure of the woman could be seen holding to the ring beneath it. Suddenly a cry of horror was drawn from the gazing crowd. The parachute had closed and with its living burden was descending with frightful velocity. Women screamed and fainted and men turned away their faces that they might not see the inevitable catastrophe. In a few moments it was all over; the girl lay crushed on the earth, her gaudy clothing spattered with her life-blood. It was a terrible death and we can well understand how the spectators would be shocked, especially if they realized that they were not free from complicity in the calamity. The aeronaut would not have risked her life in that manner had she not been aware that thousands of persons would be attracted to see her risk it. We are not sufficiently careful about encouraging others to the commission of hazardous feats or to do wrong. He who laughs at profane or obscene jests, or who attends the lectures of infidels, or swells the crowd which struggles to get a sight of notorious criminals helps to make the wrongdoer believe that his wrongdoing is popular and so far is a partaker with him in his guilt. (II. John 11.)

A TOWN DISAPPEARING.

THE assistance of the Federal government is sought by the town of Plaquemine, La., under peculiar circumstances. The Mississippi River is swallowing it by degrees. When a low tide succeeds a high one, the people of Plaquemine have noticed great caves in the river banks where the water has undermined the earth. In a short time the undermined portion falls into the river and is carried away. This has been going on for more than five years. Not long ago a tract of land ten acres in extent fell into the river. There has been no loss of life because the danger was perceived some time before the land fell in. In some cases there was time to move the houses farther back. The loss of land, however, is serious. The owners of it and the citizens of Plaquemine are asking the Government to make more spurs in the river to divert the current, and to build a new levee. If this, or some other effective measure is not taken, the time is not far distant when the whole town will be swept away. A man would be deemed very foolish who bought land on the borders of the river and spent money on its cultivation after hearing that a cave had been made under it. Yet, he would not be more foolish than they who devote all their time and thoughts to this world's pleasures and pursuits, making no effort to secure eternal blessedness. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8: 36.)

A RELIC OF THE WAR.

AT the recent Grand Army reunion at Detroit, a veteran recovered a Bible which he lost thirty years ago. At the beginning of the war he joined a Michigan regiment, as a volunteer. When he was setting out for the front, his godly mother wrote his name in her Bible and gave it to him. He lost the book with his other baggage at the battle of Bull Run. It was found by a Confederate soldier who wrote on the fly-leaf, under the mother's inscription, the date and place where he found it. The finder appears to have carried it with him, for it was in a knapsack, picked up by a Union soldier on the field at Bristow Station, in October, 1863. He added another memorandum to those on the fly-leaf, and carried the volume with him until the close of the war. Since that time he has made many efforts to discover the original owner, but without success. He took it with him to Detroit a few weeks ago and there at last he heard of a comrade, whose name was the same as that contained in the first inscription on the fly-leaf. The Bible was shown to him and he recognized it immediately. The mother who gave it to him has long been dead, so it was with a double pleasure that he regained the long-lost treasure. We may hope that he will value it for its own sake, as well as for its association with his mother. It must have proved useful in the war, or the three soldiers, who had it in turn, would not have carried it with them; but it need not be laid aside with the weapons of war, for there are other conflicts in which it will help him. In his struggle to overcome self and sin and Satan he can have no better weapon than "the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God." (Eph. 6: 17.)

A ROMANCE OF THE WIRE.

AN acquaintance, commenced by two telegraph operators over the wire, has had a romantic sequel. The Herald of Los Angeles, Cal., states that about a year ago a young man was appointed telegraph operator at a desolate spot on the desert side of Yuma. There was very little business done there and there were days when the operator saw no one but the ignorant trackmen at work on the railroad that passed his station. In his loneliness he struck up an acquaintance with the operator at Banning, who was, he believed, a very lively and intelligent man. The acquaintance ripened, until the most pleasant hours of the day were those he spent morning and evening chatting over the wire, on a variety of topics, with his comrade at Banning. One morning this summer, he learned, to his regret, that his friend was going away for a vacation and consequently he would be deprived for about two weeks of the pleasant talks. But the Banning man was to pass through Yuma and promised to make his acquaintance in the flesh. The Yuma man was looking forward to this visit when he was suddenly stricken down with fever, and on the day fixed for the visit he was delirious. In the days which followed he was dimly conscious of receiving unusual care and attentive nursing, and as he gradually recovered consciousness, he was surprised to see a lady busy about his room. He was too weak to question her then; but the next day he asked her who she was and where she came from. To his amazement he learned that his devoted nurse was no other than the Banning operator whom he had supposed all along to be a man. She had given all her vacation to nursing him and doing his duties as operator. The patient was overwhelmed with surprise. He lay and thought over all his conversations with the girl over the wire and of her kindness. The next time he spoke it was to ask her if she would marry him when he recovered. The reply was prompt and in the affirmative. The lady considered that she already knew him well and had no hesitation in trusting her future in his hands. In fact she declared that she loved him before she saw him. That such an attachment is possible there can be no doubt, and it is more likely to endure than are attachments aroused by personal beauty, for it is based on character. None know how firm and abiding that basis is so well as Christians who are able to say, "Whom having not seen we love." (1. Peter 1: 8.)

A NEW AUTOMATIC SIGNAL.

RECENT railroad accidents in tunnels have directed the attention of railroad men to the necessity of a better system of signalling. One ingenious man at Peekskill, N. Y., has invented a combination which seems to be all that they require. Signal posts are to be placed at intervals through the tunnel, each of which has an arm that may be lowered when an obstruction has occurred and it is necessary to stop an approaching train. When the arm is lowered it will strike a lever projecting from the locomotive. The lever is connected with a large gong, and when it strikes the signal arm, the gong sounds instantly. Thus, if the engineer is not looking out for the signals, the sound of the gong arouses him and tells him of danger ahead. He would then naturally shut off steam and instantly apply the brakes. He would be wiser about his duties than are sinners, who, though they are warned that their course leads to destruction, continue their headlong career. (Prov. 29: 1.)

A NOVEL SUIT FOR DAMAGES.

THE Minneapolis correspondent of a New York daily journal reports the commencement in that city of a strange lawsuit. It is brought by a young man against a young lady on the ground that the plaintiff is entitled to damages for suffering caused by the defendant's flirting. It is not, the plaintiff is careful to explain, a breach of promise suit. The defendant is willing and ready to marry him as she agreed to do. But it is alleged that she has broken her contract. The plaintiff asserts that when they became engaged he explicitly told her that he was strongly opposed to flirting, and therefore he should expect her to be satisfied with the attentions he should pay her during their engagement, and to reject any offer of attention from other young men. If she did not think she should be so satisfied, he asked her to reject his offer at the outset. She agreed, he says, to the condition and they became engaged. Plaintiff now alleges that since the engagement she has repeatedly violated her promise, and he cites specific acts of flirting. He has therefore cancelled the engagement and asks the court to award him damages as compensation for the expense, loss of time and mental torture he has endured. He suggests $5,000 as a suitable sum. He evidently takes a very business-like view of the affair and displays none of the delicacy or chivalry which are expected in a lover. Most young men would have been content with cancelling the engagement. His position, however, is logical. If his allegations are true, the young lady entered into the engagement knowing his aversion and promising to respect it. It was optional to her to reject an engagement binding her to abstain from association with other admirers; but having accepted the conditions she should have observed them. She probably found it more difficult to keep her pledge than she supposed it would be when she made it. The same mistake is often made by young people who join the church during a revival. In their first enthusiasm they think they can cleave to Christ and abstain from worldly pleasures. They understand that Christ wants all their heart, and they promise to give it to him. But afterward, when temptation comes, too many of them yield to it, forgetting their Lord's warning. (Luke 14: 26, 27.)

I would do such and such things, would you believe it?" "Oh yes, sir." When I receive such confidence from one of my fellow-creatures, I feel that it is cruelly wrong for the same person to say, "I cannot trust Christ." Not trust him? What madness is this! My own conviction is that a great many of you can, and that already, to a large extent, you do; only you are looking for signs and wonders which will never come. Why not exert that power a little farther? The Spirit of God has given you a measure of faith; oh, believe more fully, more unreservedly.

Now, dear hearts, if any of you who have never trusted Christ will trust him to-night, if you perish

I Will Perish With You!

For, though I have known my Lord these nine and thirty years, I have no other hope of salvation than I had when I first came to him. I had no merits of my own then, and I have none now. I have preached many sermons, offered many prayers, given much alms, brought many souls to Christ; but I place all that ever I have done under my feet, and desire, as far as it is good, to give to God the glory of it; but as far as it comes of myself, I would sink it in the sea. I am saved in Christ, by faith in him; but confidence in myself is detestable to me.

Come; we start fair, you see. If we start to-night, you and I will start on the level, with the same confidence in the same Saviour, the same blood to cleanse us, and the same power to save us, and we will meet in heaven. Oh, that you would trust him now, and believe him. "I have no good works," says one. Then for certain you cannot trust in them. You will be forced to trust in Jesus only. "Oh, but I have no good feelings," I am glad to hear you say so. Then you are not tempted to trust in feelings, but will be drawn to trust wholly on your Lord. "Oh, but I feel so unfit." Very well, then you cannot trust in your fitness, but must trust in him alone. It is a blessing when spiritual poverty forces a man into the way of life.

The Test.

III. Here I close with these words. This woman said in her heart, "If I do touch the hem of his garment, I shall"—what? "I shall be made whole." It is not "If I may but touch I may be made whole." No; she had got over the maybe's in the first struggle. It is "If I may I shall." If you do to-night actually repose yourself in Christ, as the Lord liveth, you must live and be saved. Unless this Bible is all a lie, unless Jesus was a rank impostor, unless the eternal God can change, you that come and trust yourself with Jesus must and shall be saved in the last great day of account.

"Bold shall I stand in that great day," for I shall tell the Lord of his own promise, and how he bade me trust him; and if I am not saved then his word is broken, and that can never be. He is true. Oh, it is this that some of you want to have done with—thinking, and talking, and

Considering and Hoping.

You need now to come and trust, resting yourself fully and wholly on what Christ has done. He loved, and lived, and died that sinners might not die. He wrought a complete work, of which he said as he expired, "It is finished." There is nothing for you to add to it, nothing for you to bring with you to make that work complete; but you yourself, stripped naked of every hope, black, foul, guilty, abominable, the worst of the worst, have only to come and look up to those five wounds, and to that bleeding, thorn-crowned head, and to say, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit," and you shall be saved. It is done. "Thy sins which are many are forgiven thee. Go, and sin no more." Thou art his child. Go and live to the glory of thy Father; and may the peace of God that passeth all understanding be with thee forever and ever. Amen.

ROSE AGAINST SLAVERY.

African Natives Drive out the Arabs and Capture Stanley Falls.

ONE of the most interesting items of news from Africa during the week is that a battle has been fought at Stanley Falls, between the natives and their Arab oppressors, resulting in the total defeat of a considerable force of Arabs and the capture of the settlement by the natives. This is the first occasion in many years of a successful stand by native Africans against Arabs. Stanley Falls, which is about 1400 miles up the Congo river, is one of the principal Arab settlements in the great slave district. It was formerly a headquarters for Tippo Tib, the famous Arab trader and friend of Stanley. Over 150 Arabs are said to have been killed in the fight, and the rest of the party retreated up the river, to the larger fortified station of Nyangwe. It is significant that the natives have been making war, not upon the whites in this instance, but upon the Arabs who have been the chief cause of their misery and suffering for many years. Stanley Falls is by far the most imposing of any slave station in Central Africa. It is composed of well-built clay houses, and the fields of rice and other crops, as well as the cattle, are all scrupulously cared for. The present revolt is thought to have been encouraged by the knowledge that the Congo State desires to protect the natives against the slave trade.

The Congo State will probably have no difficulty in asserting its authority at Stanley Falls. It is worth noting that the only two occasions upon which trouble has occurred at Stanley Falls have been during Tippo Tib's absence. When the Arabs attacked the station in 1886 and drove Deane the explorer and his men into the wilderness, Tib was away at

STANLEY FALLS.

Zanzibar. He is again absent at a time when his own people have met with disaster. Naturally the sympathies of the civilized world will be with the natives, who have suffered terrible hardships in recent years at the hands of their oppressors, the Arabs, whose bands of Manyema warriors have devastated the forests in their hunt for ivory and robbed, slain, maltreated and enslaved such of the natives as opposed them. The usual plan of these armed bands was to surprise a village, capture as many women as possible and then compel the natives to ransom the captives with ivory tusks. By these means the crafty Arabs have robbed the natives around Stanley Falls for years of their stores of ivory. In the encounters unheard of outrages have occurred and hundreds of lives have been needlessly sacrificed by the raiding bands.

Most of these Arabs, like Tippo-Tib himself (whose portrait is given in this column) are not of pure descent, but inherit mixed negro blood and speak not Arabic, but the mixed dialects of Central Africa. They are Mohammedans, however, and despite their wild lives and murderous acts, are very strict in their creed. It was a strange accident that Stanley should have been the means of opening the way to these robber bands to new fields of murder and pillage, for not till the explorer had penetrated the regions of the Upper Congo, did the Arabs or their mercenaries, the Manyemas, ever appear at Stanley Falls to disturb the peaceful lives of the natives of that section. Although of late slave raiding has been greatly decreased, the ivory hunting on the old plan continues and is the means of inflicting untold misery on the natives, who have at last risen and overpowered their masters by sheer force of numbers. The battle at Stanley Falls is one of a series of encounters arising out of raids from Nyangwe, in each of which the Arabs have been beaten by the natives without the assistance of the soldiers of the Congo State.

SOWING THE SEED.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 27.
Isa 32 : 10 ; John 4 : 36.

IT is the Christian's business. Christ expects him to sow. The man of one talent was punished, because he did not use that one. "Go, ye and preach," was not a command to the Apostles only; it is a command to every one who knows in his own soul what the Gospel is. He is to tell others what a blessing it is and, by his life and conduct, show how it has blessed him. The seed in the farmer's own barn is useless. It must be sown before it will bring forth fruit. The seed is committed to us to be used. The next generation, as well as our own, will prove whether we have hoarded it, or wasted it, or sowed it carelessly, or sowed it in the right ground, in the right manner, at the right time. No opportunity is to be neglected, the blessing is to them who sow beside all waters. And it is not to be neglected after it is sown. The sending "thither of the feet of the ox and the ass" spoken of in the first text is an allusion to the Oriental custom of driving animals over the wet land on which the seed has been sown that it may be trodden in. When it is sown on light, sandy soil, the plough follows the sower, serving the purpose of the harrow. Then the result is with God. We cannot make it grow. Our duty is done and our responsibility ceases when the seed is in the ground, but not till then. It may not grow because of peculiarities of the soil. It may grow, yet not in the lifetime of the sower. Another may reap and the sower may know nothing of it.

Pastor Spurgeon who has probably been the means of the conversion of more people than any living man, was himself converted under the preaching of a man whose name he does not know, and who must have died without knowing what a harvest has come from the seed he sowed in the little church that winter morning. God knew and he that sowed and he that reaped will one day rejoice together.

A godly mother gave her son a Bible when he went to college. There was not a Christian young man in the institution when he went there. Religion was ridiculed. Every student was a scoffer. The young man shut and locked his door when he read his Bible lest he should be seen and ridiculed. One day a fellow-student found the book in his room and, learning that the owner read it, asked if he might come and read it, too. Three more students afterward joined those two. They began to pray together over the Word and the meetings grew until numbers of them were converted and some of them are now preaching the Gospel in the South and West and one of them is the President of a college for the training of ministers.

A minister was holding revival meetings in Edinburgh when the president of an infidel society came in, and ridiculed the proceedings, and tried to prevent some persons whom he knew asking for prayer. "Are you a Christian?" he was asked by the minister conducting the meetings. "No," was the reply. "Do you want to be a Christian?" was the next question. "No, I do not," was the answer in a very decided tone. "Will you kneel down and let me pray with you?" the minister asked. "No, it would be of no use; I do not believe in it," said the infidel. "Well I will pray for you," said the minister and, then and there, he knelt down and prayed for the man's conversion. "I don't feel any different," said the infidel with a laugh, when the minister rose. "Very likely," said the minister, "God chooses his own time to answer, but he will answer. I am sure of that." "We shall see," said the infidel. Three years afterward, the minister was holding services in the same place and again the infidel was present, but this time it was to say that God had answered the prayer, and now he was seeking the Lord and desired prayer for his salvation.

The harvest is not hap-hazard. The seed has life in it, and often when it falls on uncongenial ground it stays until the ground is changed by its very presence. Then the seed, sowed long before, grows and bears fruit. But whether there is fruit or not, "To him that soweth righteousness shall be a sure reward." (Prov. 11:18.) And there is a law of production here as in the natural world. "He that soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully." (II. Cor. 9:6.)

AN ENGLISH CIRCLE.

A CHEERING report of the progress of the Order of King's Daughters comes from over the Atlantic. One circle, which was the first organized there, and is called "The Southport and Birkdale Guild," has sent a set of its papers, which are published in the Silver Cross. They show that our English friends have realized the spirit of the Order and are carrying it out in an effective manner. One of these papers is a letter to the children, explaining the principles of the Order. It concludes with these words: "It may be well for you to think in what way you can help some poor and suffering children, for whatever we do for others in their need, Jesus says it is the same as if we did it for him. His words are: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' We are all brothers and sisters of a large family, and God is our Father and we are to love him as Christ did, and ask him to help us to do right and follow Jesus, who is the Truth and the Life and the Way up to the throne of God."

The members of the Order are making a number of articles, of which they send a list, for distribution among the poor. Among them are: knitted stockings, socks, vests, mufflers, crocheted shawls, and a variety of small articles of clothing for children, which will be very acceptable in the winter. Beside this they are making up a case of nice things to send to the Evelina Hospital for children where 232 little ones now lie sick. Evidently there will be some people, young and old, in England this winter who will be thankful for the organization of the Order of King's Daughters in that land.

SUBDUED BY A ROSE.

WHEN, in the day of final account, the King honors those who ministered to him in prison in the person of his brethren, many of the King's Daughters will be rewarded. Many circles make regular visits to the prisons, and if any of the King's brethren and sisters should be there, they minister unto them, and also to some who by the blessing of God may become such, by faith. One of these blessed ministers had a remarkable experience in a prison not long ago. A correspondent of the Silver Cross, the organ of the King's Daughters, tells the story, which she vouches for as true. She says that a young lady, beautiful and wealthy, who had been brought to Christ, was led by her love to the Lord to visit the prison. One day, before going on her errand of mercy, she went to the conservatory and bade the gardener fill a basket with flowers. She noticed that he passed a lovely white rose. She asked him to put that too in the basket, but he pleaded to keep it back that she might wear it herself in the evening. She would not hear of it and had it put with the others. "I may need it more where I am going," she said.

"Reaching the prison, she commenced her rounds among the women's wards, giving a few blossoms to each inmate, with a leaflet, a text, or a word of sympathy and Christian hope.

"Have I seen all the prisoners?" she asked the gaoler.

"No; there is one whom you cannot visit, her language is so wicked it would scorch your ears to hear it."

"She is the one who most needs me," she answered. "Can you take me to her?"

Then when they confronted each other on either side of the grated door, the visitor was greeted with curses, and the only reply she gave was the beautiful white rose, which was left in the woman's cell. As she turned away she heard one heart-breaking cry, and the voice that had breathed imprecations, moaned over and over again the one word: "Mother! mother! mother!"

The next week she went again. The gaoler met her, saying: "That woman whom you saw last is asking for you constantly; I never saw a woman so changed."

Soon the two were alone in the cell, and the penitent, her head resting on the shoulder of her new friend, told, with sobs, her sad story.

"That white rose was just like one which grew by our door, at home in Scotland; my mother's favorite flower. She was a good woman; my father's character was stainless, but I broke their hearts by my wicked ways, then drifted to America, where I have lived a wicked life; is there any hope for me?"

And so the dawning of a better day came, as the two "reasoned together."

Many visits the lady made to that narrow room, until she seemed an angel of light to its inmate. When the time came for the woman's release, the love of Christ constraining her, she went out into the world to devote her life to the saving of such as she had been.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

AN International Conference of Young Women's Christian Associations will assemble in Chicago on October 13, and continue till October 16. The meetings will be held in the Athenaeum Building corner of Van Buren Street and Michigan Avenue. All the Associations in the United States and Canada will be represented by regularly appointed delegates and many private members will also attend. Among the papers to be read at the Conference one of the most important will be by Miss Grace H. Dodge who will speak on "Co-operation, Self-Government, Self-Reliance—What do the Three Principles Imply?" Miss Dodge's experience in connection with Working Girls' Clubs abundantly fits her to deal with this subject. Other papers more directly affecting Christian work and the management of Christian Associations will be read. Mrs. James M. Brodie the Corresponding Secretary is preparing a programme which will be issued in a few days. Much good is expected from the interchange of ideas and the comparison of methods of work which will take place at this conference. It is noticed that since the Conference in London last spring, the Associations represented there have become more energetic and efficient. At that assembly, Associations were represented either by delegates or written reports in England, Scotland, Ireland, India and many other countries.

A SOUTHERN SOCIETY.

FROM New Orleans comes a testimony to the value of the Christian Endeavor movement. Mr. George L. Wagner reports that the Society organized in the Memorial Presbyterian Church of that City a year and a half ago, with about a dozen members has grown until it is necessary to enlarge the room in which the meetings are held. Besides carrying on the ordinary Christian Endeavor work the Society has given a series of entertainments which have given publicity to the work and have brought additions to the membership. To most of these the public has been admitted without charge. About a month ago, however, when a new carpet was needed, the Young People's Society undertook to raise the funds and an entertainment was given, for admission to which a charge was made, and the result was a social and financial success. Similar entertainments are in contemplation for the benefit of the library; for the sick poor of the parish and for other religious and philanthropic purposes. As the members of the Society take part in these entertainments it is evident that the work is having a double benefit in developing their powers as well as helping the good causes directly benefited.

THE NEW Secretary of the College Association in the Mt. Hermon Boy's School of Northfield, Mass. is Mr. James McConaughy, who has for the past eight years been the most efficient Associate Secretary of the Twenty-third Street Branch of the Y. M. C. A., in New York. His loss from the work in New York is very severely felt, but his friends rejoice in his promotion to this very influential position. Mr. McConaughy has also undertaken to teach the Bible Class at Mt. Hermon.

Mr. KUSSAKA, a young Japanese, who is now in this country was entertained recently at the German Y. M. C. A. in New York. He speaks German correctly and fluently, but knows no English. He has come on a visit here mainly for the purpose of acquiring the English language and familiarizing himself with Y. M. C. A. work in America.

ONLY ONE.

YOU have only one mother to make
A home ever sweet for your sake,
Who toils day and night,
For you with delight—
To help her all pains ever take.

You have only one mother to miss
When she has departed from this,
So love and revere
That mother while here—
Sometime you won't know her kind kiss.

You have only one mother, just one;
Remember that always, my son;
None can or will do
What she has for you—
What have you for her ever done?

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

A Market-Day Visit Among the Simple Folks of Central Africa.

AFTER the dinner and dessert had disappeared, the "hopes of the household" once more clustered around Uncle John, as he drew up his big chair by the open fireplace. "If all the fruits but one were gone out of the world," began Tom, as he finished the last morsel of a luscious banana, "I think the one to be left should be this, Uncle. Don't you?"

"You love the banana, then?" asked the traveller.

"Yes, we all do," said the children, in chorus. "Next to peaches and—better'n apples and pears," added Millie, with eager eyes.

"Well, it would sustain life, of course, my dear, but I'm afraid you would soon grow tired of bananas, sweet as they are. The best I have ever eaten were those I bought in Africa."

"Like these of the West Indies, which you had on the table at dinner, they are of different sizes and shades of color, but the fruit is the same. There is an old legend which says that the tree of knowledge of good and evil of which our first parents ate was a banana tree, and that the tree was in Ceylon, which is one of the most delightful islands in the whole world. You remember Bishop Heber's hymn—"

"Yes interrupted Tom, "I know it. It goes:

What though the spicy breezes
Blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle,
And every prospect pleases,
And only man is vile."

"That's the hymn," said Uncle, approvingly. "I am glad to find you with such an excellent memory, Tom. Well, I was going to say that the banana, while it is a common fruit there, is only one of many native products, which we in this climate regard as something of a luxury. I recall a visit I made in Africa to the market-place at Bissan, the old capital of Portuguese Guinea. The market was held in the square in the centre of the village. Men and women had come in early from the surrounding country with native baskets, woven of fibre and filled with cassava root, corn, kola nuts, picked fowls and an esculent very like the sweet potato. Cassava is somewhat like the West Indian manioc and is very nutritious and palatable. It tastes not unlike tapioca or Brazilian arrow-root. Besides these, they bring many other fruits, hampers of corn and piles of redwood."

"Are these people savages?" asked one of the children.

"By no means. They are a very simple honest race, living a pastoral or farming life. Left to themselves and without disturbance by warlike outsiders, they would pass their existence peacefully. Many years ago, Christianity was brought to their section of the 'Dark Continent,' and there are among them many very good Christians. A rude kind of civilization prevails. Honesty and truthfulness are valued among the highest virtues. The native chiefs are the principal traders and generally control the traffic of a district. Debtors who won't pay what they owe are treated very to be told that, no matter where you travel in severely, their property being seized by the creditors. Formerly a delinquent debtor would have been seized and sold into slavery for what he owed, but slavery is now, happily, a thing of the past in that part of Africa. Much of the trade comes from caravans, but in some places there is quite a local traffic in the way of exchange of products. Native merchants are respected and their goods are generally safe, even in times of feud or actual warfare."

"Don't they sell anything except food?" inquired Tom.

"Yes; they have a kind of native cotton cloth which I must say is of good quality and very durable, although it doesn't look as nicely finished as our own cottons. It will last a good deal longer, though. Their dresses are usually cotton, dyed in different colors. Some of these dresses worn on festival occasions are quite gay in colors. See, here is a photograph of the people at market. You observe how picturesquely they are dressed."

"Why, they're nearly like our civilized folks, only black," remarked Tom.

"You expected, then, that I would speak to you of people who lived in woods and caves or in trees, like wild beasts? There are very few such in Africa, although that was the condition of many of the tribes less than fifty years ago. I know it surprises most people

MARKET-DAY SCENE AT BISSAN, AFRICA.

From a photograph secured by one of Bishop Taylor's Missionaries.

Africa, you can never be off some well-beaten track for more than a day or two at a time. The whole country may be likened to a system of villages connected by paths. No country in the world has more paths. Every village is connected with some other village, and thus all the tribes have relations with each other, and every state with its neighbor. This is a great help to an explorer, for one village directs him on to another, and if he be a man of discretion, he will avoid troublesome tribes by making proper inquiry as he passes along. The truth is that except in rare cases, such as that of Stanley when he crossed the great Congo forest, a traveller need never take to the woods. He would starve, in all probability, if he did. You know a large part of Stanley's command came near starving to death once."

"Then the corn and nuts and bananas don't grow wild?"

"Some few things do, but Indian corn, cassava, mawere, beans and bananas don't grow wild, even in Africa. They are all regularly cultivated by the villagers and as one travels through, everything has to be paid for in cloth or beads. You can always buy, if the chief consents, and that gained, the villagers bring out abundance and are only too willing to sell."

"Do they worship idols at Bissan, uncle?"

"No, since receiving the Gospel they have put away their idols. Superstition still prevails, but idolatry is a thing of the past."

Lincoln's Advice to Boys.

NEVER cultivate the acquaintance of one who sneers at a mother's love or authority. Abraham Lincoln once told a young man to avoid every person who talked slightly of his mother's apron-strings, and it is a very safe thing to do. It is just such talk that brings many to ruin and disgrace, for they are ashamed not to do as other boys do, when they make fun of mother. Always keep your engagement with your mother. Never disappoint her if you can possibly help it, and when advised to cut loose from her apron-strings, cut the adviser, and take a tighter clutch of the apron-strings. This will bring joy and long life to your mother, the best friend you have in the world, and will insure you a noble future, for it is impossible for a good son to be a bad man.

Coolie Mothers of India.

THE last twenty years have wrought a great improvement in the condition of the women of India. "In my opinion," writes Bishop Thoburn, "the coolie women are incalculably better off than the wives of well-to-do men or the purdah women, for they do not exist as parasites but work out their own salvation. The consciousness of the power to earn money, the freedom to walk the streets, to exercise their muscles, to breathe pure air, to come in contact with the world about them, all tend to make them strong, well, and comparatively evangelization and enlightenment before these Hindoo wives and mothers fill their proper sphere, but they are gradually getting nearer to it every year.

THE FAITH OF A CHILD.

CHILDHOOD'S faith is very beautiful. In a town of Holland there lived a very poor woman. One night her children asked her in vain to give them bread, for she had none. The poor woman loved the Lord, and knew that he was good; so, with her little ones around her, she earnestly prayed to him for food. On arising from her knees, the eldest child, a boy about eight years old, said softly, "Dear mother, we are told in the Holy Book that God supplied his prophet with food brought by the ravens."

"Yes, my son," the mother answered, "but that was a very long time ago."

"But, mother, what God has done once, may he not do again? I will go and unclothe the door to let the birds fly in."

Then dear little Dirk, in simple faith, threw the door wide open, so that the light of their lamp fell on the path outside.

Soon after, the burgomaster (a magistrate, or one employed in the government of the city) passed by, and seeing the light, paused, and, thinking it very strange, he entered the cottage, and inquired why they left the door open at night.

The widow replied, smiling, "My little Dirk did it, sir, that the ravens might fly in to bring bread to my hungry children."

"Indeed!" cried the burgomaster; "then here is a raven, my boy. Come to my home, and you shall see where bread may soon be had." So he quickly led the boy along the street to his own house, and then sent him back with food that filled the humble home with joy.

After supper, little Dirk went to the open door, and, looking up, he said, "Many thanks, good Lord!" then shut it fast again; for, though no bird had come, he knew that God had heard his mother's prayer, and sent them timely help.

Looking Back to Boyhood.

As years slip by and middle age comes on, we are apt to indulge in retrospective moods. We recall, as though it were but yesterday, the days of our boyhood and the innocent pleasures we then enjoyed, when every day was like a month and every hour like a day. Did you ever think what you would do if you were a boy again? Bishop Vincent writes very charmingly about this, so charmingly that every youth who reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ought to read what he says. "If I were a boy with my man's wisdom," writes the Bishop, "I would never touch tobacco, chewing-gum or patent medicines; never once go to bed without cleansing my teeth; never let a year go by without a dentist's inspection and treatment; never sit up late at night unless a great emergency demanded it, never linger one moment in bed when the time came for getting up; I should keep my own secrets, except as I revealed them to my father and mother for the sake of securing their advice; I should never speak a word to any one who might be worried by it; and speak only kind words of others. I should put no unclean thoughts, pictures, sights or stories in my memory and imagination, and no foul words on my tongue; give no smiles, but, 've, the rather, black frowns and prompt and a 'I reproof, to any comrade who dared in my presence to utter a filthy speech. I should treat little folks kindly, and not tease them; show respect to servants. Read the best literature—spend my Sabbaths reverently; try to be a practical, every-day Christian; help on every good cause; never make sport of sacred things; be 'about my Father's business,' like the boy of Nazareth; and thus I would try to be a Christian gentleman, wholesome, sensible, cheerful, independent, courteous."

Pretty good schedule for a boy to live up to, isn't it? Yet there are many who, with God's help and the advice of good fathers and pious mothers, come very near being the Bishop's idea of perfect boys.

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

MR. MURRAY, the next Saturday, took Robert to see a physician. The doctor said the boy was outgrowing his strength, and the change from country to school and city life had pulled him down. He ordered cod-liver oil and port wine.

"Port trash, you mean," cried Mr. Murray, "port old leather and logwood and wormy prunes, and drugs ad libitum. There is not a quart of pure port in the country, not a quart leaves Oporto, doctor, yet we Americans say we import it, and we drink it yearly by the hoghead! Why do you order what isn't to be had, and if it were to be had I wouldn't touch it, and Robert should not."

The doctor smiled at his irascible patient. He had had Mr. Murray to deal with before. But Mr. Murray was rich, and riches cover a multitude of sins and hard words. As Mr. Murray would have none of the port wine, the doctor said:

"All right, give him an emulsion of cod-liver oil, and as you won't use port, use iron and quinine; that will tone him up. Give him the iron through a glass tube, so as not to spoil those handsome teeth."

Mr. Murray took Robert a long drive up the Wissahickon, and bought him plentiful cod-liver oil, iron, and quinine.

"Port," he growled, "port wine, indeed! A pretty notion, giving that poison to a boy to strengthen him."

And also, Mr. Murray, though you did not know it, a pretty notion, a very pretty notion, to give a boy cod-liver oil and iron and quinine to heal a heart-break, and cure him of homesickness, and chase dark care away that sits on his shoulder, croaking, "They shared all with you. They gave you a home; you are rich, you have more than all you need, and you are doing nothing for them, and they are to be turned out of the home you shared, the only home you ever knew, and which you loved so well."

No amount of cod-liver oil could exorcise this demon of care—no doses of iron and quinine could change this burthen of misery, this dirge of the fortunes of the mill, into a song of joy. Robert's spirits sank lower and lower in spite of the doctor's nostrums. Mr. Murray began to be astonished at the failure of potions. He did not know that while duly taking his medicine, his son was losing sleep and appetite.

The letters from Lal's Mountain came every week. There were no complaints in them; but much that might be construed into ill news or forewarning of disaster. Mr. Wick was very low. Mr. Wick's nephew had been there with a man valuing property to look at the mill site. A fresher had brought some logs heavily down stream and broken a great piece from the wheel. That dear old wheel! Robert felt as if he had lost a piece of his own flesh in hearing that some of its sodden, mossy buckets had been carried away. What hours had he stood hand-in-hand with Pink gazing with childish wonder at that wheel's ceaseless revolutions, and laughing with glee at the rainbows flashing in its spray!

"Father did not know whether it would be worth while to mend the wheel. Whatever happened, mother said they should all keep together."

Then in February came worse news. There had been a January break-up, and blocks of ice had come down the creek, as on the occasion of that famous voyage when Robert was captain of the Fair-Weather and Pink was crew. And a block of ice had cut a fearful hole in the old barge,—had indeed torn a great piece out of her stern, and it was of no use to try and repair it. The barge was too worn-out for repairs. Besides, voyages did not pay now, and none of them felt much heart for taking one since Robert was gone. Even if they got to Philadelphia, they might not be allowed to see Robert.

However, the barge Fair-Weather was to be broken up and sold for fuel.

"The dear old barge, Robert, in which we have had such good times. I think we all cried to see it finally ruined."

After these mournful, loving, despairing letters, Robert would be more profoundly sad, and, while no longer neglecting his books to dream, would sit listless in play-hours and fail to eat his meals, and was a very forlorn-looking lad indeed.

All these signs of trouble did the Principal connect with the letters from Lal's Mountain. To these letters he objected in toto. He did not believe in much letter-writing for school-boys. A weekly letter to mother, or sister, or father, or guardian, was enough for any reasonable boy. The Lal's Mountain letters were not very praiseworthy or improving specimens of English literature. The Principal resolved that they should be forbidden. But the first of March brought a letter longer and more pitiful than all the rest. The Principal glanced at the six closely-written pages signed, "Your loving Pink." He did not read them; they were not worth it; but Mr. Murray would call that day, and he should order Robert to drop the Pink correspondence.

Robert read the letter,—a most dreadful letter it seemed to him,—full of the anguish of Pink's heart. Old Mr. Wick was dead:

"Buried yesterday, and Jonas his nephew has been here, and says he means to foreclose the mortgage, and we must go in one month. At that time the property will be sold to a man from New York, who means to build a summer hotel here on the mill site. He is going to tear the dear old mill down, and we will not get any money for it. They say the ground will only bring the value of the mortgage. We shall not have a penny, and we do not know where we shall go. In a little while I shall not know where to tell you to direct my letters. Oh, I'm so glad, dear Robert, that you have a home, and are not to be turned out as we are. If we had any furniture, perhaps we could go to Lacy and take boarders. Father says maybe we should get a couple of rooms from the Britts and let him go West to look for something. But, you know, father has no money to go West, and he cannot get along without mother. Father takes after me; he cannot do sums. Since you have been away, Robert, all my sums have been wrong. I am so sorry, for if I could do sums, perhaps I could be a school-teacher sometime, and earn as much as thirty dollars a month to give to poor, dear mother."

This was the heart-rending epistle which Robert read and re-read, until it seemed as if all the letters burned in red fire. While he read it the Principal talked to Mr. Murray.

"It is true, Robert is not looking well. I think he will never feel or look well as long as he keeps up his correspondence with those Allen people. He is perceptibly more listless and moody after every letter. Really, Mr. Murray, you should forbid the correspondence."

"It would make the poor boy so unhappy."

"Only for a little while. He would soon forget. Boys always do. Now his mind is distracted and his attention diverted by those letters all the time. Next thing, he will fancy himself in love with this Pink. I assure you, you do him a great injury when you let him keep this thing up. In school, nothing but school-ideas should be tolerated."

"Well, perhaps so; but I hate to grieve Robert."

"He'll be over it in a week. Take him to Washington for his spring holidays. Show him the Patent Office, the Congressional Library, the Smithsonian,—you can make it as improving as a fortnight in school."

Mr. Murray suspected that this might not be a very enlivening holiday.

"The longer this goes on, the worse and harder it will be. You tell me you want to break the boy away from this family, who are not advantageous acquaintances. Then do it promptly. I understand boys, and I advise you for your son's benefit. Let him have an undivided mind for his books."

"Very well! I'll speak to him about it this afternoon."

"I will send for him to come to you presently," said the Principal. "Meanwhile I wish to tell you—"

Here the Principal was called out to see a telegram that had come for some one of his boys.

Mr. Murray sat dreading his interview with Robert. How could he forbid the letters on which Robert's heart was so set?

Suddenly the door was flung open almost against him as he sat.

"Mr. Mason! Mr. Mason!" cried the excited voice of the tutor, "will you telephone for a doctor for young Murray? He is in an awful way. Quick, sir! I fear he is dying."

By this time the young tutor, pale and at his wits' end, had got fairly into the room and saw—not Mr. Mason, the Principal—but the father of "young Murray."

Mr. Murray rose from his chair behind the door. His teeth chattered, his body shook as with ague, a cold sweat poured over his face. He could not utter a word, but, with eyes wide and full of agony, glared at the frightened tutor, who had just said that Robert was dying.

"Are you there, sir? Come, come to Robert! Where is Mr. Mason? We must have a doctor. This way, sir. The fellows are carrying Robert to the infirmary."

The tutor had lost all his presence of mind. He dashed back into the hall and Mr. Murray followed him. Ascending the stairs, he saw six of the largest pupils carrying an inert form—the form of his son. He saw the boy's hands dangling lifeless,—and what a dead weight he was on his comrades' young arms!

"That's poor Murray's father," said North.

Already it was "poor Murray!"

The tutor had rushed off to seek the Principal, and Mr. Murray, dazed with misery, climbed the stairs after those who carried his son. The boys went on and on, up to the infirmary in the fourth story.

It was a large, light, sunny, well-aired, silent, beautiful room, with great, soft, invalid chairs and two white beds. On one of these beds the boys laid Robert, and began, under North's directions, to get off his shoes, coat, and necktie. Mr. Murray bent over him, too distracted to aid in undressing him.

Robert's face was pallid; his eyelids, half closed, showed that the eyes were set and rolled upward; his beautiful, curly, dark hair was damp with a cold sweat. Mr. Murray wondered to see how thin and white and wan the lately robust boy had become. How wonderfully like his poor dead mother he looked as she had been in her last illness and in her coffin! He could do nothing but clasp and stroke Robert's unconscious head and call him:

"Robert! Robert, My dear son! Robert, speak to me!"

"Robert's governor takes it uncommon hard, don't he?" whispered one lad to another, in the corner of the infirmary. "Looks just as if he was going to die, don't he, poor chap!"

Up came the tutor and Principal and a doctor. The doctor was a very young man, and Mr. Murray eyed him with suspicion, as he drew near the bed, in which the boys, aided by the matron, had now placed Robert.

"Doctor Lee, Mr. Murray," said the Principal. "He is attending a cousin of his here in the next room, young Morgan, who has a slight attack of lung fever. I found Doctor Lee at the door, just coming to see Morgan, and I brought him to Robert at once. We can send for your own doctor presently, if you prefer."

Mr. Murray stepped back a little, making way for Doctor Lee, who begun to examine his patient.

"He seems very much prostrated. Nervous system quite run down; his pulse is very weak and wiry. Brain fever. How was he taken? Did anything happen?"

"We were reading our letters," said North. "Murray read his three times. I noticed him, he looked queer, and all at once began to cry out, not words, but queer little shrieks, and roll his eyes, and then, all in a minute, he fell over against the desk. It was something about his letter, I think. See, here is his letter in his hand now—all crumpled up."

"I told you so," said the Principal, taking Pink's melancholy pages from Robert's unresisting hand, and giving them to Mr. Murray.

"The boy has evidently got into a very low state, and had a nervous shock of some kind. I saw a case just like this, when I was a school-boy,—all came from intense home-sickness and sudden news of a sister's death. It was that case first turned my attention to the study of medicine. Get me these things which I have written down at once, please, Mr. Mason. Have you an ice-bag? Ice? Clear the room, have those curtains drawn. This side of the house must be kept very quiet. Is this the young gentleman's father? Do not despair, sir. Your son is young, and seems to have a very fine physique. We shall pull him through, I hope."

Only hope—when this distracted man wanted certainty, assurance! It had never once entered into Mr. Murray's mind that his son might die. He had lost him for years, and suffered horrible misery. He had found him; he expected to keep him forever. He should not bury Robert,—Robert, a man of middle age, should bury him; and here was this treasured boy, lying near to death. The young doctor seemed to understand the case, and to be very earnest and sympathetic; he toiled over his patient; had a hospital nurse sent for; praised Robert's beauty; encouraged poor Mr. Murray.

Mr. Murray could not be persuaded to leave Robert's bed for a second. He drank a cup of tea that was brought him, and sat by the bed to share the watch of the nurse. Robert moaned, tossed, muttered. During the night, Mr. Murray thought of the letter which had been given to him. He would see what it was that had so disastrously affected Robert. He went into the hall, and read it by the gas.

The simple letter filled him with strange pity and contrition; no wonder that Robert had felt nearly frantic over this, when he loved them so! Early in the morning Mr. Murray went to the bed-room which Mr. Mason put at his service and there he had Robert's things brought, and instead of lying down to rest, looked over his boy's treasures. There were the other letters from the mill. Mr. Murray, as he read them, could trace the progress of Robert's distress. And there, worse than all, was a little journal or book, where Robert had solaced himself by writing down what he wanted to do for his dear "father, mother, Pink, and the rest,"—how much it would cost, how long it would take him to save up the money. There were notes of boyish impossible plans for getting more money, and other notes telling how much he owed those who had been all the world to him. There were words also of regret because the "dear father" who was so kind to him would not be friends with those whom he loved best in all the world. These things cut Mr. Murray to the heart. The sorrow of poor Robert was revealed to him, and his own conduct to the Allens stood before him in all the baseness of its ingratitude. He was amazed at himself. Should he now lose his son by the judgment of God?

All that day and night as Robert tossed and raved, Mr. Murray more and more upbraided himself for his ingratitude. He heard Robert in his delirium calling on "father," when "father" meant Captain Zekiel, but now he was not angry—only pitiful. But Robert's chief cry was for Eliza.

"Mother, why don't you come to me? Can't you stop my headache? Take hold of my head as you used to do. Don't you care for me any more because I don't belong to you? Are you all dead? Have you gone away and starved? Have they put you all in the poorhouse? Pink, why don't you sing to me? If you'd sing to me, I could go to sleep."

"Why do you not send for his mother?" said Dr. Lee. "A mother would do him more good than all the nurses and doctors put together. You should lose no time. He is very ill, and grows worse. His mother—"

"He has no mother," said Mr. Mason.

"He is calling for his adopted mother," said Mr. Murray.

"Has he lived long with her?"

"Ever since he can remember, until the last few months, and Pink is her little daughter. He is very fond of them."

"Such affections are often as strong as ties of blood," said the doctor. "This boy is evidently very sensitive. I should say he had been mourning and fretting for these friends until he has brought on this sickness."

"He is just like his own mother," said Mr. Murray. "She died of grief for a lost child."

"Then you had better take especial care of this lad now, and get the people whom he is calling after, here. It is not in humanity to stand such tossing and raving as this very long. He will wear himself out. He grows weaker. Anything now to quiet him."

Mr. Murray hastened out and sent a telegram to Captain Allen, bidding him bring Mrs. Allen and Pink at once, as Robert was dangerously ill. He also sent a money-order telegram for fifty dollars, so that there should be no delay.

Faith is the Victory.

"The victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."—1 JOHN 5: 4.

JOHN H. YATES.

IRA D. SANKEY.

1. Encamped a-long the hills of light, Ye Chris-tian sol-diers, rise,
2. His ban-ner o-ver us is love, Oursword the word of God;
3. On ev-'ry hand the foe we find Drawn up in dread ar-ray;
4. To him that o-ver-comes the foe, White rai-ment shall be giv'n;

And press the bat-tle ere the night Shall veil the glow-ing skies;
We tread the road the saints a-bove With shouts of tri-umph trod;
Let tents of ease be left be-hind, And on-ward to the fray;
Be-fore the an-gels he shall know His name con-fessed in heaven;

A-against the foe in vales be-low, Let all our strength be hurled;
By faith they, like a whirlwind's breath, Swept on o'er ev-'ry field;
Sal-va-tion's hel-met on each head, With truth all girt a-bout,
Then on-ward from the hills of light, Our hearts with love a-flame;

Faith is the vic-to-ry, we know, That o-ver-comes the world.
The faith by which they conquered Death Is still our shin-ing shield.
The earth shall tremble 'neath our tread, And ech-o with our shout.
We'll vanquish all the hosts of night, In Je-sus' conquering name.

CHORUS.

Faith is the vic-to-ry! Faith is the vic-to-ry!
Faith is the vic-to-ry! Faith is the vic-to-ry!

Oh, glo-ri-ous vic-to-ry, That o-ver-comes the world.

A LIFE SAVED BY A TESTAMENT.

BISHOP TUCKER of Uganda has returned home to plead for volunteer workers. He needs forty for Uganda and declares that there is excellent prospect of their doing successful work for Christ among the people of that land. In the course of a recent address describing the people, he mentioned their love of books, and related the following incidents in connection therewith:

A man will very readily do three months' work for a New Testament. A sister of the late King Mtesa, for several days came to see me, but sat in my room almost in silence. She was naturally a very taciturn woman, but at last she summoned up courage enough to ask if she could have a New Testament. Happily we had one, and she purchased it—for we believe in selling our books; we believe the people value them when they buy them—and it was remarkable the change that came over that woman as she got her new possession. She smiled, she laughed, she clapped her hands, and I almost thought she would sing; but at any rate she told us that her spirit was singing within her for joy. On another occasion a man came to me with a Testament in his hand, but he asked if I would give him another. I said: "You have one." "Ah," he said, "this one is so injured that I can only read a part of it." I asked to be allowed to see it, and true enough it was greatly injured. I asked how this happened. "Well," he said, "when I went to war against the Mohammedans, I took my book with me, and I wrapped it in my clothes here. In the fight a bullet struck it, and it has pierced it nearly through. It saved my life. I love it very much; but can you give me another?" I told him: "I have only one, and that is my own; but," I said, "if you will give me your book I will give you mine." The exchange was made; I received the shattered book, and here it is, and I need not say that I look on that book as one of my greatest treasures. Verily, it is the sign of God's preserving love, as well as of that man's love for the Word of the living God.

WAITING UPON GOD.

(For the Christian Herald.)

SOMETIMES I'm in a fearful strait!
When that which fills me with amazement
And tries my faith I can but wait
For God to justify his ways.

The hardest problem to my mind,
The mysteries of life untold,
For which I no solution find
In the hereafter shall unfold.

When he shall show me by his hand,
When light and love make manifest
His purpose I shall understand,
That all he does is for the best.

"Shall not the Judge of earth do right?"
To all His creatures He is just;
'Tis hard to cling to hands that smite,
But, though he slay me, I will trust.

O, learn, my heart, to acquiesce
In God the Father's righteous will,
Grieve for thy loss and crosses less,
And find thy peace in waiting still.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

N. P. C., San Francisco, Cal. Do the spirits of dwellers on earth, when they reach heaven, know each other's thoughts, without the medium of speech?
Unanswerable—in this life.

W. G. S., Chicago, Ill. (1.) When did Thomas-a-Kempis live? (2.) Was he a Catholic? (3.) What do you think of his imitation of Christ?

(1) Thomas Hammerkein of Kempen, better known as Thomas-a-Kempis, was born in 1379, in the village of Kempen, in the Prussian Rhine provinces. (2.) Yes; an Augustinian. (3.) Magnificent, but not without errors.

Old Subscriber, Jordan's Valley, Tenn. (1.) How old was Benjamin when he went with his brothers to Egypt? (Gen. 46: 21.) How old was Solomon when he began to reign? (1 Kings 14: 21.)

(1) About 34 years. (2) He was born in 1034 B. C. died 975 B. C. reigned 40 years and therefore was 19 years old when he ascended the throne.

C. A. Daniel, N. Y. City. How many Sunday Schools, Scholars, teachers, Protestant Sunday Schools of all denominations and Catholic Sunday Schools are there in the world?

We have not the material at hand to answer. No census of Sunday Schools is taken in France, England or Germany.

A. B. Fisk, Wessington, So. Dak. When a man has grown old and past labor, and is without means of support, is it a sin for him to commit suicide? Tell me what book, chapter and verse in the Bible speak against it?

The universal commandment: "Thou shalt not kill," (Exodus 20: 13.) applies equally to self-murder and the murder of others. Job so interprets it, when he says: (Job 14: 14.) "All the days of mine appointed time will I wait until the end come." The whole spirit of Christianity opposes it.

Mrs. L. Hatfield, Brookville, N. S. Where is the body of Christopher Columbus buried?

History records that he died in poverty at Valladolid, Spain, May 20, 1506, and was buried there, receiving a pompous funeral and a splendid monument from King Ferdinand. His remains were said to have been afterwards transferred to Havana.

E. O. W., Vassar, Mich. (1.) Who owns the Holy Sepulchre? (2.) Who wrote the Apostles' Creed.

(1) The Turks. (2) The Apostles' Creed is the earliest summary of the Christian faith on which all Christian churches agree. Many writers of authority hold that the Creed was composed by the Apostles themselves during their stay at Jerusalem and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. An inquiry on this point has also been received from J. S. Taylor, Chatham, Pa.

V. K. Vandeventer, Dundee, Monroe Co. Mich. What are the probable numbers of the Salvation Army? (2.) What are the numbers of the Young Men's Christian Associations in the world at the present time?

(1) The latest Salvation Army statistics can be procured by addressing Ballington Booth, 111 Reade Street, New York City. (2) According to the figures presented before the International Y. M. C. A. Conference at Amsterdam last July, there is a total membership of 225,501. This total represents only those Associations that have reported; but there may be others that did not report to the Conference.

Mrs. —, Lisbon, Ga. Please state your views on sanctification.

It is the process which is worked by the Holy Spirit in believers who have been justified by faith in Christ. After the new birth, or regeneration, they grow in grace. The divine life implanted increases, makes the believer strong to resist temptation, to restrain th' appetites and passions of his own nature and to live and work for God. He is liable to sin, but is ever striving after complete holiness and perfect obedience to the will of God. (See Rom. 7: 14-25.) He is never relieved in this life from the duty of watchfulness nor ever attains such an eminence in holiness as to see no more heights above him to attain. In all his efforts, his success depends on the help of the Holy Spirit.

T. W. M. — Ohio. What are the duties of a bridesmaid and groomsman, and are they the same at public and private weddings?

They are merely ceremonious attendants at marriages and often dispensed with. The duty of the bridesmaid is to take charge of the dressing and undressing of the bride, while that of the groomsman is to give similar attention to the bridegroom, but the custom has been greatly modified in late years. The groomsman now assumes charge of the arrangements for the wedding, acting as a sort of business manager of the affair, and making all the needful preparations, even to the carriages and favors, while the bridesmaid has charge of the toilet and the wedding cake. At the ceremony it was formerly the custom in many European countries for the groomsman to pull off the bridegroom's right hand glove while the bridesmaid did the same to the bride's left hand glove. All these details are now adjusted regardless of the old customs, and according to the personal tastes of the parties. The groomsman is now simply the confidential friend of the groom. In public weddings, where more style is affected, the old-time usages are more closely adhered to, the bridesmaids carrying the bride's bouquet, fan and gloves, while other attendants support her train.

M. A. H., Braceville, Grundy Co., Ill. What answer would be correct to give to a Roman Catholic who asks why there are so many religious denominations among Protestants?

Protestantism acknowledges no authoritative voice except the Bible, which it regards as the inspired word of God. This is the very basis of Protestantism. It accords to men the liberty of interpretation of the Scriptures and as many differ in the interpretation, hence there are many sects, or denominations. Catholics, on the other hand, unite in accepting the dictum of the Pope, whose interpretation is regarded as infallible. He is said to speak ex cathedra (from the chair) and with divine authority which no one in the Catholic Church is permitted to question, thus denying the privilege of free interpretation. The divisions in the Protestant churches are really a sign of life and activity in spiritual matters.

Constant Reader, O. B. L., Adrian, Mich. 1. Can there be more than one Church of Christ? 2. Who are the heretics referred to in II. Peter 2: 1-3? 3. Did not all Christians belong to the Roman Catholic Church before the sixteenth Century?

(1) There is but one Church of Christ which is composed of all who truly believe on him for the salvation of their souls, and love him and follow him. But just as one army may and does contain many divisions—Artillery, Cavalry, Infantry—and each division several regiments so the Church has many sections differing in mode of operation but all owning one head—the Lord Jesus. We do not apprehend that uniformity is expected of Christians but unity in essential principles. (2) The heretics referred to are, as stated, covetous men who make merchandise of the Church and deny the Lord who bought them. As the differences between Protestants and Catholics seem uppermost in your mind, you may take an illustration from the sale of indulgences by Tetzel which precipitated her Reformation. (3) Yes; but when unprincipled men gained control over it and licentious men were at the head of it, making laws and imposing on the church articles of belief contrary to the Word of God, conscientious men left the Church to follow Christ and some were tortured and burned to death for doing so by the usurpers.

Inquirer, Tabernacle, N. C. 1. Is it right for a Christian when pleading for a special favor to make vows and pledges to God? 2. If a Christian while seeking the fulfillment of a lawful desire pledges a certain sum to be the Lord's and is denied his request is this proof that the offering is not acceptable? 3. According to Matthew 5: 23, to bring our gifts to the altar when seeking a special favor.

1. There is no reason why he should not do so; but if he does he must be careful to fulfil his vow. As the author of Ecclesiastes says, "Better is it that thou shouldst not vow, than that thou shouldst vow and not pay. (Eccles 5: 5.) 2. No it is no proof. It may be an evidence that the petitioner has approached God in a wrong spirit. God does not bargain with men. If the Christian is able to consecrate the "certain sum" to the Lord, let him do so, but he should not make his gift contingent on his getting his favor. Let him pray for what he wants and if it is God's will, he will get it. He is not any more likely to get it by offering God a reward. 3. It is best to do so, but the offering does not entitle the offerer to "the special favor." Do not imagine that God sells his gifts or that you can bribe him to give you what you want. Ask for it in faith and if you do not get it, believe that God knows better than you do what is best for you.

"All run down" from the weakening effects of warm weather, you need a good tonic and blood purifier like Hood's Sarsaparilla. Give this peculiar medicine a trial. Sold by all druggists.

A GOOD SUGGESTION.

ECONOMY, as wise folks say,
Is wealth pronounced another way,
So while "hard times" the people cry,
The Toilet Soaps they should not buy.
Let all who buy such soaps take care
To weigh the cake exact and fair,
And find they pay in figures round
A dollar, more or less per pound.

What course should people then pursue?
In short, the only thing to do,
Though rich in bonds, or worldly poor,
The "IVORY SOAP" they should procure,
Which may be bought from coast to coast,
At sixteen cents per pound at most,
And does more satisfaction grant
Than all the Toilet Soaps extant.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

FIFTY WANTS.

I WANT to feed on Jesus' word,
I want communion with my Lord.
I want salvation, full and free.
I want my Father's face to see.
I want to prove each promise sweet;
I want to live at Jesus' feet.
I want his mercy every day;
I want upholding all the way.
I want to live as Jesus' bride;
I want in his dear wounds to hide.
I want to prize his fulness more;
I want his person to adore.
I want to hear his heavenly voice;
I want in Jesus to rejoice.
I want to trust him with my all;
I want on his dear name to call.
I want to die to all things here;
I want on him to cast my care.
I want to see his Gospel spread;
I want on Satan's power to tread.
I want my Jesus as my friend;
I want him to my journey's end.
I want him as my Priest and King;
I want his precious love to sing.
I want him as my Rock and Tower;
I want him in each trying hour.
I want him as my brother dear;
I want my Jesus always near.
I want his eyes, his hand, his heart;
I want with all besides to part.
I want him as my husband kind;
I want in him my all to find.
I want him as my daily bread;
I want him as my living Head.
I want him as my hiding-place;
I want him as my God of Grace.
I want him as my life and peace;
I want him as my righteousness.
I want his own atoning blood.
I want to bathe in that dear flood;
I want his Spirit's voice to hear;
I want the love that casts out fear.
I want him now in Achor's vale;
I want him when all Hell assail.
I want him when my flesh gives way;
I want him as my only stay.
I want his smiles, his looks of grace;
I want to see him face to face.
I want his wisdom strength and love;
I want with him to dwell above.

THE PERSECUTION AT PONAPE.

The persecution of the American missionaries at Ponape by the Spanish governor, who is apparently incited thereto, by the jesuits whom he brought with him, continues and threatens to become still more violent. The Missionary Herald publishes a letter from Mr. Rand, one of the expelled missionaries, who says that at the time of the out-break between the Spaniards and the natives, there were seventeen active Christian laborers on Ponape, three of whom were ordained, and three others were licensed to preach. The wives of these laborers, with but one exception, were efficient assistants in the Sabbath-schools.

Mr. Rand at first took refuge at the Island of Ruk, but it was deemed best for him to go on to Honolulu. On his way he stopped at Ponape. This was on April 24, and he writes:—"There had been no fighting since the battle at Japalap, November 22, 23, and 24. The governor was expecting a large Spanish force soon. He said that there would be 'no fooling' this time, and seemed confident that the Metalanim tribe would be annihilated. This is a new governor who came to Ponape in the latter part of February. The mission work on Ponape is in a sad condition, many of our Christians in all of the tribes excepting the Metalanim having returned to their heathenish customs. Still the outlook is hopeful. God seems to help the poor natives. In every battle the Spaniards get more and more involved, and judging from the failure made by the large forces in September and again in November, it seems that they must give up.

Do you know that you can buy a chimney to fit your lamp that will last till some accident happens to it?
Do you know that Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass" is that chimney?
You can have it—your dealer will get it—if you insist on it. He may tell you it costs him three times as much as some others. That is true. He may say they are just as good. Don't you believe it—they may be better for him; he may like the breaking.

"Turned Upside Down"

Is your home in this sad plight—many are and house-cleaning does it. Cold meals and no comfort, sour tempers and aching backs, hard work and too much of it, tired women and "mad" men—all from house-cleaning. And it's all needless. Don't make such a fuss over it. Take a little Pearline, and have it done easily, quickly and quietly. You'll have it done better, too—you won't have to rub the paint off to get the dirt off. You can save half your labor and half your time, if you'll clean house with Pearline—and everybody in the house will be thankful for it. Millions use nothing but Pearline for washing and cleaning

Turn the Key On the peddlers and grocers who tell you "this is as good as," or "the same as" Pearline. IT'S FALSE; besides Pearline is never peddled. 307 JAMES PYLE, New York.

A VOLUNTEER MISSIONARY.

A RECENT traveller in Syria reports a visit to a remarkable mission at Kerak, a place notorious for vice and crime. The mission is not supported by any of the Missionary Societies, but much good is being done there through the devotion of the man who established it. His name is Lethaby and his trade is that of a printer. Some years ago he was working at his business in the West of England and preaching every Sunday in the neighboring villages. He saved up a little money which he spent in a pilgrimage to Palestine. While travelling there he heard of Kerak as a benighted place, where the people were of the wickedest, and no missionary had ever been. He thought he should like to settle there as a Christian teacher; but the path not at once opening he made his way back to his former home to continue his preaching. At last, some four or five years ago, accompanied by his wife, he visited Palestine. He wrote to the Sheik of Kerak, saying that he and his wife were ready to go to Kerak and to live there with a view of doing good to the people, and would pay for all they wanted, and seek no advantage to themselves, but that they could not give any backsheesh. The old Sheik answered that there was plenty of room in Kerak, and that there were plenty of stones with which to build a house. Hence the devoted couple "established themselves in this den of thieves," as the town is called and fitly bears the name, with its filthy streets and ill-looking inhabitants. Living in a poor house such as we should regard as the poorest hovel, Mr. Lethaby has labored and preached and taught, exerting a marvellous influence on the people, and winning many souls for Christ.

WHAT A SCRIPTURE CARD DID.

In one of the most frequented of German health resorts, an encouraging experience has lately been given by two workers for Christ. The town is surrounded by hills clothed with pine woods, intersected by numerous paths. At short intervals there are seats for the benefit of invalids.

An Irish lady with her invalid husband, spending some weeks in the place, have made use of their daily walks to give away text cards and tracts. One evening, a few days before their stay came to an end, they passed a bench on which was seated alone a young delicate-looking girl. Struck by the mournful expression on her face, the lady handed her a card on which were the words in German: "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart and lean not unto thine own understanding." (Prov. 3: 5.) This girl, an orphan, had been a Christian from her childhood, owing her interest in Christ to a pious mother, whom she had lost when nine years old. Since her mother's death she had met with scarcely any Christian friends. For some years she had lived a careless life and had fallen into a hopeless state. He health had broken down with hard work as a school teacher and anxiety. She had come to the watering-place, employing her savings in endeavoring to regain strength. Lonely and ill, among strangers, without a friend to speak to, her distress of soul became very bitter. She went to the German Protestant Church, hoping to get help. To her piteous cry, "Hath God forgotten?" there seemed to be no response.

She had been three weeks in town when, at last, what she felt was God's answer was put into her hands. She followed the lady who gave her the card, and before long she had the joy of freely unburdening her soul to one who, she was sure, had been sent to her as God's messenger.

Now her life is changed. Still weak and ill, her face shines with a quiet happiness, and she can bless the day which brought her to this place.

A BLIND POET'S MISSION.

Fanny Crosby, the Famous Hymn-Writer, whose Sacred Songs are Sung all Over the Globe—Sightless from Childhood, and now over 70, but still Singing for the Saviour.

SMALL woman, with a bright, animated face, slender in person but active in her movements, and cheery in every tone and gesture. The thin, worn frame showing no signs of infirmity as yet; the features a wrinkled sea, across which smiles of happiness and content are continually flitting. A little, lady-like person, neat and prim as a New England housewife, with a motherly voice that makes music in the heart as she speaks; a woman who impresses you at once with the conviction that she has lived for a purpose. Such is Fanny Crosby, the famous blind hymn-writer, at the age of seventy-two. Gifted with extraordinary talent, she has, by God's grace, been the means of bringing home the truths of the Gospel to the hearts of uncounted thousands, all over the civilized world.

Frances Jane Crosby was born in Southeast, Putnam County, N. Y., on March 24, 1820. When six years old she became blind from maltreatment of the eyes; but what to most children would have been an insuperable affliction, only served to bring out all that was strong and beautiful in the young girl's nature. Fanny early developed a love of music and literature, and she received a good education at the Institution for the Blind in New York City, on leaving, which in 1847 she began to teach school. This work was continued for eleven years, and included tuition in English grammar, rhetoric, Greek, and also ancient and modern history.

In 1864, her first hymn,

We are going, we are going
To a home beyond the skies, was written at the Ponton Hotel, New York City, for William B. Bradbury. Since that time her labors have been exclusively confined to hymn-writing, and so diligently have brain and pen worked together, that she has composed up to the present time nearly three thousand hymns, many of which have attained world-wide popularity. One of the hymns which for spiritual fervor and peculiar pathos has become a general favorite, is, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus." This famous hymn abounds in beautiful passages, one of which is as follows:

It was during a vacation that Miss Crosby first gave evidence of the wonderful talent for verse-writing that afterward made her famous. She wrote the words for several secular songs, the music of which was composed by George F. Root, and many of her simple, affecting verses still retain their popularity. She also wrote a touching little poem of welcome on the occasion of the visit of Henry Clay to New York, at the close of the Mexican War. Even in these early years, her talent had attracted attention in high circles, and she had the honor of being the first woman whose voice was ever heard in the United States Senate Chamber, where she recited a poem by invitation, to a most distinguished audience.

Another hymn which is known and sung in every Christian land, and which has been the means of softening the heart of many a sinner, the words and music both being Miss Crosby's, is, "Pass me not, O Gentle Saviour." This wondrously sweet air is her special favorite. We reproduce the opening bars:

Miss Crosby has a perfect idea of rhythm and a remarkable faculty for composing verses for special occasions. So sensitive and active is her temperament that the ideas frame themselves in fitting rhymes almost involuntarily, and the slightest incidents that touch the heart or feelings furnish the needed inspiration. Sometimes she writes both words and music, for she is an accomplished musician, playing on guitar and piano, and singing in a clear, sweet soprano. One such hymn, both words and music being her own, is,

Jesus dear I come to thee,
Thou hast said I may.

This blind and aged singer for Christ is one of the most contented of his creatures. Usually the blind, when not merely stolidly patient, are of a nervous and excitable nature, easily irritated and difficult to please. Not so with Fanny Crosby, however; no one lives who has a keener appreciation of the blessings she enjoys, or who is quicker to note with the eye of the mind, the silver lining of the cloud. Indeed, as she smilingly confesses, her affliction has been to her in a sense a blessing, for it has strengthened her memory, sharpened her intellectual faculties, and enabled her to concentrate her energies upon the Christian work she loves so well. Contentment is the motto of her life, and she points with pleasure to this little verse she wrote at the age of eight:

O, what a happy soul I am
Although I cannot see!
I am resolved that in this world,
Contented I will be.
How many blessings I enjoy
That other people don't;
To weep and sigh because I'm blind
I cannot and I won't!

Her mind is so well stored with Scripture, of which she has all her long life been a close student, that passages from the Bible suited to every phase of experience, readily occur to her, and she finds this a great aid to hymn-writing. Besides, she has read many of the standard authors and is an entertaining talker. She knows that her hymns are a power for good and she is happy in this knowledge. Her scope of subjects is very wide, embracing almost stood in the door of the school-house while the young voices sang:

Pass me not, O gentle Saviour,
Hear my humble cry;
While on others thou art calling,
Do not pass me by.

He stood transfixed; the words seemed to have been written for him alone. Would he go in? No, he was not dressed for service. He waited a little while, to see if they would sing again. As it happened, the same hymn was repeated, and the old man, who had not entered a church for fifty years as he admitted, was touched to the heart. His conversion followed soon after.

Hundreds of similar incidents, all of them absolutely true, are related of the beneficent spiritual influence of these hymns. One lady, on meeting Miss Crosby, ran up to her, with eyes streaming with tears, and thanked God that she had met her, to tell her that the hymn, "Safe in the arms of Jesus," had been the means of bringing her to Christ.

"They were the last words my mother spoke before she died," added the lady, as she grasped the blind poet's hand, and bent low to kiss her silvered hair.

One of the best known of her mission hymns, is, "Rescue the Perishing," which opens as follows:

Concerning this hymn, Miss Crosby tells an interesting story. She attended a mission prayer-meeting one evening when the hymn was sung, and at its close a young man arose and told, with faltering words, how it had helped to bring him to the Saviour. He had been leading a sinful and reckless life, and had squandered all his money. Penniless, shabby and hungry, without hope or home, he passed a room where some people were singing a hymn. Retracing his steps, he entered and listened, and from that night he dated his rescue. Shortly afterward he met the author of the hymn and expressed his deep gratification.

These are but a few of the most popular hymns written by this gifted Christian woman, whose whole life from childhood has been an anthem of praise to her Redeemer, and who has kindled the same spirit wherever worshippers meet together. Her age is apparently no barrier to her industry, for the sprightly and happy old lady is still composing. Her favorite attitude while at work, as shown in the illustration on this page, (which is taken from a photograph expressly made for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), is to sit at a small table with a volume of hymns in hand and dictate to an amanuensis. She is a perfect mistress of rhythm and the facility with which she composes is almost marvelous.

Hardly a hymn from her pen is without its peculiar history, which, if written, would add greatly to its interest. Some of them have sold up into the hundreds of thousands. Among the best known, in addition to those mentioned are: "I am thine, O Lord," written in 1875; "Jesus, I come to thee," 1867; "The bright forever," 1871; "Lord, at thy mercy seat," 1865; "So near to the kingdom," 1875; "O my Saviour hear me," 1875; "Thro' the New Jerusalem," 1864, and "Saviour more than Life to me," 1872. ## ORGAN DEDICATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon preached at the Dedication of the Organ of the New Brooklyn Tabernacle, last Sunday morning, Sept. 20, 1891, from the Text: "His brother's name was Jubal; he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." Gen. 4:21.

LAMECH had two boys, the one a herdsman and the other a musician. Jubal the younger son was the first organ-builder. He started the first sound that rolled from the wondrous instrument which has had so much to do with the worship of the ages. But what improvement has been made under the hands of organ-builders such as Bernhard, Sebastian Bach, and George Hogarth and Joseph Booth and Thomas Robjohn, clear on down to George and Edward Jardine of our day. The majesty of a great organ skillfully played is almost too much for human endurance, but how much the instrument has done in the reinforcement of Divine service it will take all time and all eternity to celebrate. Last April when we dedicated this church to the service of Almighty God our organ was not more than half done. It has now come so near completion that this morning I preach a sermon dedicatory of this mighty throne of sacred sound.

In it are banked more harmonies than I can describe, and all for God and the lighting of the soul toward him. Its four banks of keys, its one hundred and ten stops and appliances, its four thousand five hundred and ten pipes, its chime of thirty-seven bells, its cathedral diapason, and pedal double diapason, its song trumpet and night horn and vox humana, all, all, we dedicate to God and the soul. It will I believe under the Divine blessing lead uncounted thousands into the kingdom. Its wedding marches, its thanksgiving anthems, its requiems will sound after all the voices that follow it to-day shall have sung their last song. To God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost we dedicate it!

There has been much discussion as to where music was born. I think that at the beginning, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy, that the earth heard the echo. The cloud on which the angels stood to celebrate the creation, was the birthplace of song. Inanimate nature is full of God's stringed and wind instruments. Silence itself—perfect silence—is only a musical rest in God's great anthem of worship. Wind among the leaves, insects humming in the summer air, the rush of billow upon beach, the ocean far out sounding its everlasting psalm, the bobolink on the edge of the forest, the quail whistling up from the grass, are music.

I propose, this morning in setting apart this organ for sacred use, to speak about sacred music; first showing you its importance, and then stating some of the obstacles to its advancement.

I draw the first argument for the importance of sacred music from the fact that God commanded it. Through Paul he tells us to admonish one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs; and though David he cries out: "Sing ye to God, all ye kingdoms of the earth." And there are hundreds of other passages I might name, proving that it is as much a man's duty to sing as it is his duty to pray. Indeed, I think there are more commands in the Bible to sing than there are to pray. God not only asks for the human voice but for instruments of music. He asks for the cymbal, and the harp, and the trumpet as well as the organ. And I suppose that, in the last days of the church, the harp, the lute, the trumpet, and all the instruments of music whether they have been in the service of righteousness, or sin will be brought by their masters and laid down at the feet of Christ, and then sounded in the church's triumph, on her way from suffering into glory. "Praise ye the Lord!" Praise him with your voices. Praise him with stringed instruments and with organs.

Many of you are illustrations of what sacred song can do. Through it you were brought into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. You stood out against the argument and the warning of the pulpit; but when, in the sweet words of Isaac Watts, or Charles Wesley, or John Newton, or Toplady, the love of Jesus was sung to your soul, then you surrendered, as an armed castle, that could not be taken by a host, lifts its window to listen to a harp's trill. There was a Scotch soldier dying in New Orleans, and a Scotch minister came in to give him the consolations of the Gospel. The man turned over on his pillow, and said: "Don't talk to me about religion." Then the Scotch minister began to sing a familiar hymn of Scotland, that was composed by David Dickenson, beginning with the words:

Oh, mother, dear Jerusalem,
When shall I come to thee?

He sang it to the tune of "Dundee," and everybody in Scotland knows that; and as he began to sing the dying soldier turned over on his pillow, and said to the minister: "Where did you learn that?" "Why," replied the minister, "my mother taught me that." "So did mine," said the dying Scotch soldier; and the very foundation of his heart was upturned, and then there he yielded himself to Christ. Oh, it has an irresistible power. Luther's sermons have been forgotten, but his "Judgment Hymn" sings on through the ages, and will keep on singing until the blast of the archangel's trumpet shall bring about that very day which the hymn celebrates.

In addition to the inspiring music of our own day we have a glorious inheritance of Church psalmody which has come down fragrant with the devotions of other generations—tunes no more worn out than they were when our great-grandfathers climbed up on them from the church pew to glory? Dear old souls, how they used to sing! When they were cheerful, our grandfathers and grandmothers used to sing "Colchester." When they were very meditative, then the board meeting-house rang with "South Street" and "St. Edmond's." Were they struck through with great tenderness, they sang "Woodstock." Were they wrapped in visions of the glory of the Church, they sang "Zion." Were they overborne with the love and glory of Christ, they sang "Ariel." And in those days there were certain tunes married to certain hymns, and they have lived in peace a great while, these two old people, and we have no right to divorce them. "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." But how hard-hearted we must be if all this sacred music of the past, and all the sacred music of the present does not start us heavenward.

I have also noticed the power of sacred song to sooth perturbation. You may have come in here, this morning, with a great many worriments and anxieties, yet, perhaps in the singing of the first hymn, you lost all those worriments and anxieties. You have read in the Bible of Saul and how he was sad and angry, and how the boy David came in and played the evil spirit out of him. A Spanish king was melancholy. The windows were all closed. He sat in the darkness. Nothing could bring him forth until Faraneli came and discoursed music for three or four days to him. On the fourth day he looked up, and wept, and rejoiced, and the windows were thrown open, and that which all the splendors of the court could not do, the power of song accomplished. If you have anxieties and worriments, try this heavenly charm upon them. Do not sit down on the bank of the hymn, but plunge in, that the devil of care may be brought out of you.

It also arouses to action. A singing church is always a triumphant church! if a congregation is silent during the exercise, or partially silent, it is the silence of death. If, when the hymn is given out, you hear the faint hum of here and there a father and mother in Israel, while the vast majority are silent, that minister of Christ who is presiding needs to have a very strong constitution if he does not get the chills. He needs not only the grace of God, but nerves like whalebone. It is amazing how some people, who have voice enough to discharge all their duties in the world, when they come into the house of God have no voice to discharge this duty.

But I must now speak of some of the obstacles in the way of the advancement of this sacred music; and the first is that it has been impressed into the service of superstition. I am far from believing that music ought always to be positively religious. Refined art has opened places where music has been secularized, and lawfully so. The drawing-room, the musical club, the orchestra, the concert, by the gratification of pure taste, and the production of harmless amusement and the improvement of talent, have become great forces in the advancement of our civilization.

But while all this is so, every observer has noticed that this art, which God intended for the improvement of the ear, and the voice, and the head, and the heart, has often been impressed into the service of false religions. False religions have depended more upon the hymning of their congregations than upon the pulpit proclamation of their dogmas. Tartini, the musical composer, dreamed one night that Satan snatched from his hand an instrument and played upon it something very sweet—a dream that has often been fulfilled in our day, the voice and the instruments that ought to have been devoted to Christ, captured from the church and applied to purposes of superstition.

Another obstacle has been an inordinate fear of criticism. The vast majority of people, singing in church, never want anybody else to hear them sing. Everybody is waiting for somebody else to do his duty. If we all sang, then the inaccuracies that are evident when only a few sing would not be heard at all; they would be drowned out. There are three schools of singing, I am told—the German school, the Italian school, and the French school of singing. Now, I would like to add a fourth school, and that is the school of Christ. The voice of a contrite, broken heart, although it may not be able to stand human criticism, makes better music to God's ear than the most artistic performance when the heart is wanting. I know it is easier to preach on this than it is to practice; but I sing for two reasons—first, because I like it, and next, because I want to encourage those who do not know how. I have but very little faculty in that direction, yet I am resolved to sing. God has commanded it, and I dare not be silent.

Another obstacle that has been in the way of the advancement of this holy art, has been the fact that there has been so much angry discussion on the subject of music. There are those who would have this exercise conducted by musical instruments. In the same church, there are those who do not like musical instruments, and so it is organ and no organ, and there is a fight. In another church, it is a question whether the music shall be conducted by a precentor or by a drilled choir. Some want a drilled choir and some want a precentor, and there is a fight. Then there are those who would like in the church to have the organ played in a dull, lifeless, droning way, while there are others who would have it wreathed into fantastics, branching out in jets and spangles of sound, rolling and tossing in marvellous convolutions, as when, in pyrotechnic display, after you think a piece is exhausted, it breaks out in wheels, rockets, blue-lights, and serpentine demonstrations. Some would have the organ played in almost inaudible sweetness, and others would have it full of staccato passages that make the audience jump, with great eyes and hair on end, as though by a vision of the Witch of Endor. And he who tries to please all will fail in everything. Nevertheless, you are to admit the fact that this contest which is going on, not in hundreds but in thousands of the churches of the United States to-day, is a mighty hindrance to the advancement of this art.

In this way scores and scores of churches are entirely crippled as to all influence, and the music is a damage rather than a praise.

Another obstacle in the advancement of this art has been the erroneous notion that this part of the service could be conducted by delegation. Churches have said: "Oh what an easy time we shall have. This minister will do the preaching, the choir will do the singing, and we will have nothing to do." And you know as well as I that there are a great multitude of churches all through this land, where the people are not expected to sing, the whole work is done by delegation of four, or six, or ten persons, and the audience are silent.

My Christian friends, have we a right to delegate to others the discharge of this duty which God demands of us? Suppose that four wood-thrushes should propose to do all the singing some bright day when the woods are ringing with bird voices. It is decided that four wood-thrushes shall do all the singing of the forest. Let all other voices keep silent. How beautifully the four warble. It is really fine music. But how long will you keep the forest still? Why, Christ would come into that forest and look up as he looked through the olives, and he would wave his hand and say: "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord;" and, keeping time with the stroke of innumerable wings, there would be five thousand bird voices leaping into the harmony. Suppose this delegation of musical performers were tried in heaven; suppose that four choice spirits should try to do the singing of the upper temple. Hush now, thrones and dominions and principalities. David! be still, though you were "the sweet singer of Israel." Paul! keep quiet, though you have come to that crown of rejoicing. Richard Baxter! keep still, though this is the "Saint's everlasting Rest." Four spirits now do all the singing. But how long would heaven be quiet? How long? "Hallelujah!" would cry some glorified Methodist from under the altar. "Praise the Lord!" would sing the martyrs from among the thrones. "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory!" redeemed spirits would cry.

Alas! that we should have tried on earth that which they cannot do in heaven, and, instead of joining all our voices in the praise of the Most High God, but they can always depend on the singing. We have heard the sound coming up like "the voice of many waters," but it will be done at a better rate after awhile when we shall realize the height, and the depth, and the immensity of this privilege.

I forgot to state the other reason why we adopted this plan. That is, we do not want any choir quarrels. You know very well that in scores of churches, there has been perpetual contention in that direction. The only church fight that ever occurred under my ministry was over a melodeon, in my first settlement. Some of the choirs are made up of our best Christian people. Some of the warmest friends I have ever had have stood up in them, Sabbath after Sabbath, conscientiously and successfully leading the praises of God. But the majority of the choirs throughout the land are not made up of Christian people, and three-fourths of the church fights originate in the organ loft. I take that back and say nine-tenths. Many of our churches are dying of choirs.

We want to rouse all our families to the duty of sacred song. We want each family of our congregation to be a singing-school. Childish petulance, obduracy and intractability would be soothed if we had more singing in the household, and then our little ones would be prepared for the great congregation on the Sabbath-day, their voices uniting with our voices in the praises of the Lord. After a shower, there are scores of streams that come down the mountain side with voices rippling and silvery, pouring into one river and then rolling in united strength to the sea. So, I would have all the families in our church send forth the voice of prayer and praise, pouring it into the great tide of public worship that rolls on and on to empty into the great, wide heart of God. Never can we have our church sing as it ought, until families sing as they ought.

I want to rouse you to a unanimity in Christian song that has never yet been exhibited. Come, now! clear your throats and get ready for this duty, or you will never hear the end of this. May God increase our reverence for Christian psalmody, and keep us from disgracing it by our indifference and frivolity. When Cromwell's army went into battle, he stood at the head of them one day, and gave out the long-metre doxology to the tune of the "Old Hundredth," and that great host, company by company, regiment by regiment, battalion by battalion, joined in the doxology:

Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise Him, all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host,
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

And while they sang they marched, and while they marched they fought, and while they fought they got the victory. O men and women of Jesus Christ, let us go into all our conflicts singing the praises of God, and then, instead of falling back, as we often do, from defeat to defeat, we will be marching on from victory to victory.

Glory to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

THE MITYLENE INCIDENT

Its Political and Prophetic Significance Considered.

AS we are removed from the international quarrels and dynastic jealousies which agitate Europe, the events now taking place there have an interest for every intelligent citizen and especially for every student of the word of God. Christ reproached the people of his day because, though they were quick to notice signs of an approaching change in the weather, they did not observe the signs of the times. (Luke 12:54-56). We should deserve the same reproach if the events occurred which Christ told us would be the signs of his approach and we failed to observe or recognize them. There will come a day when those events will be chronicled among the cable dispatches, and as the angel said to Daniel, "None of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand" (Daniel 12:10). It is therefore, with keen interest that the student of prophecy scrutinizes those dispatches in these days, when so many indications point to the near approach of the close of this dispensation. Among them last week was one which could scarcely have escaped his notice.

On September 15, European statesmen and financiers were startled by the ominous report that England had seized the island of Mitylene, had landed men and guns and was busy fortifying it. An authoritative statement was subsequently issued that the island had not been seized, the maritime demonstration which had given rise to the report having been only a drilling exercise for the troops on the ships of the British Mediterranean squadron; and that after the manœuvre the troops returned to their ships. The statement was of course credited, but an impression prevails that the manœuvre was intended as a lesson, not so much for the troops, as for the Sultan of Turkey, to whom the island belongs, and for his new friend, the Czar of Russia. They might learn from it that if in defiance of treaty engagements, Russian ships of war were allowed to pass through the Dardanelles, England could easily and promptly protect her interests by seizing an island, from which she could operate.

The island of Mitylene is interesting to the Bible student from the fact that the Apostle Paul visited it and passed a night there during his voyage from Assos to Chios. (Acts 20:14, 15.) It is situated about seven miles from the coast of Asia Minor. Dr. Talmage and his party spent a day there last year on his way from the Holy Land. As will be seen by the accompanying map, its value to

MITYLENE, SCENE OF THE NAVAL DEMONSTRATION.

England, in the event of a struggle with Russia for the possession of Constantinople, would be enormous. At Mitylene, where there is a good harbor, the fleet could wait for the Russian ships to emerge from the Dardanelles, and attack them on the open sea. It is probable therefore that the experimental landing at Mitylene may have been a kind of rehearsal of a future performance.

Unfulfilled prophecy has its local focus in the region in which Mitylene is situated. On the north is Turkey, the dissolution of which is typified in prophecy under the figure of "the drying up of the River Euphrates;" farther north are the dismembered Turkish provinces, Roumelia, Bulgaria and Roumania, which European statesmen regard as the storm-centre of Europe, from which will probably come the provocation of that general war, which will issue in the ten-kingdomed Confederacy revealed to Daniel; on the east is Asia Minor, in which Antichrist is expected to arise; and on the south-east the Holy Land, to which the Jews will return. Austria, Germany Italy, Turkey, Russia and England are all concerned in this central point. "Where the carcass is, there are the eagles gathered together." Each is pursuing its own interests unconscious of divine guidance, and this new movement on Mitylene, tentative as it appears to have been, is an indication that England is preparing to take the part in the fray assigned to her in the Word of God. It is in line with her characteristic policy of acquiring the possession of islands, which has planted her flag on Cyprus, Malta, St. Helena, the West Indian Islands, the peninsula of Gibraltar, and other points of vantage the world over; by which she is giving additional proof of her identification with that power of which Isaiah so frequently speaks as "The Isles of the Sea," and to which a most important duty is assigned. (Isa. 60:9.)

"GYPSY" SMITH.

A Noted English Evangelist now Visiting in this Country.

A DARK-SKINNED, black-haired, and exceedingly bright-eyed man of thirty, strongly built and with a remarkably frank and open countenance, has for several weeks past been conducting revival services at the Jane Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City, of which Rev. Stephen Merritt is pastor. This young Evangelist, who possesses a natural eloquence that is most effective with an audience, putting the Gospel truths in a telling way and giving the message sometimes in song, is Rodney Smith better known as "Gypsy" Smith, the famous English revivalist.

"Gypsy" Smith was born in Woodford Forest, near Epping Forest in Essex, England, on March 31, 1860. His father, Cornelius Smith, and his mother were gypsies. In 1876, when young Rodney was 17, he attended mission meetings in the Methodist Chapel at Cambridge and was converted. For some time previous he had been under conviction of sin. At that meeting he confessed his Saviour and was led forward to the altar.

He worked hard after that and studied industriously, teaching himself, and succeeded in picking up the elements of an education. In 1877 he quitted his forest life forever, and became a teacher in what was then known as the Christian Mission, a small organization having about twenty branches in different parts of the country. Here he was wonderfully successful as an Evangelist. The Christian Mission was afterwards reorganized and became known as the Salvation Army, that far-reaching organization which has its branches in every part of the world to-day. "Gypsy" Smith took service under General Booth and did good work in the army until an incident occurred which severed his connection. At the town of Hanley, where he had been laboring, several persons raised a subscription and presented "Gypsy" Smith with a valuable gold watch. They also gave to his sister and Mrs. Smith, his wife, pocket-books each containing five pounds in money. These presents were accepted, it is said, in entire ignorance of the rule of the army prohibiting the acceptance of all gifts.

This, however, did not daunt the Gypsy Evangelist, and he decided to go on in the good work alone. In 1882, he began an independent mission, which he continued successfully for four years, frequently preaching to audiences of 2,500 persons. In 1886 he began special Evangelical work among all the churches of the Non-Conformist bodies in England. For the last few years, he has been devoting his efforts specially to a Wesleyan Methodist Mission in Manchester, which is widely known as "The Forward Movement."

delegating perhaps to unconsecrated men and women this most solemn and most delightful service.

Now, in this church, we have resolved upon the plan of conducting the music by organ and cornet. We do it for two reasons: one is that by throwing the whole responsibility upon the mass of the people, making the great multitude the choir, we might rouse more heartiness. The congregation coming on the Sabbath day feel that they cannot delegate this part of the great service to any one else, and so they themselves assume it. We have had a glorious congregational singing here. People have come many miles to hear it. They are not sure about the preaching

Was Lazarus more fully dead than was the only son of the widow of Nain. We smile at such an absurd comparison, and then we ourselves go forth and commit a similar blunder, but perhaps much more terrible in its results. We say this man with fine clothes and a good schooling can be saved, but that poor, ragged drunkard is past reform. This boy with polite manners will come out all right, but that rugged, rough-and-ready, awkward fellow, will never do well—only a waste of time to try to save him. "Oh, ye of little faith!" New England village, the denizens of which held little communication with the outside world, she made the acquaintance of a lonely old lady, living in her own cottage on the outskirts of the village. The old lady, whose name was Mrs. Gates, was an ardent lover of flowers and plants and birds and butterflies, though she knew nothing from books of botany or entomology. She did not know the scientific names of her pets, but had given them names of her own choosing. She amused her educated visitor, who was drawn to her by the same love of nature, by these singular but not inappropriate names. Among her favorites were the beautiful butterflies known to science as the Danessa Antiope, but, as they hibernated during the winter and are not killed by the cold, Mrs. Gates gave them the family name of "Tough." She showed her visitor several of them sticking to the rafters of her cottage, and between the stones of her garden wall. She knew them all and had given each a name. One, she called "Lizey," another "Mary," and so on.

As the two ladies became intimate, Mrs. Gates told her visitor how she came to be more fond of the butterflies than of anything else. She had been a lover of nature from girlhood, but this special fondness was the result of sorrow. When Mrs. Gates settled in the village, her constant companion was her boy, whom she almost idolized. He sickened and died, and the mother's heart was nearly broken. She shut herself up and would see no one. Her early religious training seemed to have no effect. If she thought of God, it was with a sullen resentment that he should have taken from her the one comfort of her life. She could not bear to hear the birds sing because they reminded her of her child's delight in their song; nor to look at the different flowers which he used to like. Life was all dark to her. She thought of him lying in his cold dark grave, and had no thought of reunion with him.

One day, going on an errand to the village, her eye fell on a large cluster of fire-weed in full bloom. The sight of it overcame her, for it was the favorite plant of her dear dead boy and she had not seen it in bloom before, since his death. For the first time tears came to her relief. She bent over the pink blossoms and wept freely. As she dried her eyes, she noticed a caterpillar on the plant. It was not eating, nor crawling, but had raised its head as if looking at her in almost a human way. It, too, loved the fire-weed and somehow it seemed by that taste like her lost darling. No one else would have had such an idea, but to this lonely woman with her strong love of living creatures, it seemed to crave some of her pent-up love. The tears had relieved her, and she felt drawn towards this strange life.

She pulled up some of the fireweed, with the caterpillar on it and took it home. Setting it in a box of soil in her own room and covering it with mosquito-netting, she watched it daily. It had a way of eating round the edges of a leaf as her boy used to eat around a piece of cake and it had a funny way of holding up its head and looking at her, which reminded her of him. She grew to love it and would talk to it as if it could understand. But after some days it stopped eating and would not stay on the plant. She was worried about it, for it had comforted her and taken her thoughts off her sorrow and she dreaded the loneliness that would come on her if it died.

She watched it now continually. It was burrowing in the soil of the box, and throwing it aside as if it were digging a grave. And that was what it was doing. When the trench was large enough to hold its little body, it rolled around in it till the soil at the side fell on it and it was lost to sight. Mrs. Gates wept afresh. She had nothing now to look at and talk to about her boy. It seemed as if a new blight had fallen on her world. She had harder thoughts than ever of God for taking away the thing that had comforted her. She kept the box in her room still, but it was like another grave to her. She dreaded the time when summer would come and the fireweed would be in blossom again and her boy not there to see it, nor her little dumb friend to eat it.

Mrs. Gates felt her loneliness more than ever that summer. But one day she was standing near the box of soil with its cover of mosquito-netting, which she had never had the heart to move, when she noticed that the soil was disturbed over the spot where the caterpillar had made its grave. Its little dried-up body was exposed. She was about to cover it over, when she saw a crack come in it, which opened wider as she gazed in wonderment. Her little friend was coming to life again. She could not stir, or speak; her very breath seemed to stop as she watched the new life unfold. It was over at last and out of the dry, unsightly skin emerged a butterfly, big and beautiful and with wings of lovely bright colors.

"I can't put into words," said the old lady as she ended her story, "how I felt when I saw him come out of his very grave, and spread his wings and fly around the room; nor how I cried out loud as I see it: 'Why not my boy, too? O Lord, you can do that just 's easy 's this.' It's a queer kind o' gospel you'll say, but it went to my heart more than some sermons. I saw what the Lord could do and hasn't he said, 'I am the resurrection and the life?' Well, I felt after that I could trust him about my boy and I do."

FIVE SIGNS OF THE END.

Indications in the Church and the World of the Approach of the Second Advent.

BY REV. A. B. SIMPSON.*

HE bride knows the wedding day. So the Church of Christ should be prepared for the Lord's return. He has said, "Ye are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." He has promised that before the sunrise of the Advent, the morning star will shine for his watching ones, and they shall know that their redemption draweth nigh." There are many such signs culminating.

I. The progress of our times in commercial enterprise, intellectual activity and mechanical invention, is a very remarkable fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy, that "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." This is an age of giants in business, in invention, in literature. The true kings of to-day sit not on thrones, but walk and work among the people, and factories, and offices, and sway the sceptre of the world. Never did the human mind try so hard to build a tower to reach heaven, and human progress cannot go much further without overreaching itself, and making man a god unto himself. (Dan. 12:4.)

II. The wickedness of this age was long ago foretold. "The wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand," was another of Daniel's signs of the end. It is a time of stupendous wickedness. Nihilism, socialism, suicide, intemperance, license, bold infidelity, and unnatural crimes fill the world, and leave their vile trail on every page of our literature. "As it was in the days of Noah," "As it was in the days of Lot," will soon be the true photograph of our times. (Luke 17:26-30.)

III. It is a time of declension in the Church. This, too, is a sign of the end. The Church of Laodicea, lukewarm and ready to be rejected, is the last form of professing Christianity. "Men shall be lovers of their own selves, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." This is the picture of the last stage of Christianity. To-day the teachers of the Church are beginning to rob her of her supernatural elements, and reduce Christianity to Rationalism. There is a determined purpose to eliminate the miraculous out of the Bible. (II. Tim. 3 and I. Tim. 4; Rev. 3.)

There is no sadder and yet more certain sign of the gathering of the evening shadows than the hostility of a large section of the nominal Church toward the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, the doctrine of holiness, the supernatural signs of the Gospel, the separation of the Church from the world, and the Lord's personal coming.

IV. The awakening of the spirit of holiness is a glorious sign of the end. It is the bride putting on her wedding garments. It is the fulfilment of Daniel's promise, "Many shall be purified and made white and tried." It is the realization of John's vision of the bride, "The marriage of the Lamb has come, and his wife hath made herself ready. And to her it was granted to be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white." The fine linen is the righteousness of the saints. It is spreading through all the Churches of Christ, and calling together the little flock from every branch of the evangelical Church before the end. And when the bride has on her wedding robes, her Lord is not far away. (Dan. 12:10; the awakening of the Virgins, Matt. 25:7.)

There is a fine suggestiveness in the double picture of the bride's enrobing. Her garments are not only "clean," but also "white." This latter word is used of the Lord's transfiguration garments. The word means lustrous. The clean robes are the clothes you wash, as you take them from the line; the lustrous robes are the same garments when you get them from the laundry. God is not only washing us, beloved, but ironing us. Let us not shrink from the pressure, but so meet him that we can be robed and ready for his appearing. (Rev. 19:7, 8.)

V. The missionary movement of our own age is the most remarkable sign of the Lord's speedy coming. "When this Gospel of the Kingdom shall have been published in all the world for a witness unto all nations, then shall the end come." There are not wanting some reasons to hope that this may be realized before the century shall close. It is the last sign of the end, and one which the Church really holds, in a sense, in her own power. Mighty responsibility! Thank God, she is beginning to awake to meet it. (Mark 13:10.)

When the entire evidence of the near coming of the Lord is considered, it leaves no room for doubt that the heavens will soon be illumined with his glorious appearing.

WORLD'S FAIR PROGRESS.

Still More Beautiful Structures going up.—The Electrical and Horticultural Buildings.

UBLIC interest in the progress of the preparations for the World's Fair of 1893 is increasing everywhere. While the work is being pushed forward rapidly in all departments, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pavilion, to which we referred in a former issue, is also making headway and it is fully expected that within a very short time the plans will be sufficiently advanced for publication. The Pavilion, when completed, will be capable of accommodating over 1200 persons. International and interdenominational services will be held there every day during the Fair, being conducted by speakers in the different languages. Rev. Dr. Talmage, Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, himself presiding at the dedication service. It is hoped that this effort to maintain daily Gospel services at the Exposition will receive the cordial support of God's people everywhere in the Union, and that it may be the means of accomplishing much spiritual good among the vast multitudes flowers, plants, vines, seeds and horticultural implements. Those exhibits requiring sunshine and light will be shown in the rear where the roof is entirely of glass. The front under the galleries is designed for exhibits that require only the ordinary amount of light. The exterior is in stucco, tinted a soft, warm buff. The cost of the building is $400,000.

The Electrical building covers a space of 700 by 350 feet. Like most of the others the style is Italian renaissance. It is 60 feet high, and ornamented with suitable designs. It will cost $650,000. There will be four entrances, the main one on the south. It will be built of a material resembling granite in color and a statue of Franklin will rise conspicuously before the south entrance.

THE MEDICAL MISSIONARY IN COREA.

"COREANS," says Dr. C. C. Vinton, of Seoul, in a communication to the Church at Home and Abroad, "have unbounded faith in medicines administered in large quantities and in their own system of surgery which has not the slightest basis of anatomical knowledge. They are amazed, however, at the coolness and decision of American practitioners in the use of surgical instruments. I was intensely amused last week by the open-mouthed wonder of a group of soldiers and chair-bearers who stood about the door of my drug-room to see me tie a spurting artery and bring together the gaping edges of a wound incurred by one of their comrades. Equal interest and amazement was displayed upon every use of my pocket-case. Almost every wound brought to me to dress has been previously supposed to possess healing properties, and my first step in treatment is to cleanse the part of its filthy incumbrance. The sight of blood for which he is responsible quite unnerves the Corean, and he looks with awe upon the temerity of the foreigner who works on coolly amid increasing streams of the red liquid which he himself draws, and which he seems able to stanch at will.

"So it is that the Coreans have unbounded confidence in foreign surgical skill. They believe that they are quite capable of miracles and are amazed when we refuse to perform them. Not long since a man came two hundred miles in order that I might place new eyes in his empty sockets, and would not be put off with the first assurance of its impossibility. I have been asked to restore withered hands, sightless eyes, limbs deformed from childhood, fractured bones united in malpositions, and to remove countless scars and facial blemishes of various descriptions. So much confidence was felt in my surgical skill that I was allowed last month to attempt the removal of a needle broken off in the palm of a woman of rank. The hand was passed through an aperture in a screen, and held by her husband, while I sat on the floor beside him and wielded the scalpel. It was comical to see the puzzled faces of her two sons as they saw me draw blood freely, and heard her declaration that she felt no pain because of the cocaine I had applied."

POST-MORTEM REPUTATION.

RECENTLY we have had, by autobiographies and papers published after decease, the attempt made to decide what shall be said after one's departure. But no man ever succeeded in taking care of his name after he is dead. If it live at all, it will, in a few years, come to be taken for just what it is worth, all the panegyrists and defamers notwithstanding. There is swung somewhere between heaven and earth a steel-yard which weighs everything just right, though for a little while it may quiver uncertainly. If a man does his best while living, he need not be anxious either about his bones or his after-death reputation. He who has had a full chance at the world for fifty or seventy years ought to be satisfied. After he is dead let him keep still. He who serves God and his country is every day composing his own epitaph, deciding his own biography, and chiselling his own monument. He need not be afraid either of stone-cutter or critic.

CONCERNING CRITICISM.

BE lenient with the fallen. You see a brother fall, and say, "I never could have done that!" Perhaps you could not, because your temptation does not happen to be in that direction; but you have done things in the course of your life that these fallen men would never have done, because their temptation was not in that direction. Perhaps the devil that inhabits you is avarice, a more respectable vice. You grind the faces of the poor. You have an infernal clutch for the throat of the unfortunate. There is no more mercy in your heart than there is grace in a lion's paw or a rattlesnake's tooth; and though your sin does not bring upon you so much of social opprobrium as the conduct of the man whom you condemn, I do not know but that your sin in the sight of God is as loathsome and damnable as his. He surrendered to one temptation; you to another.

Do not say in boasting, "I never could have done such a thing as that!" You don't know what you would do if sufficiently tempted. You have an infinite soul-force. If grace direct it, a force for right; if evil influences seize upon it, a terrific force for the wrong. There are passions within your soul that have never been unchained. Look out if once they slip their cables!

In our criticisms of others let us remember that we have faults which our friends have to excuse. How much would be left of us if all those who see inconsistencies in us should clip away from our character and reputation? It is an invariable rule that those who make the roughest work with the names of others are those who have themselves the most imperfections. The larger the beam in your own eye, the more anxious are you about the mote in somebody else's eye. Instead of going about town slashing this man's bad temper and the other man's falsity, and this woman's hypocrisy and that one's indiscretion, go home with the ten commandments as a monitor, and make out a list of your own derelictions.

COUNTRY LIFE.

WE congratulate those who can live in the country. Jesus loved the country. We find him among the mountains and sitting by the sea. He pressed a lily in his sermon. He caught a bird for a text. He walked in the garden the night of his capture. So it is a good sign when a Christian finds company, and suggestiveness, and refreshment in the beautiful things of God's world. There may be means of grace in a hyacinth or japonica. It is well when in the small door-yard of a city residence a patch of luxuriant grass is cultivated, or a clematis is taught to climb. A man can preach better of love and faith and heaven when there are camellias on the pulpit. It is no evidence of weak sentimentality when a Christian loves natural beauty. Jesus resorted to a garden. No doubt Christ selected the garden of this country-seat as a place for private devotion. He who has no spot for secret prayer is a starveling Christian. A man has sorrows, temptations, sins and deliverances that are no one else's business. He is a fool who tells the world everything. There are prayers that belong only to God's ear. Better have some place consecrated to private prayer. Choose a pleasant place if possible—not the garret, not the cellar, but a room warm, lighted, cheerful. There is no use in penance.

CONSOLATIONS.

ONE-HALF of the families of the earth sit at this time in dumb amazement at the afflictive providences of God. Bereavement for the most part is inexplicable. Why is the husband taken in mid-life before the children are educated and reared? Why does the mother go away into eternity at the time she is most needed here? Why must the young man die at the close of a collegiate course that was intended to fit him for great usefulness? Why not let us all die of old age after our work is fully done and life has no more attractions? Strike a light, if you can, over this mystery. Analyze, dissect, philosophize, a thousand years, and you cannot by any human device open one shutter. But in the gospel the sun rises. Light gradually breaks in as the morning looks through the cracks of the door and the lattice—not full day, but a promise of high noon.

Heaven must be populated. There is not so much room on the Western prairies and table-lands for more settlers as there is room in the upper country for more people. Heaven has only one want, and that is of greater population. It is sparsely inhabited yet, as compared with its future citizenship. The crowns are not half taken, nor the robes half worn. Heaven is like a house in which a levee is to be held at ten o'clock. At nine o'clock the rooms are all ablaze with lights, and the servants, gloved and vested, are waiting to open the doors. The rooms of our Father's house are illumined, and the chamberlains are ready, and the table is spread. A few have entered, but heaven is not yet fully begun. They have only sung the opening piece. Now, how shall God fill up his house except by subtracting from this world? The continent of heaven is to be peopled from the surrounding islands.

Why, in almost all cases it is the loveliest one of the family that is transported. Heaven wants the best. Why should not the great capital of the universe have the pick of everything? The half-and-half Christians will get into glory, but they need be kept here a good while yet for polishing. Those who are ready God takes. The earlier inhabitants of a place make the greatest impression upon its future character, and so heaven ought to have the best first. Besides that, if there were a shipwreck, and you went out with a life-boat, and you find some of your friends clinging to the hulk, you would be apt to take them ashore first. God seems to set his special love on some; and when he finds them shivering amid this world's temptations and sorrows, he first lifts them out of the breakers.

MINISTER'S DIET.

THE average salary of ministers in the United States is under four hundred dollars a year. The world wonders that, with such a rousing theme as the Gospel, and with such a grand work as saving souls, the ministry should ever be nerveless. Some ascribe it to lack of piety, and some to timidity of temperament. We believe that in a great number of cases it is from the lack of nourishing food. Many of the clerical brotherhood are on low diet. After jackets and sacks have been provided for the eight or ten children of the parsonage, the father and mother must watch the table with severest economy. Coming in suddenly upon the dinner-hour of the country clergyman, the housewife apologizes for what she calls "a picked-up" dinner, when, alas! it is nearly always picked-up. Congregations sometimes mourn over dull preaching when themselves are to blame. Give your minister more food, and he will have more fire. Next to the divine unction, the minister needs blood; and he cannot make that out of tough leather. One reason why the apostles preached so powerfully was that they had healthy food. Fish was cheap along Galilee, and this, with unbolted bread, gave them plenty of phosphorus for brain food. These early ministers were never invited out to late suppers, with chicken salad and doughnuts. Nobody ever embroidered slippers for the big foot of Simon Peter, the fisherman preacher. Tea parties, with hot waffles, at ten o'clock at night, make namby-pamby ministers; but good hours and substantial diet, that furnish nitrates for the muscle, and phosphates for the brain, and carbonates for the whole frame, prepare a man for effective work. When the water is low the mill-wheel goes slow; but a full race, and how fast the grists are ground. In a man the arteries are the mill-race, and the brain the wheel; and the practical work of life is the grist ground. The reason our soldiers failed in some of the battles was because their stomachs had for several days been innocent of everything but "hard-tack." See that your minister has a full haversack. Feed him on gruel during the week, and on Sunday he will give you gruel. What is called the "parson's nose" in a turkey or fowl is an allegory setting forth that in many communities the minister comes out behind. Seven or eight hundred dollars for a minister is only a slow way of killing him, and is the worst style of homicide. The damage begins in the college boarding-house. The theological student has generally small means, and he must go to a cheap boarding-house. A frail piece of sausage trying to swim across a river of gravy on the breakfast-plate, but drowned at last; "The linked sweetness long drawn out" of flies in the molasses cup; the gristle of a tough ox and measly biscuit, and buckwheat cakes tough as the cook's apron, and old peas in which the bugs lost their life before they had time to escape from the saucepan, and stale cucumbers cut up into small slices of cholera morbus, are the provender out of which we are trying at Princeton and Yale and New Brunswick to make Sons of Thunder. Sons of mush! From such depletion we step gasping into the pulpit, and look so heavenly pale that the mothers in Israel are afraid we will evaporate before we get through our first sermon. Many of our best young men in preparation for the ministry are going through this martyrdom. The strongest mind in our theological class perished, the doctors said afterward, from lack of food. The only time he could afford a doctor was for his post-mortem examination.

BRIEF NOTES.

A boycott of liquor dealers has been organized in Chicago, by the Women's Christian Temperance Union. A pledge has been issued the signer of which binds herself to purchase no groceries or other goods from any tradesman, who sells intoxicating liquors.

Rev. C. H. Yatman's farewell services at Trenton, on Sept. 13, consisted of a sunrise Prayer-meeting at 6:30 A.M.; a Fellowship Meeting of young men at 9:00 A.M.; a meeting for girls only at 1:00 P.M.; a song service for men only at 4:00 P.M.; a Young People's meeting at 6:30 P.M.; a Farewell Mass meeting at 9:00 P.M.; and two preaching services at 10:30 A.M.; and 7:45 P.M. All these services were thronged and the presence of the Holy Spirit was clearly manifested.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon was still making progress toward recovery according to the cable reports last week. On Wednesday he had a slight relapse, due probably to a change in the weather to which in his enfeebled condition he is very sensitive. Though these relapses have been numerous he has hitherto made evident progress, and is still fully convinced that in answer to the prayers of God's people he will be restored to health. He earnestly solicits a continuance of prayers.

Mr. J. C. Lanphier, the Founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, has the pleasure of celebrating this day the thirty-fourth anniversary of the first of those meetings in the chapel, 113 Fulton Street. Mr. Lanphier is over eighty-two years of age, yet he is always in his place from noon to one o'clock, and is as deeply interested in his work as ever. Probably no living man has seen so many answers to prayers as he. His portrait and an illustrated history of the Prayer Meeting appeared in this journal on Jan. 23, 1889.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, whose work among the Jews of New York has frequently been mentioned in these columns, had the gratification of baptizing two more converts from Judaism, last Sunday evening. We learn that the heavy burden of debt on his church at 17 Street Mark's Place, under which he has so long struggled, has now been reduced to $3,000. Mr. Freshman is hoping for its entire extinction in the near future, when, relieved from the financial anxiety it involves, he will be able to give his undivided attention to his gospel work.

Dr. Munhall's meetings at Birmingham, Conn., have stirred the whole place. The Evening Transcript says: "Sunday, Sept. 13, was without doubt the greatest day religiously these villages have ever seen." Over one hundred persons rose in the great tent at the evening service, and publicly made profession of conversion. There was a Christian Endeavor conference with the Evangelist at nine in the morning. Another young people's meeting was held in the afternoon, when the tent was crowded, and at night, numbers remained outside after every available space within had been occupied and strained their ears to catch some portions of the sermon and the singing. Mr. and Mrs. Lowe are as usual conducting the musical parts of the service.

We are in receipt of many applications from colored ministers in the South for participation in the benefits of the fund for supplying them with this journal. Many write that they have not yet had the benefit of the paper and many others, who have been receiving it during the past year, want it for another year. One of the latter, writes that last year he derived more help in his work and more light on the Scriptures from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD than from all other books and papers together. The fund is now exhausted, but we shall be glad to receive contributions to it, which will be used as they come in to fill these applications. The amounts received since our last acknowledgment are as follow: From Denbigh Ont. Canada, $3.50; Springfield, Ont. Canada, $5; Mt. Jackson, Va., $1; Villa Park, Cal., $3.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Fatal Floods in Spain—Ex-Minister Loring Dead—The British Trades Union Congress—World's Fair Conference—Calling China to Account—The Western Irrigation Congress—General Notes.

A CONFERENCE between the World's Fair Foreign Commission and the principal officers of the Treasury, as to the modification of the customs regulations, so as to facilitate the free entry of exhibits, was held at Washington last week. One of the principal regulations which it is desired to have adopted, is to give foreign exhibitors the right to consign their invoices of exhibits direct to Chicago, without the necessity of having the contents of their boxes declared and authenticated by a United States Consul. The Commissioners represented to the Treasury officials that this was the wish of the intending exhibitors from foreign nations. No decision was rendered on the application. Marquis Imperiali, the Italian Charge d'Affairs, has informed the Fair Commissioners that Italy will not be represented at the coming Fair. He explains that this declination is not based upon any point of retaliation, or dictated by animosity, but that it is a settled principle with the Italian Government not to participate in World's Fairs in other countries.

The Trades Union Congress.

LABOR reformers are greatly disappointed in the result of the Trades Union Congress in England. Its failure to take decided ground on the eight-hour question and its general turbulence, owing to the predominance of Socialist influences were surprises to the moderate trades unionists. Had it not been for the firmness and good temper of Thomas Burt, M. P., the Chairman, the Convention would have culminated in as great an uproar as the Brussels body, several weeks ago. Mr. Burt, whose portrait is given above, is the Liberal Member of Parliament for Morpeth, President of the Miners' National Union and has presided over workmen's congresses at various times. He is a wholly self-educated man and so popular with the miners that they sent him to Parliament and allowed him $2,000 a year to pay his expenses. He is invaluable as a Chairman, and it is related of him that Sir John E. Gorst was so impressed with his ability that he remarked: "If we ever have a Labor Parliament, Burt will be made perpetual President." Burt was a miner and worked 18 years in the pits. He became a teetotaler at 15, a temperance orator at 18, and was naturally studious and a great reader. He is opposed to strikes and has frequently antagonized the miners on that account.

Terrible Floods in Spain.

ONE of the most stupendous disasters in many years is reported from Spain. Frightful floods have devastated the province of Toledo, causing the death of thousands of persons and the loss of a vast amount of property. In the township of Consuegro alone, it is estimated that three thousand inhabitants have perished. The scenes are described as appalling. In many places, scores of bodies have been found, on the partial receding of the floods, some of them with limbs torn off by the mighty force of the current. So numerous are the corpses that the officials have telegraphed for lime to prevent an outbreak of plague. Consuegro is thirty-five miles from Toledo, and before the flood, it had a population of about 7,000. It had several factories for the manufacture of woollens. Now, all around are signs of destruction. Hundreds of houses are levelled to the ground; the dead-carts pass through the streets gathering up the flood victims, and the thoroughfares are piled with wreckage. The survivors say there was scarcely a moment's warning. There had been a heavy rain for two days, swelling the mountain streams that feed the Amarguillo, Turia and Jascar rivers, and suddenly the water came in on the doomed town with a mighty rush. People fled in all directions. Many took refuge upon the roofs only to be drowned as the frail buildings fell in, sapped by the current. In one public hall where a wedding had been celebrated, sixty corpses were found. The town of Jaen and the commune of Aubeda were submerged; at the latter point four stone bridges were destroyed, besides twenty mills and numerous houses. Railroads were washed out and travel stopped. At Valencia, the rice crop was utterly destroyed. The Spanish Government has donated $100,000 for the relief of the sufferers and public subscriptions have been opened in all the large cities.

The Irrigation Congress.

DURING the past week, an Irrigation Congress has been in session in Salt Lake City, Utah, discussing ways and means to redeem the great arid tract of lands in the far Western States. The speeches advocated national action looking to the granting of sufficient lands to the State to justify the latter in undertaking the work of reclamation. There are 55,000,000 acres of arid lands in Utah alone of which 2,000,000 could speedily be utilized. Another suggestion was that Congress should encourage emigration from the East to these lands, by the granting of liberal plots—say 160 to 320 acres to each adult—on terms attractive to the settler, with a water supply at the minimum rate. At the closing day's session, the following resolution was adopted and a Committee appointed to visit Washington and prepare a memorial to Congress:

"Resolved: That it is justly due the settlers of Montana, the Dakotas, Wyoming, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma, who have paid into the United States Treasury millions of dollars in the purchase of these lands, and have expended other millions in fruitless attempts to farm them without irrigation, that a portion of the funds so paid be expended in securing to such lands the benefit of irrigation."

Death of Ex-Minister Loring.

DR. GEORGE BAILEY LORING, ex-United States Minister to Portugal and formerly Commissioner of Agriculture, died of heart disease at Salem, Mass., on the 14th inst. Dr. Loring, (whose portrait we give in this column), was born at North Andover, Mass., in 1817 and was graduated at Harvard in 1842 from the Medical Department. After an experience of several years in the medical branch of the U. S. Navy he devoted himself to practical and scientific agriculture. In 1864 he was elected President of the New England Agricultural Society. He was a Centennial Commissioner from 1872 to 1876, was President of the Massachusetts Senate from 1873 to 1877 and served in Congress from 1877 to 1881, when he was appointed Commissioner of Agriculture, which office he held for four years. Of late years failing health prevented him from active participation in public affairs.

A Soldiers' Monument Unveiled.

YONKERS, N. Y., was the scene of a very brilliant celebration on the 17th inst., when a monumental shaft erected to the memory of the soldiers and sailors who fell in the Civil War, was unveiled in the presence of 10,000 spectators. Secretary Tracy of the Navy Department sent the United States Cruiser, Boston, to honor the occasion and there was a magnificent military display by different G.

A. R. posts, and military and naval veterans. A parade and procession were followed by the formal unveiling in the open square near the historic Phillipse Manor House, with prayer, music, singing, and recitations. Charles E. Gorton delivered the dedication address. The monument is of the finest Barre granite, and cost $13,000. It is 46 feet high, and at the top is the statue of a color-bearer, eight feet high. The pyramidal shaft below is surrounded by four bronze statues seven feet high, representing the cavalry, infantry, artillery, and navy. George H. Mitchell of Chicago, is the designer of the monument.

A Notable Western Woman III.

MRS. THURMAN, wife of Judge Allen G. Thurman of Ohio, is reported dangerously ill at her home in Columbus, O.

MRS. THURMAN.

Mrs. Thurman is one of the best known ladies in the West and is, besides, a very great favorite at the National Capital. She was, before her marriage to Judge Thurman, a Miss Mary Dun, of Kentucky. A noble Christian woman, living a very plain life and employing the wealth at her command in deeds of charity and kindness, Mrs. Thurman has made hosts of friends among the poor of Columbus and elsewhere, and is greatly beloved by many interested in Christian work. She and her husband reside in a remarkably plain homestead which is known as "The Thurman House." Three children, a son and two daughters, were the fruit of the union. Surrounded by her children and grandchildren, Mrs. Thurman has been an active worker in every charity and a Lady Bountiful to a very extensive district. All their lives, she and her husband have been in the habit of walking to church, and even when prosperity came, the old couple could not be persuaded to keep a horse and wagon but continued to walk to service, although the distance was considerable. A portrait of Mrs. Thurman is given above.

Calling China to Account.

It is now practically settled by the European governments that China is to be compelled to pay suitable damages for the recent outbreaks, and to furnish satisfactory assurances of protection to foreigners in the future. The foreign ministers at Peking have sent a protest to the Imperial Government, and there is further talk of a great naval demonstration of the European fleets in Chinese waters. Li Hung Chang, the Premier, has been evasive in his replies to England's inquiries about the recent outbreaks, and the fixed impression is that China is not to be depended on to keep any promises she may make. England has submitted an ultimatum, and if China does not now give an adequate reply, the threatened naval demonstration will take place. It is not at all certain that the United States war vessels now in Chinese waters will take part in this demonstration. The vessels now there are all old-style ships—the Marion, the Omaha, the Palos and the Swarara. Secretary Tracy explains that it is impossible to send any of the new cruisers to China, those already built being incomplete in their equipment.

Government Crisis in Quebec.

A CONFLICT of authority exists in the Province of Quebec between Lieut.-Governor Angers the representative of the Crown, and M. Mercier, the head of the Quebec government. The latter is charged with being implicated in a scheme to devote $100,000 of Treasury funds to paying the debts of several members of the Ministry. Lieut.-Gov. Angers demanded an explanation of this charge from the accused and insisted upon the appointment of a Royal Commission to investigate. He also sent all the correspondence on the subject to the Governor-General of the Dominion and it has since been made public, creating a great scandal. It is understood that the Quebec government will refuse to comply with Lieut.-Gov. Anger's demands and will probably resign. The Cabinet denies the right of the Dominion government to intervene in strictly provincial affairs.

The Jewish Exodus Extending.

THE cable brings from Palestine a pathetic story of the experiences of a large number of Russian Hebrews who arrived at the port of Jaffa, recently. They were not allowed to land and were compelled again to put to sea. Afterward futile attempts were made to land at different ports, but at all they were met by the same refusal. They were finally conveyed to Cyprus. In the city of Jerusalem, the Turkish authorities are adopting an annoying attitude toward the Hebrew residents and seem to be determined to crowd them out, although there is at the present time enough unused soil for the support of a very large population throughout the Holy Land. One theory of this new phase of the Hebrew persecution is that the Sultan means to exact a large money consideration before granting them the privilege of settling in Palestine. A contingent of Hebrews from Russia, arrived at St. John, N. B., a few days ago, but the Dominion Government absolutely refused to assist them, and they were compelled to beg for food and sleep out-of-doors.

NEWS NOTES.

Emperor William last week reviewed the German troops and witnessed a sham battle at Mulhausen.

Intelligence from Honolulu states that England is about to take forcible possession of the Sandwich Islands.

John D. Rockefeller, the millionaire oil king, is very ill. His physicians say he has no organic disease, but must have absolute rest.

President Harrison and family have returned to Washington. Secretary Blaine and family have left Bar Harbor and gone to Augusta, Me.

Mrs. Peary, the wife of the Arctic explorer, writes to a friend in Richmond, Va., stating that the entire party is very comfortable and not in distress, as reported.

Three thousand mill hands are on a strike in Ottawa, Can., and troops are guarding the mills to prevent riot. The strike promises to be the largest ever known in Canada.

Servant girls are so scarce at Dantzic that the residents have petitioned the Government to allow the importation of Russian women from Poland, with the privilege of a three-years' sojourn.

Russia has successfully negotiated her new loan which has been taken by French financiers in advance. A new issue of twenty-five millions of rubles, in notes, was made at St. Petersburg on Sept. 18th.

The large amount of silver taken by ex-President Balmaceda from the Chilean treasury, is now in the Bank of England, awaiting the decision of the courts. Balmaceda, is at Mendoza, in the Argentine Republic.

The Guion Line steamship Arizona, while on the voyage from New York to Queenstown, ran into a timber-laden schooner, inflicting serious damage on both vessels. The schooner floated and the steamer, with a torn deck, battered plates and 30 feet of her rail carried away, continued on her voyage.

Sherman Cummin, who was supposed to have been one of the victims of the fire disaster in Park Place, New York, has unexpectedly come to life. He went to Canada immediately before the fire. Typographical Union No. 6, and the City Relief Committee both paid out considerable money to his supposed widow.

Several lives were lost by a fire in the Commercial Advertiser building, corner of Nassau and Fulton Streets, New York City, on the 15th inst. The building was an old one, and filled with tenants, all of whom, except two men named Adelman, escaped. No water could be obtained from the hydrants by the Fire Department.

During an experimental trip over the New York Central Railroad, a few days ago, a run of 436 1-2 miles was made in 440 minutes, being at the rate of 61.44 miles an hour, including allowances for stops. This is the fastest time ever made on any American railroad. One straight run of 143 miles was made in 140 minutes.

Charles Adolph Pineton, Marquis de Chambrun and d'Amfreville, died at his residence in New York last week, after a three weeks' illness. He was born in 1831 of a noble French family, and was one of the foremost among the Legitimist leaders for many years. He was an author of considerable repute. After the fall of the empire he came to this country.

Ex-Congressman Charles H. Allen has been nominated by the Republicans of Massachusetts for Governor and William H. Haile for Lieutenant-Governor. Henry Cabot Lodge was Permanent Chairman of the Massachusetts Convention.

SUPERFICIAL CURE.

"They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace."—Jeremiah 8: 11.
 "Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved: for thou art my praise."—Jeremiah 17: 14.

THE people among whom Jeremiah dwelt had received a grievous hurt, and they felt it, for they were invaded by cruel enemies, their goods were plundered, their children were slain, and their cities burned. Jeremiah, with true love to his nation, warned them that the cause of all their trouble was that they had forsaken their God. He tried to show them that the only way to be healed of their hurt was to be healed of their sin; that if they would give up their idolatry and all the infamous wickedness that grew out of it, and turn to the true God and obey his commandments, then brighter days would come. Their conscience must have told them that all this was true; but, alas! Jeremiah preached to them in vain. As

The Old Classic Prophetess

Cassandra was doomed for ever to speak the truth and never to be believed, so was Jeremiah: the people heard him, but they regarded him not. Meanwhile, certain pretenders to prophecy opposed Jeremiah, and sought to win the confidence of the nation. They came with "Thus saith the Lord" upon their lips, blasphemously pretending to be speaking in the name of Jehovah when Jehovah had not sent them, nor did they seek his glory. They buoyed up the people's hopes with vain confidences, and took them off from repentance and return to God. No good came of their teachings—they did but film the wound of the nation and left the deadly venom still within. The hopes which they excited lasted but for a little time, and then died out in blank despair. They had not touched the root which bore the wormwood. They had made light of the national sin. They had healed the hurt of Judah slightly, saying, "Peace, peace," when there is no peace.

To-day, God's servants, who are the true successors of the prophets, have a task before them sterner even than that of the ancient seers. It is not ours to point to smoking ruins and the carcasses of the unburied dead—plain evidences of a grievous hurt; but our work is to deal with spiritual sickness, and to come among a people who confess no hurt. Great multitudes of our hearers do not welcome the news of a heavenly remedy because they are not aware that they are sick. A physician who has to commence his practice by convincing his neighbors that they are sick has not a hopeful sphere before him.

Such is Our Work.

When that great labor is accomplished we have yet another remaining, namely, to excite in men a desire after healing. Many there are who confess their disease, but the disease of sin has wrought in them a spiritual lethargy, so that they find a horrible rest in their lost estate, and have no longing to rise to spiritual health, of which, indeed, they know nothing. They are guilty, and willing to remain guilty; inclined to evil, and content with the inclination. Hundreds live and die in this condition.

After these things are done, we have but stormed the outworks of the castle, for there still remains another difficulty. Convinced that they want healing, and made in a measure anxious to find it, the danger with the awakened is lest they should rest content with an apparent cure, and miss the real work of grace. We are perilously likely to rest satisfied with a slight healing, and by this means to miss the great and complete salvation which comes from God alone. I wish to speak in deep earnestness to everyone here present upon this subject.

I. First, then, we assert that it is very easy for us to be the subjects of a False Healing.

You will kindly understand that I am not going to talk about the inhabitants of Laputa; I am now speaking straight to every one of you. I say, we are all of us in danger of being the subject of a false healing: ministers, deacons, elders, church members, aged professors, and young beginners—all alike. We might infer this from the fact that no doubt a large number of persons are so deceived. If a large number of persons are so, then why should not we be? The tendency of other men is probably in us also. Why not? Are there not many persons who consider that all is well with them because they have been observant of church ordinances from their youth up, and their parents were observant for them before they came upon the stage of responsibility. They are afraid of digging too deep, and so they are satisfied with having a form of godliness. Though they have felt no change of heart, and no renewal of spirit, they nevertheless believe that all is well with them, at least they hope so, and therefore they are at ease in Zion. This is a poor, slovenly soul-surgery which will end in eternal death. Beware of it, I pray you, while yet a work of grace may be wrought upon you.

Covered, Not Healed.

I am afraid, too, that many who do not rely upon religious forms yet confide in doctrinal beliefs. They are sound in the faith—Orthodox, Evangelical, and Calvinistic. They heartily detest any doctrine that is not Scriptural. I am glad to find that it is so with them; but let them not rest on this. To cover a wound with a royal garment is not to heal it, and to conceal a sinful disposition beneath a sound creed is not salvation. Believe what you may, even though you should know the whole truth of God, yet if your faith never changes your heart nor affects your life you will be in no way superior to the devil who believes; nay, you may not be quite as good as he, for devils believe and tremble, and to believe without trembling is a stage lower down. Oh, my dear hearer, I implore you do not rest content with such a slight healing as this.

Depend upon this, that if there is a chance of our being deceived at all we are always ready to aid in

The Deception.

As a rule, we are all inclined to think well of ourselves. I dare say that if any cautious flatterer will assure me that I am a very wise person, I shall before long come to the conclusion that he is a remarkably sensible and far-seeing individual. If anyone should accuse you of a virtue which you never possessed, if, he would but persevere long enough with his pleasing insinuation, you will begin to smile inwardly, and hint to your conscience that there are latent excellencies about you which this man with prophetic glance has discovered. The devil, who knows the exact bait for poor human nature, finds it easy to pacify an anxious mind by presenting a false salvation, and persuading the heart that all is well, while in fact nothing is well. A little feeling of natural regret flits over the mind, and the false fiend whispers, "It is repentance." "Oh, yes," says the ready dupe, "I am a penitent." A little presumptuous cozening of ourselves into comfort is indulged and the deceiver sings, "Hail, precious faith." How pleased we are when we jump to the conclusion that we have passed from death unto life, and are, indeed, the servants of the living God. We do not look back to see whether there was any new birth, whether there was any change of heart, whether there was any giving up of sin, whether there was any laying hold on righteousness, whether there was any severance from self and Union to Christ.

Superficial religion also will always be fashionable because it does not require self-denial. A man may be outwardly religious and yet be a private tippler, but he cannot be a true Christian at that rate; such secret defilement he must abandon. Or perhaps he has enmity towards his brother. Now he can go to mass or attend early communion, and yet hate his brother, but he cannot go to heaven and do that, he cannot be a regenerate man and do that. He may be following all the while some secret lust, and yet be a great man in his church, so long as he can keep his wantonness away from prying eyes. A superficial religion suits the unclean gentleman; but genuine godliness will not allow a darling lust to live. Do you wonder that vital godliness is at a discount when it proclaims war to the knife against a lifelong indulgence. It is with Christ as it might be in surgery.

Two Eminent Practitioners

profess to deal with polypus. The first declares that he can work an effectual cure, but it must be understood that he uses the knife freely. He believes no cure to be possible unless all the roots of the growth are taken away. He will not pretend to half measures: the whole thing must be eliminated, or he can work no cure. On the other side of the street another surgeon of great name depends upon an outward application which, in quite a painless manner, acts upon the diseased part, and according to his statement secures the desired result. He says, "My friend goes too deep, and makes too much of the matter. Come in here; the disease is a mere bagatelle. I will end the mischief without cutting and hacking." You can readily guess how popular this last gentleman will be if he can gain public confidence. But what will be the end of it? That is the point. If the sharp and deep cut of the first surgeon ministers to ultimate health, and is absolutely needful to a cure, is it not best? If, in the second case, the end of these honeyed words is but the covering up of a foul loathsomeness, which will breed corruption and hasten death, is it not a wicked deception? Yet the most of men are so foolish as to choose the worse of the two in the affairs of their souls.

Slight healing, also, is sought by men, because it

Does Not Require Spirituality.

There are multitudes of men who, if the kingdom of heaven were to be had by outward actions, no matter how difficult, would at once commence the task. Say, "You must save so many hundreds of pounds and buy heaven," and they would starve themselves until they had hoarded up the money. Anything that could be done by the body would be cheerfully attempted, but true religion is spiritual, and carnal men cannot get at it: it is high above and out of their sight. Hence it is that the slight healing which comes of formalism and ceremonies, seeing it deals with outward manipulations, at once attracts them.

But, my dear hearers, let me warn you with all the energy I possess against ever being satisfied with any of the slight healings that are cried up nowadays, because they will all end in disappointment, as sure as you are living men. I could wish that they might speedily so end while yet you could begin again, and begin aright. Remember that if you pass through this life deceived there will await you an awful undeceiving in the next world. I will not try to depict the man who finds himself lost for ever, though he died in the odour of sanctity. What will be his horror when he finds himself cast out, and hears the Lord Jesus say, "I never knew you." Your minister knew you, the deacons knew you, the members knew you, but the Lord Jesus never did, for you had no heart-fellowship with him and were not in heart a believer in him. O brethren, if there be any error about your profession get it right now. Do not go on under a delusion. Surely you cannot wish to be puffed up with vain imaginations of hopes which are fallacious. Search then, and see.

II. Be it ours to seek

True Healing

But then, as we have already said, this true healing must be radical. Oh, pray to have it so! The healing which we need must go to the root of the business, and work a thorough change. Such a work is described in Scripture as a creation—"created anew in Christ Jesus:" it must be a resurrection.—"And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." Now I ask you, my dear brethren, whether you can undertake this? Creation and resurrection, do these lie in your power? You can do nothing of the kind, and so you are driven to my second text, "O Lord, heal me, and I shall be healed, save me, and I shall be saved."

Now go a step further. The healing we want must be a healing from the guilt of sin. My anxious friend, you must be no longer guilty; you must be free from fault. Every offence you have ever committed must be washed right out, even the least stain of it must vanish, and it must be as though it had never been, and you must be as though you never had offended at all.

"How Can That Be?"

say you. It is clear it cannot be by anything that you can do; and this again drives you to the prayer of my text, "Heal me, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved." How can it be? Only by the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ our Saviour. He took the sin of his people upon him; became their substitute and representative, bore their iniquity, and was made a curse for them, and in consequence they are set free, cleared, and justified. The day cometh when the sins of Jacob shall be sought for, and they shall not be found; yea, they shall not be, saith the Lord. Blessed healing this! Who but a divine Physician could work such a cure?

But you must not only be free from sin, you must be freed from sinfulness: a work must be wrought in you, my dear brother, and in me, by which we shall be clean rid of every tendency to do evil. We cannot enter into heaven with sinful tendencies: corruption and depravity cannot be endured before the throne of the thrice holy Jehovah. The very roots and root-lets of sin must come out of the nature which is to share the abode of God. Does not this drive you to despair? In answer to your cry the Eternal Spirit shall come upon you,

Creating You Anew

in Christ Jesus: he shall come and dwell in you, and shall break down the reigning power of sin, putting it beneath your feet. Though this defeated foe shall strive and struggle like a serpent with his back broken, yet it has its death wound, and cannot regain its former dominion. It will struggle so long as you are in this life, but it must ultimately die, and you shall attain perfection. No tendency to sin, no affection towards evil, no fear of relapse, nor danger of apostasy shall remain, but there shall be in us the living and incorruptible seed, and we shall be the members of Christ's body.

It is most desirable to be so healed in soul as to stand the test of this present life. I have known friends discharged from the hospital as healed of disease who were bitterly disappointed when they came into every day life: a little exertion made them as ill as ever. A person had a piece of diseased bone in the wrist; it was taken out by the hospital surgeon, and the arm seemed perfectly healed, but when she began to work the old pain returned, and it was evident that

The Old Mischief Was There Still, and some decayed bone remained. Thus some are saved, so they think, but it is only in seemingly, for when they get into the world, and are tried with temptation, they are just the same as they used to be. They have not received a practical salvation; and nothing but practical salvation is worth having. A sham cure is worse than none. If a bone is ill set it is often necessary to break it again, and it sometimes seems to me that certain converts want their hearts to be broken again that they may be truly comforted. If any man here has been healed, but his arm will not work for Jesus and for righteousness, it needs breaking again; and I should not mind if my sermon should break it, so long as he was driven to Christ to get it set in the right fashion. If you cannot resist the temptations of this life, depend upon it your salvation is a mere myth.

We want to have a salvation that will bear the test of sickness, and the strain of death, so that a man may lie back in his bed and say, "I do not fear to die: Jesus Christ has made me Perfectly Whole, and amongst the healed ones before his throne I shall shortly stand and sing his praises world without end." Oh, my dear hearers, could you die so? Have you a hope which will bear the light of your last hours? If you have not, do not let this day close until you have found it.

As I turned over my text while coming here I was charmed with the encouragement which it offers to the very chief of sinners, for these may say to themselves, "Is it, after all, God's work to save? Well, then, he can save a great sinner as well as a little sinner." If salvation were of works or of merits then many persons would evidently be excluded from hope, but if it is entirely of grace then none are excluded; and if the power be found in God and not in us, then the same power which can save the most moral young man can save the most dissolute and debauched person; and the same grace which can save the godly matron can save the impious harlot. The power of God is equal to any miracle. The mercy of God can go any length. Tell it; tell it that Jesus Christ is able to have compassion on the ignorant, and to save those who are out of the way. Out of the way sinners, outrageous sinners, black sinners, scarlet sinners: they, too, may pray the prayer, "Heal me, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved."

Applies to All. I know while I am preaching that certain of you say, "He does not mean me: I am too great a sinner." On the other hand, another class imagine that they are not sinful enough, so they also fancy that the discourse is not meant for them. Oh that you would give up this wicked perversity, and know that all truth that applies to you is meant for you.

This sermon is meant for those who think themselves angels as well as for those who know themselves to be sinners. Cease from all dreamy confidences; arouse yourselves from proud self-content, and come to Jesus the Saviour, who alone can save from sin and death.

Dear friends, if you are saved, pray the Lord that you may be saved indeed; and if you are not saved, get ye to him and pray him to begin his good work within your souls.

SILVER FROM THE SKIES.

MUCH discussion has been caused as to where a meteor fell which was seen by the people of about fifty villages in Maine near the Quebec boundary. It now appears that it fell at South Strong, Me., on the property of Dr. George Hunter, who resides there. Dr. Hunter says that while sitting up after midnight, he was startled by seeing a ball of fire, as large as a bushel basket, fall directly in front of the windows. At the same time he heard a sound as of snow falling from the roof, followed by the rattling of stones against the side of the house, while the building shook so that crockery rocked on the pantry shelves. He first thought that the chimney had fallen and that the house was on fire, but investigation outside disclosed simply a big hole in the snow bank, around which were scattered numerous fragments of what appeared to be coke. As no coal was used on the premises or anywhere for miles around, Dr. Hunter concluded that the fragments were parts of an exploded meteor. By the aid of a magnifying glass, traces of silver were discovered in the coke, and, by a process of his own, Dr. Hunter secured enough of the precious metal to plate a piece of iron, which he shows to visitors as a curiosity. The doctor sets great store by it, not on account of its intrinsic value, which is small, but because it came from the celestial regions. Few if any of us can boast the possession of silver from the skies, but many among us hold as their most precious treasure gifts from the heavens more to be desired than silver or "much fine gold." (Psalm 19:10.)

STRANGE WORK FOR CONVICTS.

THE state of Tennessee makes a practice of leasing its convicts, and the present lease is near expiration. The company which holds the lease has made a new offer to the State. It offers to build a new penitentiary in the Sequatchie Valley, employing convicts in the work. Stockades are to be built in Marion. There seems a grim irony in compelling the convicts themselves to build a penitentiary for their own confinement. But they are helpless in the matter and if the Legislature accepts the company's offer, they will have to do the work. What the convicts will have to do under compulsion many a young man is doing voluntarily. The evil habits he acquires and the vices in which he indulges are so many fetters which will gall him in old age and involve him in misery after death. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap." (Gal. 6:7-8.)

THE EXPLOSION OF A HAT.

AN illustration of the lasting qualities of Nitro-Glycerine is given in a dispatch from Bradford, Pa. It appears that one of the last processes in the production of the potent explosive is to strain it through felt. Old felt hats are often used for the purpose, being convenient and cheap. They are generally destroyed after much using, to do away with the danger which would result from careless handling. At one of the factories an employee resolved to test the life of nitro-glycerine, and he took a hat crown that had been used as a strainer, washed it thoroughly, and then put it through a course of treatment with alkalies. He was about to test it when he was called away on some business, so he laid it aside on a shelf and forgot all about it. In clearing the shelf two years afterward he found the hat and remembered what it was. He felt sure that after so long a time and after so thorough a treatment two years before, there could be no remains of the nitro-glycerine left in it, and to show that the stuff had been annihilated he put the felt on the iron arm on the tinner's bench, where the cans for holding the explosive are soldered, and struck it with a hammer. The result was a surprise to that factory. An explosion followed that broke both arms of the workman, stunned three other men, hurled the iron arm through a two-foot wall, and wrecked the tinning shop. It is not surprising to learn that after such an experience the workmen believe that it is impossible to expel nitro-glycerine from any material which has once been saturated with it. Social reformers, who have had much to do with criminals, have often formed the same conclusion about the taint and power of sin. When they have seen reformed men fall away after a period of good behavior they despair of effectually redeeming them. The Christian, however, need never despair of any one. He who promises, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow," is able to keep those who trust in him from falling away. (Jude 24.)

LOST ON THE MOUNTAINS.

THE people of Shamokin, Pa., spent a whole day recently searching for a lost child on the mountains. She was only ten years old and had been missing for twenty-four hours before the general alarm was given. The sympathetic citizens divided into parties and thoroughly searched the woods and every place where it was thought possible for her to be. No trace of the child could be found. The next morning a woodsman was met who had seen the child on the previous day playing beside a brook and had asked her name. She told him and said she was going home. He thought it was strange she should be in so desolate a place, but he made no further inquiry and left her. The searchers followed the brook and in a mile or two found the child asleep under a tree. When awakened she showed signs of terror and asked anxiously, "Will mamma whip me?" There was small chance of that. The mother who thought she must have been killed no sooner caught sight of her than she ran to meet her and clasped her in her arms and covered her face with kisses. The child said that at first when she realized she was lost she tried hard to find her way home but afterward she did not try so much, being afraid that when she did get home she would be punished. The same mistake often hinders the sinner and the backslider returning to their heavenly Father. They think they have sinned too deeply to be forgiven, though God assures the penitent of forgiveness and welcome. (Hosea 14:4.)

NOT IN THE BARGAIN.

UNEXPECTED profit has fallen to the lot of a contractor, who has undertaken some work in Helena, Mont. The Independent of that city, says that in making the excavation for the Montana club-building, the contractor has found gold dust in the soil. "Out of the excavation he has already taken several hundred dollars' worth of dust, and it is believed from present appearances that the diggings will be worth $100 a day in dust for some time. Strangers who have heard that the streets of Helena are paved with gold are invited to come to town and see for themselves. It often happens that the owner of a lot finds gold enough while digging the cellar to pay for his house. This is not guaranteed to purchasers, but there are several who have had that good fortune." The Christian knows something of an analogous experience. His hopes are centred on a life beyond this and he has been warned that in this world, he may have tribulation, but his labors and trials are attended by spiritual profit and joys which make him happier than worldlings are. (Psalm 36:8.)

A PROTECTOR FOR SALE.

AMONG the visitors to New York on Labor Day was a man from Newburgh, N. Y., who brought his dog, a beautiful Gordon setter, with him. After seeing the procession, the man made a tour among the saloons and before sunset was intoxicated. He continued his visits until he was helplessly drunk, when he lay down on a stoop and slept heavily. His dog kept watch over him and when a policeman came along and approached the man, the dog uttered a low growl and showed his formidable set of teeth. The officer tried coaxing, but the dog would not desert his post, nor suffer his master to be touched. Then the policeman drew his club, but the dog was not to be scared. A crowd collected, but no one dare touch the recumbent figure. At last the sleeping man's hat fell off and rolled into the gutter. The dog ran to fetch it and some one in the crowd slipped a hooked stick under his collar and held him back while the policeman raised the man to his feet. The dog apparently satisfied that no one wanted to hurt his master followed him quietly to the police station and remained in the cell with him all night. The next morning, the man was fined five dollars for his escapade. He was sensible enough then to be told by the policeman how his dog had protected him. The only effect it had on him was to suggest the thought that the dog was admired and he immediately devoted his efforts to selling him. It was an ungrateful thing to do. Every one who knew of it despised him. Yet the same spirit is all too common in the Church. Every professed follower of Christ who violates his conscience to gain or save money is practically selling the Lord who died for him. (1 Timothy 6:10.)

MINING BY BALLOON.

INGENIOUS schemes for acquiring wealth have never been so numerous as in our day and new ones are being continually devised. One of the latest is that of a western miner, whose proposal is a revolution in mining methods. Instead of delving down in the earth for precious metals, he is going mining in a balloon. Along the precipitous sides of the deep canons in the Rocky Mountains are many ledges which are known to be exceedingly rich in ore, but which are inaccessible on account of the immense height and sheer sides of the cliffs. The western man intends to reach these ledges in a balloon. He will anchor his large balloon to the bottom of the canon with long ropes, and ascend to the point of the wall of the canon where the ledge is. Then a foot-hold will be worked into the ledge from the balloon, and the mining begun from that point. The novelty in his project is in the method not in the object sought. It is much to be wished that men thought less of that object and more of heavenly riches; in another sense than that of the adventurous miner setting their affection on things above. (Col. 3:2.)

WAITING SETTLERS.

A PRESS despatch from Washington, D. C., gives an interview, on the approaching settlement of Oklahoma, with the Hon. Warren G. Sayre, of the Cherokee Commission. He said that there would be room on the land recently acquired in Oklahoma from the Indians for twenty thousand persons. There were five thousand quarter sections to be thrown open in a few days and they would be occupied by families averaging four to a family. A much larger section nearly four million acres in extent would ultimately be declared open when Congress had ratified the bargains with the Indians, but the former area would be occupied first. The land, he said was excellent, but the settlers would have to work hard at first to bring it under cultivation. He added that so intense was the desire to secure the land that when the President's proclamation declaring the land open for settlement is issued every section will be taken up within an hour. The people are ready and waiting to move in when the signal is given. Would that the same eagerness were shown to accept the offer, God makes to all men of a heavenly home through Christ! Though he died to secure it and though it is an eternal possession, men are indifferent to the offer. (1 Peter 1:4.)

A FRAUDULENT MARRIAGE.

A REMARKABLE case of alleged fraud has been reported to the government. A discharged soldier in receipt of a pension died recently in Baltimore, Md. On his death-bed and within a few minutes of his death, a woman who was nursing him was married to him. She is twenty-two years old while he was seventy-three. Every one in the room knew that he was dying, but his head was propped up and his hand was held by the woman while the questions were asked. The clergyman who performed the ceremony says that the dying man seemed utterly oblivious of what was going on and when asked if he took this woman for his wife he gurgled unintelligibly but was understood to stammer out "Yes." It is charged that the ghastly ceremony was performed to enable the woman to claim the pension and arrears of increase, which alone will amount to over a thousand dollars. If the charge is true the marriage was a burlesque, the woman, at any rate, knowing that in the circumstances her promises amounted to nothing. It was an empty form to gain money. In too many marriages money is the principal object in view on one side or the other and, unhappily, in these days, when religion is respectable, it is often the motive for joining the church. But in every such case the form is an empty one, there is no true union with Christ and in the end the deceiver is repudiated by him. (Matt. 8:23.)

A DISTINGUISHED GUEST.

Rev. John McNeill of London, "the Scottish Spurgeon," Now Among Us.

VERY cordial has been the welcome given by ministers and churches in our great cities to the eminent London clergyman whose portrait is here given. He has the faculty of making friends wherever he goes, and among us he was sure to do so, for he is of that Scotch-Irish extraction which has given us so many of our most distinguished clergymen, statesmen, lawyers and merchants. During his brief visit he has preached in some of our largest churches and he has accepted the invitation of Dr. Talmage to preach in Brooklyn Tabernacle on Oct. 4.

REV. JOHN McNEILL.

Mr. McNeill has had a remarkable history. "In the summer of 1872," says a well-known journalist, "we were paying a visit to Great Britain and were travelling on a train in Scotland when a bright alert young man in the ordinary corduroy uniform came to the car to collect our tickets. In 1887—fifteen years afterward—we were again on the other side, and were spending a Sunday in Edinburgh. Special services were being held in a vast building which was built for a circus and we attended one of them. An immense multitude filled the building, and there was a look of expectancy on all faces which melted into one of satisfaction when a powerfully built man in the prime of life, clad in clerical garb, stepped on the platform. We instantly knew him as the young man who had attracted our notice fifteen years ago on the railroad car. The brakeman and the preacher were the same."

John McNeill was born in Renfrewshire, Scotland, in 1854. His father was a native of County Antrim, Ireland. He acquired an ordinary English education in the public schools and then went to earn a living on the railroad. He was a regular attendant at the services of the Free Church of his village and was converted there. He had never been a profligate having been trained from boyhood by his pious father in the fear of God. As he remarks, he was "a converted decent man—a kind hard to convert." When he attained the age of twenty-one the Railroad Company promoted him to a responsible position in Edinburgh and there he came under the influence of the Rev. William Frazer who was quick to recognize his powers.

The pastor found him an invaluable helper in Sunday School and Mission work and after a time advised him to give up his position in the Railroad office and give all his time to the Lord's service. Mr. McNeill took the advice and promptly entered himself as a student in Edinburgh University. In 1886, he was ordained and became pastor of the McCrie-Roxburgh Free Church, Edinburgh. The church at the beginning of his pastorate was described as uncomfortably large for the congregation, but at the end of a year the congregation was uncomfortably large for the church, and he had to hold his Sunday evening services in the great circus. His sermons are so clear and forcible and have been so greatly blessed to the conversion of multitudes that people have given him the name of "the Scottish Spurgeon." Recently, Mr. McNeill has been induced to leave the Scottish for the English capital and he is now doing as successful a work for the Master in Regent's Park Chapel, London, as he did in Edinburgh. Three volumes of his sermons have been published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, Union Square, New York, and have had a large sale.

HE CALLETH THEE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 4.
II. Tim. 1: 8, 9; Rom. 1: 6; Eph. 4: 1.

MARTHA'S words to her sister, "The Master is come and calleth for thee," must have gladdened Mary's heart even under its load of sorrow. The Master is come, then she would leave her comforters to go to him. During the days of her brother's sickness how she must have longed for his presence! Now that he was come, she would go to him as a refuge in her sorrow. She could not know what he would say to her, or what would come of his presence, but his coming was comfort in itself and "she arose quickly" and went to him. It is only they who love who respond so promptly.

It was the master who called. Obedience was due to him. We often forget this. The world calls and its call is answered by natural inclination. It offers pleasure, wealth, honor, gratification of the senses, ease. Shall the call be obeyed? The promptings of the natural man are in that direction. But the Master calls. He has the right; he knows what is best; he has claims on our gratitude; he has claims on our confidence and claims on our allegiance. The choice between the two rests with us. It must be made for one or the other. "Mary sat still in the house" until he came; but receiving his message inaction was no longer possible. She must obey or disobey. Was he her Master? Then obedience was her duty. If her service was a willing one, obedience was her delight. What he is to us may be inferred from our conduct. If he is our Master then we are obedient, we live as he commands, we work for him, we think not of ease or pleasure but of his will. If we do none of these things then he is not our Master.

"He calleth for thee." The call may come in many ways. A sister brought it to Mary. It may come to us through a Sunday School teacher, through a parent, or a friend. It may come through the Word of God or it may come through circumstances. Christ has many messengers, but if the call can be recognized as his, it is sufficient. We have to discriminate or we may mistake the promptings of fancy or ambition for his call. The call if genuine will be consistent with the Divine character. A boy is at school and a letter comes to him from his father. He can scarcely read, can just manage to spell out the words and cannot grasp his father's meaning. He takes the letter to some bigger boy who tells him that the letter means this or that. "No," replies the son; "I cannot understand the letter, but I know my father and I know he does not mean what you say." Even the Apostle Paul confessed that he had been mistaken as to the call. He said that he thought that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus. Many since his day have made the same mistake and believed that in cruelly persecuting others they were obeying the call of God. Others have made the mistake as to service and have undertaken work for which they were not fitted, bringing injury to the work and humiliation to themselves. The call to "go up higher" is always to be suspected, because it is likely to proceed from our own vanity.

The call is personal. He calleth for thee. Nothing short of complete consecration meets the demand. Though I give all my goods to feed the poor and my body to be burned, the Apostle said, that was not sufficient; something more was necessary. In the days before Italian unity, there were some secret societies which exacted no detailed pledges of the members. The member gave himself to the Society. Receiving a command from headquarters he was bound to obey it whatever it might be. He might have to leave his home and live for many years in a foreign land; he might have to undertake a service which would cost his life. Having given himself, there was no sacrifice that he might not be called upon to make. The true follower of the Master is one who so gives himself to him. All that he is and all that he has belongs to his Lord. Happy are they, who when called upon to part with property, or loved ones, or health or life itself, rise quickly and cheerfully, recognizing that the call is from the Master.

Y. P. C. E. IN CANADA.

In a long and deeply-interesting letter to the Golden Rule, Dr. J. T. Beckley, who has been travelling in Canada, gives a most encouraging report of the progress of the Christian Endeavor movement in the Dominion. Among other facts that he mentions are these:

Twelve months ago there were 160 societies. To-day there are 147, with 10,374 members. Last year there was one missionary committee; now there are twenty-five. The largest society is in Sackville. It has 103 active, and fifty-three associate members.

John S. Smith, a merchant of Halifax, is the efficient president of the union of the Provinces. He carries in his pocket with his Testament a little book in which he has recorded the name of every society and its night of meeting. He makes missionary tours. He comes in personal contact with young people. His enthusiasm is one of the forces in the increasing momentum of Christian Endeavor. The field has its own special problems. The work is unique. It differs widely from that of metropolitan centres. There is less of crowded assemblies; there is more of lonely struggle and personal enterprise. There are thirty places where there would be no worship except for the work of the Endeavor societies. In Newfoundland there are four societies. One of these last year saved a church from destruction.

NOT FORGOTTEN.

It is pleasant to see that King's Daughters who are still at the summer resorts do not forget their less prosperous sisters at home. One circle in Brooklyn, N. Y., which is appropriately named "The Thoughtful Circle" has been carrying on its beneficent work during the summer through the agency of those of its members who remained in the city. On September 16, there was quite a gala display, at the home of the President, Mrs. A. D. Goddard on Dean Street, of gifts from scattered members. Boxes of clothing, bundles of small comforts, baskets of fruit and flowers were there in profusion, besides groceries and money. They were sent to the Church Charity Foundation on Albany Avenue, the Home for the Aged, and the hospitals and orphanage. It speaks well for the Thoughtful Circle that the wants of the poor and afflicted are not forgotten amid new scenes and pleasant surroundings.

Y. W. C. A. WORK IN BOSTON.

One of the most enterprising and best-equipped Young Women's Christian Associations is that of Boston, Mass. It has lately reorganized and developed its work, adding several departments, which are much appreciated. In a review of its present condition, which the Secretary sends to Faith and Works, she says that over six hundred girls are now enjoying the advantages of the gymnasium. They show the benefits derived from them in marked improvement in health. "The experiences of many of them show that by this mode of treatment weak lungs may be made strong; dyspepsia cured, imperfect circulation regulated; curved spines made straight; and general good health established." Fifty-four pupils are in the Association work-shop where they learn industrial drawing, clay modeling, sloyd, or manual training in woodworking, carving, and light upholstery, adapted to home needs. Beside these there are classes in which instruction is given in domestic science; including "cooking, chemistry, and botany as related to food, physiology, hygiene, and general household management, together with sewing, dressmaking, millinery, home-nursing, and regular Bible instruction; while a series of emergency talks by a well-known physician, and illustrated lectures, supplement the course."

Another excellent department is that for the training of young women who intend to be domestic servants. These frequently belong to the class which has no home discipline, and who, if left to themselves, in this neglected condition, might develop into worthless and unprincipled women. When under the fostering care of the Association, they are taught in a practical way the various branches of housework, plain sewing, reading, letter writing, and arithmetic, and receive daily instruction in Scriptural truth.

Beside these departments the Association has stenography and typewriting classes, a dressmaking class, and an intelligence bureau. Still more important is the Home where girls who are strangers in the city can obtain board and shelter on very moderate terms in a place where they have Christian companionship and protection from the temptations of ordinary boarding-houses. In another home, permanent boarders are received, and this is always full.

How much the Association is doing in the way of prevention, which is always better than rescue, none can tell. It is a grand work, and the extent to which it is appreciated shows how urgent was the need for such an institution. Its success may encourage Christian ladies who have time at their disposal, to begin the work in other cities where there is no such institution and where the need may be as urgent, but where it is not yet realized.

A MODEL LETTER.

EVERY Christian Endeavor Society must have been disappointed by the tardiness of Associate Members in becoming active members and there must have been many consultations by Lookout Committees as to the best way of approaching them on the subject. The Golden Rule publishes a suggestion which may be of service in these cases. It is in the form of a letter, which has been used with some success in the Society connected with the First Congregational Church of Concord, N. H. It is signed by the Prayer-Meeting Committee and runs as follows:

Dear Friend:—You have signed the constitution of the Endeavor society as an associate member. You have attended the meetings with us for many months. Are you satisfied to remain an associate member?

Down deep in your heart is there not a craving for something better? Do you think of the source of the blessings which daily surround you without a desire to repay, in some measure, the Giver of every good and perfect gift? Will you not resolve to accept Christ as yours and become an active member of the society?

Next Sunday we have our consecration service. The subject will be, "Our privileges: are we using them aright?" (Luke 19: 20-27).

Will you not make an especial effort to be present, and in a true spirit of consecration unite with us that we may all band together in a more earnest Christian service, remembering our new motto, "One is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren?"

A CIRCLE OF KING'S SONS.

NEARLY two years ago, eleven young men met in Newark, N. J., and organized the United Circle of King's Sons. The circle increased until it numbers now forty members. The organization adopted as its special work the rescuing of the fallen, and in the prosecution of this object the King's Sons' Rescue Mission was opened on May 28th, 1890, at 257 Market street. Meetings are held every night from 8:00 to 9:30 o'clock, and during the year no less than 300 persons have professed conversion. Nine hundred and seventy-six lodgings have been furnished, besides very considerable donations of food and clothing. Entertainment has been provided on holidays, and employment has been secured for many applicants. The services are conducted by members of the Circle almost entirely, there being a different leader for every night in the month. Though this work has involved an expenditure of $1,273, no collections are taken—a contribution box at the entrance being the only means employed by the organization for raising money at the services. The only salary paid is to the janitor in charge of the rooms, and the undertaking is carried on with strict regard to economy, the members themselves furnishing most of the funds, though many kind friends have rendered substantial assistance. Two public meetings in city churches have been held, at which collections aggregating $147 were made, and a generous donation of $100 has been received from the "Gather-Them-In" Circle of King's Daughters. It is rather hard on the King's Sons that the expenses as well as the labor should fall upon them, but they appear well satisfied to have it so if only souls can be saved. Contributions, from outside will, however, enable them to extend their work and they may be sent to the President, Mr. Wm. H. Rutan, or the Vice-President, Mr. Geo. Eesley, 257 Market St., Newark, N. J.

MARCHING HOME.

HARK to an army tramping,
To the beat, beat, beat,
Over the fields and highways,
Of little children's feet;
Hark to the dancing rhythm,
As captain and colonel come,
With rank upon rank of soldiers,
Marching, marching home.

They bring the summer's roses
Set in the dimpled cheek;
In their eyes is the glint of the sunshine,
They marched away to seek;
The sweep of the wild bird's pinion
In their motions glad and free—
Marching down from the mountain,
Marching up from the sea.

They have rocked with birds in the tree-tops
All over the flowery land;
They have raced on the wild sea-horses
Across the gleaming sand;
Now back to the books and duty,
Captain and colonel come,
With all the glad child army,
Marching, marching home.

Mrs. M. F. Butts.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells About Oriental Pilgrimages and the Strange Sightings that Attend them.

IT was not difficult for Uncle John to surmise, from the expectant glances of the children, that they were waiting for him when he came upstairs to the "young folks' room," a few evenings ago. He had hardly dropped into his familiar chair, when Tom opened his batteries.

"Were you ever a pilgrim, Uncle?" he asked, anxiously.

"I've been on many a pilgrimage in my time," said the good-natured traveller, "although I never ventured forth with staff and scrip and sandals, like the devotees of old. But, you know, Tom, every Christian may say:

I'm a pilgrim, I'm a stranger;
I can tarry but a night."

"Well, but there are great pilgrimages now, aren't there, just like the old ones?" persisted the boy.

"Yes, there's a pilgrimage to Treves, which good people take no stock in, however, and then there are the annual pilgrimages to the 'Kaaba,' or sacred building at Mecca by the Mohammedans, and the Easter pilgrimages to Jerusalem. I have seen the Mecca pilgrims as they arrived at the port of Jeddah—and a wild-looking lot of fanatics they are—these Moslems from every land under the sun. Besides these there are the great Hindoo pilgrimages to the mountain shrines of Upper India, the island of Ganga Sagor and the holy towns of Jumnontri and Hurdwar, some of which that excellent missionary, Bishop Thoburn, describes in his book on India. The Buddhists make pilgrimages to Adam's Peak in Ceylon, where their great Apostle, Buddha, is said to have left the impression of his foot. The Thibetans, Japanese, Chinese and Burmese also have their pilgrimages. So did the ancient Egyptians and so do many modern civilized nations. Ever since the world began, men have undertaken long journeys in search of truth or in fulfilment of vows. But the greatest of all pilgrimages were those of the middle ages to the Holy Land."

"There are pilgrimages there to-day, too, are there not?" inquired Ted.

"Yes, I have witnessed some of them, and very picturesque sights they are. Jews and Christians alike make pilgrimages to Jerusalem, but for different purposes. The first go to see the city of their fathers, the scene of their nation's glory, and to pray for the speedy coming of their Messiah; the second go to see the birthplace of the Saviour and the scene of his glory and death.

"Jerusalem is crowded with pilgrims every year for weeks before the Easter festival. One sees there credulous pilgrims who believe everything they are told; devout pilgrims, who generally make the journey a sacred duty and expect to profit spiritually by it; sceptical pilgrims who accept nothing except what history and science approve, and enthusiastic pilgrims who wear themselves out with tireless sightseeing and ceaseless prostrations. These pilgrims represent every nationality, Russians, Syrians, Arabs, Armenians, Copts, Greeks and a sprinkling of Western Europeans and Americans. On a festival day, the sight is a grandly picturesque one, the bright colored garments of all shades, the skins from white to black, women carrying babes and old men hobbling along on crutches, and above all, a babel of many tongues. There is a tradition or a superstition that, at Easter, fire descends from heaven upon the Holy Sepulchre and there are many of the more credulous who make their way to the Chapel in the hope of witnessing the spectacle.

"Occasionally there are such vast crowds at these pilgrimages," added Uncle John, "that they are kept in order with the utmost difficulty. The Sepulchre, as you may know, is in the hands of the Turkish officials, though all are permitted to visit it, certain restrictions only being imposed. A guard of Turkish troops is kept in readiness for emergencies and the colonel who commands them carries a stout whip which he plies freely upon the shoulders of any in the crowd who seem disposed to make trouble. I have seen 10,000 persons within the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, about 2,000 being in the chapel alone. Sometimes the scene is one of wild confusion and even riot. In 1834, at one of these festivals, the guards outside were told that the Christians were about to attack them and a furious fight followed in which people were bayoneted, others were trampled to death, and many brained with the soldiers' muskets. It is said that 400 persons were butchered and that the piles of dead and dying lay all about the sacred place."

EASTER DAY CROWDS AT THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.
(From a photograph brought from the Holy Land by Rev. Dr. Talmage.)

"What a frightful thing!" exclaimed the children.

"Scenes of violence are fortunately rare, nowadays," said the traveller. "Here is a photograph," he added, "showing the entrance to the Sepulchre on Easter Day. You see the crowds in the bright sunshine flocking in—all sorts of people—while others on the flat roofs and at the windows look on. Many a strange crowd has passed under that ancient archway. There are so many tales and traditions connected with the points of interest in Jerusalem, some of them improbable and others incapable of proof, that one must be careful not to take all he hears for granted. The guides invent many of these stories to please credulous travellers, and multiply the so-called holy places to such an extent as to cast doubt on many of the most interesting among them."

When Old Age Begins.

AGE does not always come with years. "Some men," writes the famous Dr. Morrell Mackenzie, who attended the German Emperor in his last illness, "are old at forty, while others may be said to be almost young at eighty."

"The secret of such perpetual youth lies mostly in regular exercise, whether in felling trees or in the humbler form of the daily constitutional? Even when life has at last fallen into the sere and yellow leaf, exercise will keep the furnace of the vital locomotive aglow long after others less carefully stoked have paled their ineffectual fires. To have an object of some kind makes all the difference between wholesome exercise and the listless dragging about of the dead weight of one's own body, which makes walking one of the most fatiguing as well as the dreariest of all forms of motion. To sum up the whole subject, the golden rule for exercise through all the seven chapters of man's strange, eventful history, is to use it that the stream of life shall flow swift and clear, never stagnating like a muddy pond, and, on the other hand, never Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

Memory Jars.

DID you ever see a "memory jar"? Has any of your friends got one? One must have sentiment to appreciate it, remarks a writer in Zion's Herald, so do not choose this expression of your affection for one who has not.

"Select a potpourri or 'rose jar' of any ware you prefer, and as costly as you please, and send with the request that when she desires to keep a souvenir of any occasion—a rose, a violet, a leaf, or even a scrap of the toilet worn by a friend or herself, anything that has for her a happy or tender association—she will drop it into this jar. I know one of these vases that money could not buy. It seems almost animate with the composite soul of varied experiences. A flower from the coffin of a friend, a violet from the baptismal font, are some of the hallowed offerings it contains, and there are tears in it and laughter.

"This is my one sentimental indulgence," said a friend, as she dropped a rose I had given her into the pretty blue jar on her writing-desk.

"It was in memory of the day's visit, the influence of which would pervade our two lives with sweetness, even as the great velvet rose perfumed the urn."

CLEVER TALKERS.

THE art of conversation, properly applied, is one of the most useful and agreeable of accomplishments. Yet we sometimes feel that there are people who can carry it too far, and who, instead of amusing and entertaining us, tire us by their persistent efforts to keep on talking. With such, silence is far from golden; it is a state to be avoided. And lest the conversation flag, they keep on relentlessly tossing it up and down, and back and forth, as children toss a shuttlecock with the battledore, afraid to lose the game by allowing it to drop. It is not surprising that some should complain that these people give one the ear-ache. But there are others who make conversation a real art and an agreeable one, too.

They contrive to secure, first, the interest of their hearers and then their sympathy in the subject talked of. For it is half the art to discover just what will interest others. Well-read, observant, judicious, without vanity, and appreciative of the ideas of others, the clever conversationalist is a power in the social circle.

But one can be brilliant in trifles, and if the bright talker be merely a gossip, a consumer of time and a monger of tales, he or she is an influence for evil rather than good; a human chatterbox, who will end by boring instead of amusing. A clever talker, whose heart is as it should be, will never attune the lips to the depreciation of others, but will rather try to discover in friends and acquaintances some lovable traits worth commending. The pith of conversation consists not in exhibiting one's own superior knowledge, or enlarging on trifles, but in correcting and improving the information we possess by the authority of others.

To do this in a lively and entertaining way is the secret of the art.

But sedentary weavers of long tales
Give us the fidgets, and our patience fails.

A Girl's Definition of Life.

THERE is a very sweet and beautiful poem by Mrs. M. E. Sangster, one verse of which says:

Who fain would follow Jesus,
A daily cross must bear
With never-ceasing patience,
With watchfulness and prayer;
The daily cross, my brothers,
And then the crown and palm;
Here, loss and many a trial;
There, heaven's unending psalm.

A lady writes to the Christian Index that a few days ago the daughter of a friend passed her twenty-first birthday. Until she was nineteen, she had tried to find satisfaction in worldly pleasures. Then she was converted and became an active Christian. On the birthday in question, she and her mother were conversing about the past, and discussing the various objects and modes of life. The mother put to her this question:

"Daughter, what is life?"

Reflecting a moment, she replied: "Life is doing the will of God."

Could any answer have been more beautiful and true? She had been a careful, constant reader of the Bible, and had absorbed the thought from the words of Jesus. He said: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me" (John, 4:34). "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." (1 Jno. 3:17). "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." (Matt. 7:21.)

With such a chart as this, there is little danger of shipwreck on the ocean of life.

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

THE rest of the afternoon and all the night, getting only brief snatches of sleep, as Robert fell into transient states of stupor, did Mr. Murray watch by his son. He had plenty of time for repenting; plenty of time to think what he might have done, and to plan what he would do if God should restore his boy. How he recalled the piteous pleading in Robert's brown eyes as he begged to go to Lal's Mountain for the summer. A "yes" then, the hope of that return, might have saved all this. Then, too, Robert had asked so wistfully for money to lift that mortgage, which seemed to rest as heavily on his young heart as on the Allen mill, and how harshly he had been refused! Mr. Murray seemed to himself a monster.

But as the gray March morning dawned, Robert's heart-breaking cries, "Mother, mother, come help me!" were suddenly quieted, for the door opened and softly across the room came Eliza Allen. She knelt on a stool by Robert's bed and took his burning head in her arms and stroked and soothed his forehead with those work-worn hands, which were yet so soft and so motherly in touch.

Robert ceased to call, "Father, father, I am falling! Hold me! the mill is whirling about! It is going over the bank!" for Captain Allen took in his strong grasp the gesticulating, dry hands, and his genial, firm voice said:

"Here I am, my son. We are all right. The mill stands firm, Robert."

And there was no longer need for the sick boy to implore, "Pink, sing. Why don't you sing to me? Pink, you sing just like a bird," for Pink sat on the other side of the bed and put her little hand on Robert's thin cheek, and in her fresh voice, untrained but true and sweet, sang the simple things which Robert loved to hear: "Blue Juniata," "Buy a Broom," "Oft in the Stilly Night," and the hymn that they all had sung together at the mill on Sunday evenings, "O Paradise, O Paradise."

And so, soothed, caressed, sung to, feeling the subtle influence of their presence whom he loved, Robert grew quieter and sank into slumber.

Mr. Murray stood at the foot of the bed, and watched his son, as he lay surrounded and ministered to by that family of whom he had been so strangely jealous. But there was no jealousy in his heart now, it was all driven out by a terrible fear. He was willing to share Robert now with all the world, if so be he might have any part at all of him left. His heart blessed those who came with help, and possible healing. Hereafter he would never be able to do enough for them, if only Robert might live. And the Allens, ministering to Robert, seemed to have not the least rancor toward the poor Superintendent, who had dragged Robert from them so furiously, giving them no word of thanks, but calling them hard names instead. Captain Allen nodded encouragement to Mr. Murray, as Robert fell asleep. Eliza sent glances of sympathy and pity to the white, haggard, unhappy parent. Pink tried to give him hopeful smiles, while tears were running down her rosy, dimpled cheeks. At that instant, far from saying that Pink had red hair, and was not a pretty girl, Mr. Murray was ready to affirm that she had locks of spun gold and the countenance of a cherub.

The Allens had travelled all through a stormy March night, and taken no food; yet, as hour followed hour, they never flinched from their post, lest Robert's sleep should be disturbed. Eliza held her boy still in seemingly tireless arms; Captain 'Zekiel stood at his post with the constancy of a caryatid; Pink's voice dropped lower and lower to suit the needs of slumber, but still she sang on. The superseded hospital nurse remembered their necessities. She brought a cup of beef-tea and held it to Eliza's lips, then treated the Captain to coffee in the same fashion, and then Eliza's voice stole into Pink's low song, so that Pink might stop long enough to have something to eat. And then Pink gently left her place, and drew a big chair to just the spot where Mr. Murray could best watch Robert, and made him sit down there and drink some coffee, and lean back his head on a pillow, and have his tired face bathed with cologne, and an afghan tucked all about his knees and hands, for Pink was a capital little nurse, and then she whispered in his ear, "Mr. Murray, please don't look so miserable; I know Robert is going to get well. See how nicely he sleeps. You sleep, too." And so she went back to her place and her singing, while Mr. Murray thought this little girl in the blue and black plaid, plainly-made gown—poor Robert's gift—was certainly the most delightful creature; why, why had he not carried her, too, off from the mill when he took Robert?

It was noon before Robert roused and moved, and released his willing prisoners. Then he was not in his senses, and seemed to recognize no one, but his cries for "father," "mother," "Pink," were stilled. He recognized their presence in so far as that he would not let the nurse touch him or feed him, but yielded calmly when Eliza bathed his face and arms, combed his hair, and gave him broth. The fury of his fever and restlessness was ended; it only needed the touch of Eliza's hands, or a few notes of Pink's songs, to quiet his tossings and still his mutterings. The nurse had only to wait on those whom the sick tyrant permitted to wait upon him. When he began to talk about Bop and Jerry and the mill, Captain 'Zekiel knew just what to say to him. Between whiles, in the next room, the Captain passed the hours encouraging Mr. Murray, by vowing that "Robert would surely get well, never was there such a master-hand with the sick as 'Liza was." And he told Mr. Murray tales of Robert's childhood. Now, for the first time, did the Superintendent hear the true story of how the Captain had found and brought home his Bargain. All the little anecdotes of Robert's childish goodness, courage, wit, and beauty were detailed by the good Captain, and eagerly heard by the Superintendent. And now that sorrow and fear had opened Mr. Murray's eyes, he learned from these stories that which the Captain had not thought of teaching—the depth of affection existing between Robert and his foster-parents, and all the generous love and self-denying care which they lavished upon him. He told himself that he had been a demon to abuse these noble people, and to give them hostility instead of gratitude.

Finally the force of Robert's fever was broken but now he lay in a state of exhaustion, near to death, from extreme weakness.

"We must build him up," said Dr. Lee. "Get the best old bourbon or apple-whiskey and give it to him, a teaspoon of whiskey in two tablespoons of rich, new milk. Begin with it once in five hours, then get to once in three."

"But, doctor," said Mr. Murray, "I don't want to give my son any kind of whiskey. I don't believe in it. Is there not something else to strengthen him?"

"Why, Mr. Murray, he is not in a state to know what he is taking. You can't cultivate a taste in him now."

"But I don't believe in alcohol as a medicine." "I am giving you the best I know, sir; I have done my best in the case from the first," said Dr. Lee, who was full of pride at his successful treatment of Robert.

The great doctor from the city had come out and approved his course, and, after two calls, had left the case with him. The young doctor was elated. Moreover, he was one of those who advocate alcohol as a medicine.

"Doctor," said Mr. Murray, earnestly, "I feel deeply about this. When I was Robert's age I nearly died of typhoid fever, and, in the subsequent prostration, they gave me brandy and whiskey, which begot a taste for drink. I might far better have died. My love of drink cursed my existence, killed my wife, nearly destroyed my child. I cannot have that story repeated in Robert."

"Never fear, it will not be. It was a most unusual case, I should say. They kept up the dose too long, probably."

"Can you not think of something better than whiskey?" said Mr. Murray, appealing to the nurse.

"I never interfere with the physician in charge," said the nurse.

Mr. Murray looked to Eliza.

"What do you say?"

"I never give liquor of any kind," said Eliza, promptly. "I do not think it right. It is against my principles."

"Temperance is a question of morals, and should not be dragged into the domain of medicine," said Dr. Lee. "Those who know nothing of medicine should not handicap a doctor with either whims or moral principles, but let him do his best. Have confidence in me, Mr. Murray. I am more than interested in your son."

But Eliza drew near the troubled father and said in his ear:

"Oh, Mr. Murray, don't yield. Remember Robert is your son, and a taste that was in you may lie in him, and your story may come to be his story. Oh, do be firm. I know there must be some safer treatment."

"If you have no confidence in me, sir," began Dr. Lee in a vexed tone,—"if you question my judgment—"

"I have confidence in you—every confidence; but I beg of you, doctor, consult your reading, your experience, can you not prescribe something else?"

Dr. Lee was angry.

"No, I cannot," he said, sharply.

"Claude, you can."

The voice that spoke was sweet, but imperious. The door into the next room where young Morgan was, was open, and a lady stood on the threshold.

"Claude, how often have you and I fought this battle! You know that I will not allow you to give Paul alcohol. You know I have proved to you again and again that alcohol is not needed in medical practice."

"Aunt!" cried Dr. Lee, between rage and respect.

"Yes, aunt; and a very nice aunt I am, young man, and one for you to be truly proud of, as I know you are. It is cruel of you to try and force this father to give to his son a dangerous poison. You are young and inexperienced, my good Claude, but you do know of other remedies than alcohol for building up prostrated strength. Did I not bring you through nervous prostration and typhoid fever without a drop of distilled or fermented poison? Do you not know that for years the Temperance Hospital of London has had the lowest hospital death-rate on record, and there, nothing alcoholic is used? Why, Claude, will you insist on trying to build up life on a substructure of death?"

"Well, aunt, if you mean to take this case out of my hands, and if Mr. Murray wishes it—"

"My dear Claude, we neither of us wish anything of the kind. We want you to drop for the nonce, at least, your crotchets about the medicinal virtues of alcohol and doctor this pretty lad on temperance lines. You know, Claude, you would have to doctor Paul that way."

"Do me the favor, doctor," pleaded Mr. Murray.

"Well, take your own risk," said the doctor with a half laugh. "When my aunt enters the lists—right or wrong—all her opponents have to fly. There! have that prescription made up; and as for diet, since my aunt and Mrs. Allen consider themselves so well able to dictate and decide, let them take the matter in hand. But, Mr. Murray, if Robert sinks—"

Mr. Murray turned pale.

"He won't sink," said the valiant Mrs. Morgan.

"It will not be my fault if he does, remember."

"And you will not fail to claim all the honors when he goes out bright and well," said Mrs. Morgan. "My dear Claude, if Mr. Murray will allow me to come into this case as adviser on diet, I mean to keep an exact record of the kind, amount, and preparation of all the food and tonics which we use, so that you will have it for a similar case. We shall remember the pendulum principle, Claude, and not stimulate way up one hour to provoke an equal rebound the next hour. We mean to have a steady non-alcoholic rise."

So it was settled. The nurse went away, and Mrs. Allen, Pink, and Mrs. Morgan did the nursing. Mr. Murray and Captain 'Zekiel spent the time walking up and down the school-grounds, or up and down the road, coming in occasionally to see how the invalid was. The two men were in strictest amity. Mr. Murray had forgiven Captain Allen for keeping his son, and Captain Allen had forgotten that Mr. Murray had called him "a villain, a scoundrel, a thief." They went together to see the house Mr. Murray was building.

"If Robert had died, I should have had everything stop, just where it is; and I should soon have died myself," said the Superintendent.

"Keep a good heart," said Captain 'Zekiel. "Robert will not die. You will see him a man in no time, as stout and as strong as I am."

Finally Robert opened his eyes, and was fully conscious. The mists had passed from his brain. There sat Eliza looking at him.

"Mother! Mother!" he cried, holding out both his wasted hands to her, his eyes full of joy.

"Yes, dear boy, here I am," said Eliza, kissing him.

Then a cloud came over Robert's face.

"Oh, mother, is the mortgage foreclosed? Are you all turned out of home, are you all scattered? Has poor father gone West? Is the mill torn down?"

"No, no, my boy," said Mr. Murray, leaning over him. "You have been sick, that is all, and your mother came to nurse you. A pretty lad you are, to make us all this trouble, and fetch her from home to look after you. But, cheer up now, for she will stay until you can go home with her to Lal's Mountain."

"Oh, father, do you mean it? Can I go up there, and see all of them? But the mill—it is to be torn down—father is to lose the mill—and the barge is broken up, and the wheel is ruined by the ice, and—and—"

"And what a pack of nonsense this is that you are talking!" said his father, cheerfully.

"Are you dreaming still? Captain Allen leave the mill! No, indeed; why should he, when he owns every stick and timber of it, and all the ground it stands on? The barge broken up! Well, it is, only to make a nice new one. The wheel ruined! Why, the mill is to be put in splendid order, and Captain Allen is going to build a house as soon as you are well enough to lay the corner-stone for him."

"But the mortgage, father, isn't the mortgage to be foreclosed? Is not a New York man to have the mill?"

"Come, come, a boy of your age should know nothing about mortgages! The mortgage—do you mean this slip of paper?" and Mr. Murray put a folded paper in Robert's hands—"if that is your nightmare, my dear boy, make an end of it, give it to your mother here to light the fire with."

Eliza heard as if dreaming. Anxiety for Robert had for two weeks kept in the background of her thoughts the imminent ruin of her home. What did Mr. Murray mean?—was this that dreadful mortgage?

"Or let Pink have it for curl-papers," said Mr. Murray.

"Pink doesn't use curl-papers. Her curls are natural," said Robert, laughing. "How is Pink? Oh, I wish I could see Pink."

"So you can," said his father. "She will be here in a minute. She has been singing to you and feeding you for the last two weeks."

"Is Pink here too? But how will father get on if Pink and mother are both gone?" cried Robert.

"He could not get on, so he came too. You seem to be a very important young man, Robert. It takes a whole family to nurse you. I see Captain Allen and Pink coming up the walk now."

"But who is at the mill? Who takes care of the twins?"

"Jerry and Bop and the twins are keeping house together," said the mother.

Then the door opened, and in came Pink and the big Captain.

"Oh, Robert is awake and knows us!" cried Pink, hastening to him. "Robert, are you better? Oh, Robert, I am so glad!"

"I'll be well in no time, and I'll go home with you, and see you build the new house and a new barge and repair the mill. Oh, won't we have a good time!" said Robert, holding both Captain Allen's hands.

The Captain's face fell. In his care for Robert, he, too, had put the home-troubles out of his mind; but now—in two weeks or less—they must go from their home; his hereditary mill would be his no longer.

"There's the mortgage, you know. Mother's got it to burn up,—hateful old paper! Let me see you tear it, father."

STUMBLING STONES

REMOVED FROM THE WORD OF GOD*
The Causes of Discrepancies.

THE so-called 'discrepancies' of Holy Scripture may be classified as follows:
First, verbal, or such as concern the words or letters of Scripture;
Secondly, historical, or such as concern the names of persons and places, numbers, dates, and historical statements or events;
Thirdly, moral, or such as concern ethical precepts and principles, duties and relations; and,
Fourthly, doctrinal, or such as concern the direct doctrinal teaching of the Word, especially as to the higher class of spiritual truths. The bibliography of this subject is quite extensive. Some fifty or more volumes have been published, which treat, more or less exclusively, this theme, one of which, by Mr. Haley, covers over five hundred pages. There are probably not less than five hundred other works which contain extended reference to these discrepancies; so that, in the effort to condense what needs to be written upon such a subject into a very brief compass, we find no little additional difficulty.

Errors of Interpretation.

Where no fault can reasonably be found with either the original or the translation, the reader's misapprehension may cause difficulty. We must therefore learn to interpret the language of the Bible intelligently and correctly. Several facts are to be borne in mind.

- 1. Words often change meaning, and are liable to be misunderstood.
'Prevent' means to go before, or anticipate. 1 Thess. 4: 15.
'Let' means not to let, i. e. to hinder. 2 Thess. 1: 7.
'Conversation' means course of life. Heb. 13: 5.
- 2. The same word is used in different senses. Compare Exod. 31: 17, with Isa. 11: 28. Though God "fainteth not neither is weary," yet "He rested and was refreshed." 'Rest' sometimes means repose after fatiguing labor, or, as in this case, cessation from activity, the arresting of work.

Adam was said to 'hide,' and Jonah to 'flee,' from 'the presence of the Lord.' Yet we are taught that to flee or to hide from his presence is impossible. Ps. 139: 7. There is an omnipresence of God which equally pervades all space; but there is a manifested Presence, such as, in the Garden of Eden or in the Sanctuary of old, was often visible and audible. We are told that God "was not in the wind," the "earthquake" or the "fire;" but the meaning is that he was not specially and personally manifested in these forms, as he was in the "still small voice" which followed them. 1 Kings 29: 11, 12.

The word "covet" is used in Exod. 20: 17, as expressive of unlawful desire after that which is another's; in 1. Cor. 12: 31, of a holy yearning to possess that which will benefit another.

"Christ was made sin for us," though he "knew no sin," 2 Cor. 5: 21, i. e. He was made a sin-offering, accounted judicially as a sinner.

"Tempt" may mean to put to proof, to test; or to entice to sin. Compare Gen. 22: 1, Deut. 6: 16, and Jas. 1: 13.

"Cleave" may mean, to cling to, or to part from, another. Rom. 12: 9. Zech. 14: 4.

* From Stumbling Stones Removed from the Word of God, by Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D. D., Baker & Taylor Co., New York, Publishers. A volume showing that many of the supposed difficulties of the Bible are not so in fact and laying down simple rules of interpretation for the aid of the earnest readers of the Word.

"Devoted" means consecrated to holy uses, or, sometimes, doomed, to destruction.

Interpretation of Prophecies.

Prophecy is the language of the future. It is a well-known fact that as we look ahead, in a direct line, certain optical illusions are the result:

First, Perspective: objects at different distances are seen in one limited field of vision and lying within the same narrow arc.

Secondly, Foreshortening: objects, far separated from us and from each other, appear near and closely related; what is stretched out over vast length, is seen shortened—hence the term "foreshortening," to express the apparent shortening from the fore-view. Only by experience does the mind learn to detect and correct the errors of the eye. Similar illusions pertain to the careless reading of prophecy.

1. In prophecy we often see two or more events of a similar character outlined by a common profile. One outline properly portrays two events, one on a smaller, and the other on a larger scale; one nearer, the other more remote.

E. g., Matt. 24, where the destruction of Jerusalem is the type of the End of the Age, and prophecies concerning both are closely intertwined because one general profile answers for both.

2. Events may appear in a common field of vision, all of which are future, which, and as they occur, will be seen to be marked by many distinct and distinguishing features.

3. Future events, far separated in point of time, may be so mingled on the horizon of prophecy, as to appear like mountains in a range, near to each other.

4. History may be communicated prophetically, i. e. by a backward instead of a forward vision.

The Uses of Discrepancies.

How little all these discrepancies amount to in the aggregate, is amazing. With all these extant manuscripts and all the various sources whence they emanate, the text of the Scriptures is in all vital matters essentially unimpaired.

The variations are numerous but unimportant. They consist of differences in orthography, in the selection and collocation of words, and other minor matters. In the Hebrew manuscripts over three-quarters of a million of various readings may be counted, as to consonants alone, and so we may say, in proportion, of the New Testament. But they are of little or no account in the main, and do not affect the sense any more than the different spellings of such words as 'fulfil,' 'plough,' etc.

The Masorites, superstitiously punctilious as they were, became, in the Providence of God, guardians of the text of sacred scripture. They counted, classified and recorded verses, words, and even letters, so that the Bible has come down to us with a text purer and more certain than that of any other ancient book. In the manuscripts of Terence, and within a much less space than our New Testament, Dr. Bentley found 20,000 various lections, and affirmed his belief that upon further search he would more than double the number of such discoveries.

In the manuscripts collated for Griesbach's Testament, 150,000 various readings occur. Yet it is remarkable that, notwithstanding these hundreds of thousands of variations, the substance of Scripture is not, by any of them, or by all of them together, materially affected; not one article of faith, not one moral duty, not one theological doctrine, not one essential truth, is in the slightest degree modified. The variations are mostly trivial, relating mainly to the names, numbers, dates, or to the letters of words. And the general result is that, with the exception of perhaps from a dozen to twenty verses, the text of every chapter, paragraph and even sentence of Scripture, is now so firmly settled that only the meaning is open to doubt or dispute.

A PROVIDENTIAL MISTAKE.

Two ladies who are superintending a mission for the Chinese which Dr. Cullis has established at Bakersfield, Cal., have had an experience which began unpleasantly but terminated in joy and thanksgiving. One of them sends the following account of it to Times of Refreshing:

Our quietude was disturbed the other day by what at first seemed a very unwelcome visitor in the shape of a young man about twenty-two or twenty-three years old. He rushed into the house without giving us notice, and before I could realize my true position I found myself confronted by what looked like a demon, such a wild devilish look had he on his face. He asked me for the ladies. Of course I soon understood what he meant and told him, he had made a mistake, whereupon he began to swear fearfully. I reminded him that he was in a gentleman's house, and how very ungentlemanly it was on his part. He insisted if I didn't like it I could "do the next best thing." I asked him if he had a mother or any sisters, and whether he was ever brought face to face with the thought that at the end of such a life as he was leading the judgement of God awaited him.

After a few words of straight truth with the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, he was led to see his sins, and after a lengthy struggle with the enemy of his soul, he decided to seek the Lord. He wept bitterly and asked Mrs. B. and myself to pray for him, which we did. He also prayed for himself, but for a long time the poor fellow seemed so bound by the fetters of sin, that he could not break away. Finally, in answer to the prayer of faith the light came, and his poor captive soul was set free. He thanked God for directing him to this house. Although it was a mistake on his part he said he believed that it was God's Spirit that guided him here. We gave him some cool water to wash with, and told him he might stay here and take a rest, but he thanked us and said he had found rest for his soul. He then told us that he had a good Christian mother, also a sister who was a teacher in Sunday school. He came from New York, was on his way to Sacramento, but stopped over at this place for the day. He also showed us the check of his trunk shipped through to Sacramento. He said he had been miserable for the past five years on account of sin, and had prayed to God many times but seemed to get no satisfaction until now. We all knelt down and thanked God for directing him to our house; while he didn't introduce himself very politely we were all very glad he came. What was our joy compared to the joy in heaven among the angels over a sinner returned to the Father's house? We gave him a small Testament, and some nice tracts to read, and told him to give them away after reading them himself. We committed him to God's keeping until we should meet again.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Elder E. E. Adams, Scottsburg, Livingston Co., N. Y. Where can I find the best map of the United States? Apply to a stationer.

C. P. S., Jersey City, N. J., R. E. Bayard, Catskill, N. Y., and A. E. W., Toledo, Ia.

The questions forwarded are suited to the pages of a secular journal.

A. D., Eau Claire, Wis. What steamer was the first to cross the Atlantic?

The steamer Savannah, which made the passage in 1819 in twenty-five days.

Rev. J. W. Eichler, Belmont, O. Did you ever hear or know of any one dying an inmate of an almshouse who gave systematically a set proportion of his income to the Lord's cause? We never did.

Rider, Philadelphia. Is it right for a Christian girl to ride a safety bicycle?

This is a question of expediency and not of conscience. There need be no impropriety in doing so.

W. H. Howard, Augusta, Woodruff Co., Ark. Is the oft-used proverb "Cleanliness is next to Godliness" found in the Bible?

It is not in the Bible. The phrase is believed to have had an Arabic origin.

E. J. T., Brooklyn, N. Y. Are the Seventh Day Adventists correct in their doctrine? Have we any authority for keeping the first day (Sunday) as the Sabbath? Was the day changed from the seventh to the first by the Roman Catholic Church?

The foregoing was fully answered in No. 28 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Subscriber, Fredericksburg, Va. 1. Is it becoming in a professed Christian clerk to sell intoxicating drinks for his employer? 2. Which one does God hold responsible?

1. Decidedly not. It is a sin to do so under any circumstances. 2. Both.

G. E. Cray, Passaic, N. J. Which has the greater temptation to intemperance, the politician or the society man?

The question is one that must be governed by circumstances. Unfortunately, both politics and society are full of temptations to intemperance, although the active politician is probably more numerously beset than the other.

A Subscriber, N. Y. City. What should be done with an elder who grumbles and growls at everybody, refuses to attend to the duties of his office, opposes any change made within the church, and refuses to attend service because there is a Ladies' Aid in connection with the church, whose members have socials at times?

There is but one way of dealing with an erring brother. (See II. Tim. 2:24; Titus 3:2; Matt. 18:15-17.) If these fail and he continues an obstructionist, you should consult your church book of rules and discipline and ascertain whether he is not subject to removal.

J. M. B. Linwood, Ark. 1. Who was Melchizedek and had he a father and a mother? 2. How long has an eagle been known to live, etc.?

1. He was the king of Salem and also a priest of God. The passage that has caused so much question about him is found in Hebrews 7:3. Commentators have been puzzled over it for centuries, but it is now generally accepted as typically referring to the priestly office and not to the individual. 2. Consult a Natural History, which you will find in the nearest public library.

Mrs. I., Ellen Street, Newark, N. J. Do you think that Satan is a personal being and that he is prowling around the earth now?

All Scripture and Revelation teach that the devil is a personal being. See his character described in I. Peter 5:7, and that of his associates in II. Cor. 11:14, 15. It is a favorite argument of the sceptic to assert that there is no devil, but his handiwork is visible throughout the world to-day, and will continue until he is chained during the 1000 years of millennial blessedness. (See Rev. 20:2.)

Richard Ellis, Wylan, Jefferson Co., Ala. 1. Who were the two first disciples of Christ? 2. What was the cause of the hatred between Jews and Samaritans? 3. Is regeneration or the new birth an earthly thing, because it takes place on earth?

1. John and Andrew. 2. After the Assyrian conquest, Samaria was colonized by strangers, only a bare remnant of the original population being left. For this reason the Jews did not consider the Samaritans and their descendants as of their race, and an enmity arose. When the Temple at Jerusalem was to be rebuilt, the Samaritans desired to co-operate, but were refused, and the feud became open. The hatred became traditional and it was in full force even in our Lord's day. 3. It is spiritual, not earthly. Your question echoes the inquiry of Nicodemus. (See John 3:4.) Regeneration is being born again of the Holy Spirit, which produces a change of heart. It is best expressed as being born "from above." (John 3:7.)

Subscriber for many years, Deposit, Mich. In Gen. 1:1 I find "in the beginning God created," etc. Are created and made identical in the original? What is the true translation?

The Hebrew word "bara" in Gen. 1:1, signifies to create out of nothing, according to the ablest commentators, and not merely to fashion or form out of matter already existent. The opening chapter of Genesis sets forth the world as first created, a rude and unformed mass, and the conformation and elaboration are all recorded in the following chapter. The word "asah" (to make), has the latter meaning. Thus Gen. 2:3 speaks of the things that God both created and made.

S. S. Scholar, Lower Gilmanton, N. H. Did Satan own the kingdoms of the world when he offered them to Christ? If not, was it any temptation to offer him that which the tempter could not give?

No; Satan did not own them. Satan is a liar and he offered that which he did not have. He tempts his dupes with offers of joy, happiness, power and prosperity, but at the end of life, if not long before, they find out that he is the Father of Lies. He tempted Christ because knowing that the Saviour had taken on a human nature ("was in all points tempted like as we are" Heb. 4:15), he believed that he might succeed with so dazzling an offer. The temptation illustrates the assault of worldly ambition upon the spiritual nature, stirring up the lust of power and silencing the voice of duty and the warnings of conscience.

James M. Allen, Newark N. J. Have we any Scriptural authority for responsive reading of the Bible, as a part of our regular Sabbath worship?

Responses were a feature of sacred services in Scripture times. "Let all the people say Amen." (Deut. 27:15; Psalm 106:48.) The services on Mount Gerizim were responsive, and the people were expected to say "Amen" as the curses were pronounced upon Mount Ebal. The custom of responses prevailed to some extent in the early Christian Church. Anciently all the people were asked to join in psalmody and prayers, and make their proper responses.

W. A. Hale, North Brooklyn, Me. I have read about the "Holy Coat" of Treves. Are there any of Christ's garments or any relics of the Saviour preserved? Can any reliance be placed in the statement concerning the "Holy Coat"?

No reliance whatever. The alleged garment is simply one of the innumerable so-called "relics," of which the Romish Church claims the exclusive right of ownership. The only "attestation" the coat received was given nearly 1200 years after the death of the Saviour on the Cross. A rival "Holy Coat" has been brought forward by another European city, seemingly instigated by envy at the enormous profit Treves is reaping from the exhibition of the garment.

THE WHITENED FIELDS.

SO many idle, folded hands,
And the harvest-fields are white;
Low droop the heavy heads of wheat
That wait the reaper's weary feet,
The sickle in his willing hands,
For "the harvest fields are white."

So many here that sit at ease,
While nath yon darker skies
The wretchedness and misery
Even angels well might weep to see.
How can we dare to sit at ease
Beneath these golden skies?

So fleet, so few the moment be
For binding up the sheaves!
The Master calls; do not delay,
But haste some fruit to win to-day;
For soon our only joy shall be
In bringing home the sheaves.

THE MANAGEMENT OF DOGS.

Editor American Sportsman:

I was much pleased and greatly interested in the article on the dog and their management that appeared in the SPORTSMAN from the pen of Mr. Hugh Dalziel. To advance the growth and beautify the coat, he advises the use of coconut oil. Right. But do your many readers and lovers of the dog know that there is within their reach a more simple and easier obtained article and at far less expense, that answers the same purpose of the oil. This is nothing more nor less than Ivory Soap, manufactured by The Procter and Gamble Co., of Cincinnati. I have used it for many years and find it for all practical purposes far superior to anything I have ever used in my kennel. For washing setters I have never found its equal. Its healing properties are wonderful, and for sores and eruptions of any kind invaluable. It leaves the skin soft and clear, furnishes life to the coat, produces a beautiful growth of feather, and leaves it smooth and glossy and free from harshness. I use it with lukewarm rain water, which I find is the best. This forms a rich, oily lather, and helps loosen all stubborn scales and blotches of the skin. To those putting dogs in condition for show purposes it is first-class, and does away with the use of oils, eggs, etc. I have no purpose in advising the use of the soap only for the good of the dog. I have no interest, directly or indirectly, have never met, nor do I know any of the manufacturers. But I must give them credit for giving us the best soap for kennel purposes I ever used.

STRANGERS IN CHURCH.

How a Little Kindness Led Two Wanderers to the Fold.

W H O are those two young ladies dressed in mourning who sat in the corner near you?" inquired Mrs. Ashby, of an acquaintance who passed her pew just as the Sabbath morning service was closed.

"They seem to be strangers," she continued, "and I haven't seen any one speak to them."

"They are not exactly strangers," said Mrs. Ashby's friend, "though I dare say they were never in church here before. Don't you remember a small, thin-faced woman who sat in the same corner for a few Sabbaths, some three months ago, and looked so forlorn and timid? She was their mother, and the name of the family is H— She's dead now, I hear, and better off, I've no doubt. These girls and their father teased her to death, it is said, about her religion and church-going, for she would always come to church as long as she was able. But she's gone at last, and I wonder what sent them here."

"Perhaps the Lord has sent them," thought

Mrs. Ashby, as her informant hastened down the aisle and left her still standing at the door of her pew. She recalled the pale face of the mother, to whom she had once or twice spoken a kind word, and whose absence from church after a few Sabbaths' attendance, had been accounted for by her reported removal from the town.

Mrs. Ashby looked again at the strangers; they were lingering, while all around them were fast leaving the house. No one seemed to care for them, and they looked as if almost doubting their right to be there. She felt as if some one ought to welcome them to the sanctuary; and so with a heart full of love, she went and took them by the hand. Calling them by name, she told them that she remembered their mother, and was grieved to hear that they had lost so good a parent. She added that she was glad to see them at church, and hoped they would continue to fill their mother's place. Then she inquired their residence, and giving her own name, said that with their permission she would call upon them in a day or two. They were too much affected to reply.

Sickness in Mrs. Ashby's family prevented her from calling on Sarah and Ellen H— that week as she intended. But when the following Sabbath came, she was glad to see them again in their mother's seat. She gave them a pleased look of recognition before the services commenced, and as soon as they were ended she went directly to them. Greeting them cordially, she explained the cause of her failure to call upon them, and told them that she particularly regretted it, because she was anxious to secure them as members of a young ladies' class, which met weekly, at her own house, for the study of the Scriptures. She asked them to think of the proposal for a day or two, and she would see them about it during the week if Providence permitted.

To Sarah and Ellen, Mrs. Ashby was the good Samaritan. They had been trained by their father in his own hard and bitter unbelief. The sorrowful and feeble mother whom they had just buried was scarcely a parent to them, she having married their father after they were nearly grown to maturity. She was a Christian, but too timid by nature, and soon too ill, to make her influence for good decided and efficient. The father and daughters laughed at her Bible-reading and psalm-singing, and utterly refused to join her in attendance at church. Finding herself sorely disappointed in the character and temper of the family with which she had too hastily connected herself, she soon sank into the grave.

Not till then did those thoughtless girls realize what they had done. The fear and hesitation of the hitherto timid woman, in her dying hour, gave place to Christian fortitude and even triumph. Her eyes saw truth with gospel clearness; her lips were fearless in declaring and enforcing it. The hitherto deluded daughters were touched at once with conviction and remorse. Under the influence of these feelings, they readily promised their dying mother to attend on public worship.

So it was that they came to the house of God; it was indeed "the Lord" who had "sent them." But the preaching they heard that first Sabbath was little calculated to stimulate or encourage them. The cold, lifeless sermon fell like lead on their awakened consciences. And when they met from those around them in church only an indifferent glance or a curious stare, they were ready to say, "No man careth for my soul." They would have gone home repelled and discouraged, but for the Christian faithfulness and sympathy of Mrs. Ashby. The tender love which glistered in her eye and made itself felt in the pressure of her hand, her unaffected interest in their welfare, and the almost motherly kindness of her manner, went directly to their hearts.

She visited them as she had promised, and soon won their confidence. They joined her Bible class, and diligently studied the word of God. It was not long ere they gave satisfactory evidence of genuine conversion; and now, under the wise training of Mrs. Ashby, who has become their trusted household counsellor, they are seeking, by the beauty and order of a Christian home, as well as by direct prayer and effort, to win their father to the Saviour.

God bless the disciples who "care for souls," and multiply their number a hundred-fold.

THE HOTEL OF CHARITY.

AT Tavers, near Beaugency, on the high road from Paris to Bordeaux, lived, and may still be living, a small farmer and his wife name Lepage. The ideal that both pursued in perfect agreement with one another as to the means as well as the end was that of doing good to their fellow-creatures. Their hearts were especially touched by the hardships and sufferings of poor artisans and laborers who, journeying in search of employment, frequently passed along the high road, hot and dusty in summer, cold and wind-swept in winter. To such people they gave food and shelter, and their house became known throughout the district and far beyond as the Hotelierie de la Charite. The idea of providing a resting-place for wayworn, moneyless wanderers was probably due to Mrs. Lepage, whose heart overflowed with love and compassion for the unhappy. Not a day passed but some one received under this hospitable roof shelter, food, and kindly, encouraging words. And this went on for many years. One day a carriage and pair drew up in front of the Hostelry of Charity. A well-dressed man sprang to the ground, exclaiming as soon as he saw Lepage and his wife: "Oh my dear benefactors! do you not know me?" He was once a workman who, like so many others, had tramped along the road weary and hungry, and who had found food and a night's lodging at the Hostelry. Not only had the Lepage entertained him but they helped him to obtain work at Beaugency, and from this beginning came a complete change of circumstances. He did not remain in the district, but the fresh start that had been given him brought increasing success and eventually fortune. Now a rich man, he had returned to show his gratitude to those whose charity had rescued him from wretchedness, and to whom he attributed all his prosperity.

SO SOON FORGOT.

(For the Christian Herald.)

HHE was a wife, a mother, and a friend; Kind, faithful, true, as any in the land; The centre of a loving circle fair; The crown of home, its central jewel rare.

One sweet Spring morning, beautiful, serene, An enemy appeared upon the scene; He closed the mother's eyes and pallid lips, And quenched the light of home in dark eclipse.

The stricken mourners, wailing out their woe, Around their dead, disconsolate, bowed low; Then sadly laid the silent form away, To slumber till the Resurrection Day.

A few bright years have bloomed and passed away, Since fell the shadow of that woful day; And now the stream of life flows on serene, As though that stormy sorrow had not been.

Forgot! So soon the absent dead forgot! Love scarce can find the sacred burial spot: The pitying weeds and thorns have crept around, And laid their humble tribute on the mound!

Ah me! Are there no loving eyes to weep? Are there no gentle, tender hands to keep The rose of memory blooming for our dead, A few brief summers, on their burial bed?

Forgot on earth! Ah me! how soon forgot! But God our sacred dust forgetteth not! His sleeping saints are precious in his sight, And he will wake them at the morning light!

THE GREAT ROCK ISLAND ROUTE TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation. E. ST. JOHN, JNO. SEBASTIAN, Gen'l Manager, CHICAGO. Gen'l Tkt. & Pass. Agt.

THE BETHLEHEM ROAD.

One of the Loveliest of Jerusalem's Suburban Highways—Many Biblical Points of Interest.

NE of the most beautiful landscapes in Palestine is presented to our readers in the picture which we publish on this page. Standing on the high ground at the Jaffa Gate of the Holy City, is seen looking south, an ancient road-way, winding between stone walls for a short distance, till it reaches the open country. On the immediate left is the old stone wall of the sacred city. The road, which is fringed here and there with olive trees, traverses field and valley, or curves past wooded slopes and, with many a winding turn, reaches out into the open country until it seems lost in the blue haze of the distant hills of Judea. This is the road to Bethlehem, and the surrounding country is one of the most picturesque in Palestine.

The Jaffa Gate is sometimes called the Bethlehem or Hebron Gate. It is the only western gate of the city, the other three being the Damascus Gate on the northern side, St. Stephen on the eastern, and Zion on the southern. There were other gates in olden times, but they are now closed. One of them—the Golden Gate—has a huge slab of marble laid up against it, and the Mohammedan "faithful" hold the belief that Mohammed will at the last day sit at this gate and judge the nations of the world, who will gather before him in the wide-spreading valley of Jehoshaphat. All the gates still in use are guarded by day and closed at sun-set, to protect the inhabitants from prowling Bedouin robbers.

To the right and just outside the Jaffa Gate is seen in the illustration a potter's shed or work-shop, with a pile of water-jars drying in the hot sun. Farther on is seen a Bedouin tent, with horses and cattle browsing about. On the left is higher land, interspersed with clumps of olive trees. The whole landscape conveys the impression of perfect repose, the silence being in marked contrast to the bustle inside the city walls. This was the route taken by the Rev. Dr. Talmage, editor of this paper, and his party, when they visited the birth-place of the Saviour in December, 1889.

"There were eighteen of our party, and twenty-two beasts of burden carried our camp equipments," wrote the reverend traveler. "We were led by an Arab Sheik, with his black Nubian servant carrying a loaded gun in full sight."

The wall at the Jaffa Gate, which can be seen in the illustration, is a massive structure, being from twenty-five to fifty feet in height, according to the elevation or depression of the soil, and two and one-half miles in length. Probably the greater portion of it is not more than three hundred years old, but there are in it some beautifully bevelled stones of much greater antiquity, some probably dating as far back as the time of Nehemiah. The Jaffa Gate, like the others, is a business focus by day and the customs officials sit there and levy duties.

On the road to Bethlehem many notable Biblical points of interest may be seen. On the right, a little distance aside from the roadway, is the house of the Greek Archimandrite and still further along, on the same side, are a Jewish Hospice and mill, opposite which, on the left of the roadway is a reservoir. Next we pass an English school, attached to which is a Protestant cemetery. On the left, and two miles from the gate, is an ancient wall, passing which the road curves till it reaches El Khamis, and a little way beyond is "Rachel's Tomb." On the right is the Fabel Deir Abu Tor, or, "Hill of Evil Counsel," with an ancient ruin on the summit. Here, according to tradition was the house of the high priest Caiaphas, in which the leaders among the Jews consulted together and finally resolved on the death of our Lord. (John 11: 47-52.) Near by the Hill of Evil Counsel is pointed out the tree whereon tradition says, Judas hanged himself.

On this beautiful road to Bethlehem one also sees the Wells of the Magi, at the point where they first saw the Star in the East. In the Valley of Rephaim is a large monastery called Mar-Elyas, surrounded by strong stone walls to protect the inmates against Bedouin attacks. Near the monastery is a rock whereon is shown a depression in which, as monastic legends assert, Elijah slept for a night during his flight from the treacherous Queen Jezebel. Curving again to the right for half a mile the road follows a course straight as an arrow to Beit-Laham, or Bethlehem. The scenery is charmingly diversified with hills and valleys along the whole distance.

The country round about Jerusalem is all of lime-stone formation, and not specially fertile; still, the olive thrives abundantly, and orchards and fields of grain are seen in the valleys.

CHRIST'S MARCH THROUGH THE CENTURIES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon preached last Sunday morning, September 27, 1891, from the Text: "On his head were many crowns." Rev. 19 : 12.

MAY your ears be alert and your thoughts concentrated, and all the powers of your soul aroused, while I speak to you of "the march of Christ through the centuries." You say, "give us then a good start, in rooms of vermillion and on floor of mosaic and amid corridors of porphyry and under canopies dyed in all the splendors of the setting sun." You can have no such starting place. At the time our Chieftain was born, there were castles on the beach of Galilee, and palaces at Jerusalem, and imperial bath-rooms at Jericho, and obelisks at Cairo and the Pantheon at Rome, with its corinthian portico and its sixteen granite columns; and the Parthenon at Athens with its glistening cornet of temples; and there were mountains of fine architecture in many parts of the world. But none of them were to be the starting-place of the Chieftain I celebrate.

A cow's stall, a winter month, an atmosphere in which are the moan of camels and the baaing of sheep and the barking of dogs and the rough banter of hostleries. He takes his first journey before he could walk. Armed desperadoes with hands of of blood were ready to snatch him down into butchery. Rev. William H. Thompson, the veteran and beloved missionary whom I saw this last month in Denver, in his eighty-sixth year, has described, in his volume entitled "The Land and the Book," Bethlehem as he saw it. Winter before last I walked up and down the grey hills of Jura lime-stone on which the village now rests. The fact that King David had been born there, had not during ages elevated the village into any special attention. The other fact that it was the birthplace of our Chieftain did not keep the place in after years from special dishonor, for Hadrian built there the grove of Adonis and for one hundred and eighty years the religion there observed was the most abhorrent debauchery the world has ever seen. Our Chieftain was considered dangerous from the start. The world had put suspicious eyes upon him because at the time of his birth, the astrologers had seen stellar commotions, a world out of its place and shooting down toward a caravansary.

I do not wonder that the commotions in the heavens excited the wise men on the night our Chieftain was born. As he came from another world and after thirty-three years was again to exchange worlds, it does not seem strange to me that astronomy should have felt the effect of his coming. And instead of being unbelieving about the one star that stooped, I wonder that all the worlds in the heavens did not that Christmas night, make some special demonstration.

In watching this march of Christ through the centuries, we must not walk before him or beside him, for that would not be reverential or worshipful. So we walk behind him. We follow him while not yet in his teens, up a Jerusalem terrace, to a building six hundred feet long and six hundred feet wide, and under the hovering splendor of gate-ways, and by a pillar crowned with capital chiseled into the shape of flowers and leaves, and near a marble screen until a group of white-haired philosophers and theologians gather around him, and then the boy bewilders, and confounds, and overwhelms these scholarly septuagenarians with questions they cannot answer, and under his quick whys and whyfors, and hows and whens, they pull their white beards with embarrassment, and rub their wrinkled foreheads in confusion, and putting their staff hard down on the marble floor as they arise to go, they must feel like chiding the boldness that allows twelve years of age to ask seventy-five years of age such puzzlers.

Out of this building we follow him into the Quarantania, the mountain of temptation, its side to this day black with robbers' dens. Look! Up the side of this mountain, come all the forces of perdition to effect our Chieftain's capture. But although weakened by forty days and forty nights of abstinence, he hurls all Pandemonium down the rocks, suggestive of how he can hurl into helplessness all our temptations. And now we climb right after him, up the tough sides of the "Mount of Beatitudes," and on the highest pulpit of rocks, the Valley of Hatin before him, the lake of Galilee to the right of him; and he preaches a sermon that yet will transform the world with its applied sentiment. Now we follow our Chieftain on Lake Galilee. We must keep to the beach, for our feet are not shod with the supernatural, and we remember what poor work Peter made of it when he tried to walk the water. Christ our leader is on the top of the tossing waves, and it is about half past three in the morning, and it is the darkest time just before day-break. But by the flashes of lightning we see him putting his feet on the crest of the wave, stepping from crest to crest, walking the white surf. The sailors think a ghost is striding the tempest, but he cheers them into placidity, showing himself to be a great Christ for sailors. And he walks the Atlantic and Pacific and Mediterranean and Adriatic now, and if exhausted and affrighted voyagers will listen for his voice at half-past three o'clock in the morning on any sea, indeed at any hour, they will hear his voice of compassion and encouragement.

We continue to follow our Chieftain, and here is a blind man by the wayside. It is not from cataract of the eye or from ophthalmia, the eye-extinguisher of the East; but he was born blind. "Be opened!" he cries, and first there is a smarting of the eye-lids, and then a twilight, and then a mid-noon, and then a shout. "I see! I see!" Tell it to all the blind, and they at least, can appreciate it. And here is the widow's dead son, and here is the expired damsel, and here is Lazarus! "Live!" our Chieftain cries, and they live. Tell it through all the bereft households; tell it among the graves. And here around him gather the deaf and the dumb and the sick, and at his word they turn on their couches, and blush from awful pallor of helpless illness to rubicund health, and the swollen foot of the dropsical sufferer becomes fleet as a roe on the mountains. The music of the grove and household wakens the deaf ear, and lunatic and maniac return into bright intelligence, and the leper's breath becomes as sweet as the breath of a child, and the flesh as roseate. Tell it to all the sick, through all the homes, through all the hospitals. Tell it at twelve o'clock at night; tell it at two o'clock in the morning; tell it at half-past three, and in the last watch of the night, that Jesus walks the tempest.

Now we follow our Chieftain until for the paltry sum of fifteen dollars, Judas sells him to his pursuers. Tell it to all the betrayed! If for ten thousand dollars or for five hundred dollars or for one hundred dollars your interests were sold out, consider for how much cheaper a sum the Lord of earth and heaven was surrendered to humiliation and death. But here while following him on a Spring night between eleven and twelve o'clock, we see the flash of torches and lanterns and we hear the cry of a mob of Nihilists. They are breaking in on the quietude of Gethsemane with clubs—like a mob with sticks chasing a mad dog. It is a herd of Jerusalem "roughs" led on by Judas to arrest Christ and punish him for being the loveliest and best being that ever lived. But rioters are liable to assail the wrong man. How were they to be sure which one was Jesus? "I will kiss him," says Judas, "and by that signal you will know on whom to lay your hands of arrest." So the kiss which throughout the human race and for all time God intended as the most sacred demonstration of affection,—that most sacred demonstration of reunion and affection was desecrated as the filthy lips of Judas touched the pure cheek of Christ, and the horrid smack of that kiss has its echo in the treachery and debasement and hypocrisy of all ages.

As in December, 1889, I walked on the way from Bethany, and at the foot of Mount Olivet, a half-mile from the wall of Jerusalem, through the Garden of Gethsemane, and under the eight venerable olive trees now standing, their pomological ancestors having been witnesses of the occurrences spoken of, the scene of horror and of crime came back to me, until I shuddered with the historical reminiscence.

In further following our great Chieftain's march through the centuries, I find myself in a crowd in front of Herod's palace in Jerusalem, and on a movable platform placed upon a tessellated pavement, Pontius Pilate sits. And as once a year a condemned criminal is pardoned, Pilate lets the people choose whether it shall be an assassin or our Chieftain, and they all cry out for the liberation of the assassin, thus declaring they prefer a murderer to the salvation of the world. Pilate took a basin of water in front of these people and tried to wash off the blood of this murder from his hands, but he could not. They are still lifted and I see them looming up through all the ages red with the carnage.

Still following our Chieftain, I ascend the hill which General Gordon, the great English explorer and arbiter first made a clay model of. It is hard climbing for our Chieftain, for he has not only two heavy timbers to carry on his back, the upright and horizontal pieces of the cross, but he is suffering from exhaustion caused by lack of food, mountain chills, desert heats, whippings with elm-wood rods, and years of maltreatment.

PILATE WASHES HIS HANDS.

It took our party in 1889 only fifteen minutes to climb to the top of the hill and reach that lime-stone rock in yonder wall, which I rolled down from the apex of Mount Calvary. But I think our Chieftain must have taken a long time for the ascent, for he had all earth and all heaven, and all hell on his back, as he climbed from base to summit, and there endured what William Cowper, and John Milton, and James Montgomery, and all the other sacred poets have attempted to put in verse; and Angelo, and Raphael, and Titian, and Leonardo da Vinci, and all the great Italian, and German, and Spanish, and French artists have attempted to paint; and Bossuet, and Massillon, and George Whitefield, and Thomas Chalmers have attempted to preach. Something of its overwhelming awfulness you may estimate from the fact that the sun could not look upon the scene. The sun dropped over its face a veil of cloud. It withdrew. It hid itself. It said to the midnight, "I resign to thee this spectacle upon which I have no strength to gaze; thou art blind, O, Midnight! and for that reason I commit to thee this tragedy!" Then the night-hawk and the bat flew by, and the jackal howled in the ravines.

Now we follow our Chieftain as they carry his limp and lacerated form amid the flowers and trees of a garden, the gladioluses, the oleanders, the lilies, the geraniums, the mandrakes, down five or six steps to an aisle of granite where he sleeps. But only a little while he sleeps there, for there is an earthquake in all that region, leaving the rocks to this day in their aslant and ruptured state declarative of the fact that something extraordinary there happened. And we see our Chieftain arouse from his brief slumber and wrestle down the ruffian Death who would keep him imprisoned in that cavern, and put both heels on the monster, and coming forth with a cry that will not cease to be echoed until on the great resurrection day the door of the last sepulchre shall be unhinged and flung clanging into the debris of demolished cemeteries.

Now we follow our Chieftain to the shoulder of Mount Olivet, and without wings he rises, the disciples clutching for his robes too late to reach them, and across the great gulfs of space with one bound he gains that world which for thirty-three years had been denied his companionship, and all heaven lifted a shout of welcome as he entered, and of coronation as up the mediatorial throne he mounted. It was the greatest day heaven had ever seen. They had him back again from tears, from wounds, from ills, from a world that never appreciated him, to a world in which he was the chief delight. In all the libretto of celestial music, it was hard to find an anthem enough conjugal to celebrate the joy saintly seraphic, deific.

But still we follow our Chieftain in his march through the centuries, for invisibly he still walks the earth, and by the eye of faith we still follow him. You can tell where he walks by the churches, and hospitals, and reformatory institutions, and houses of mercy that spring up along the way. I hear his tread in the sick room, and in the abodes of bereavement. He marches on and the nations are gathering around him. The islands of the sea are hearing his voice. The continents are feeling his power, America will be his! Europe will be his! Asia will be his! Africa will be his! Australia will be his! New Zealand will be his! All the earth will be his! Do you realize that until now it was impossible for the world to be converted? Not until very recently has the world been found. The Bible talks about "the ends of the earth" and the "uttermost parts of the world" as being saved, but not until now have the "ends of the earth" been discovered and not until now have the "uttermost parts of the world" been revealed. The navigator did his work, the explorer did his work, the scientist did his work, and now for the first time since the world has been created has the world been known, measured off, and geographized, the last, hidden, and unknown tract has been mapped out and now the work of evangelization will be begun with an earnestness and velocity as yet unimagined. The steamships are ready; the printing-presses are ready; the telegraph and telephone are ready; millions of Christians are ready and now see Christ marching on through the centuries. Marching on! Marching on!!

GIVING SIGHT TO THE BLIND.

One by one governments will fall into line and constitutions and literatures will adore his name. More honored and worshiped is he in this year of 1891 than at any time since the year one, and the day hastens when all nations will join one procession "following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." Marching on! marching on!!

This dear old world whose back has been scourged, whose eyes have been blinded, whose heart has been wrung, will yet rival heaven. This planet's torn robe of pain and crime and dementia will come off and the white and spotless and glittering robe of holiness and happiness will come on. The last wound will have stung for the last time; the last grief will have wiped its last tear; the last criminal will have repented of his last crime and our world that has been a straggler among worlds, a lost star, a wayward planet, a rebellious globe, a miscreant satellite, will hear the voice that uttered childish plaint in Bethlehem, and agonized prayer in Gethsemane and dying groan on Golgotha, and as this voice cries "Come," our world will return from its wandering never again to stray. Marching on, marching on!!

Oh what a day in heaven that will be when this march of Christ is finished! I know that on the Cross, Christ said, "It is finished," but he meant his sacrificial work was finished. All earth and all heaven know that evangelization is not finished, but there will come a day in heaven most rapturous. It may be after our world which is thought to have about fifteen hundred million people shall have on its decks twice its present population, namely three thousand million souls and all redeemed, and it will be after this world shall be so damaged by conflagration that no human foot can tread its surface and no human being can breathe its air, but most certainly the day will come when heaven will be finished and the last of the twelve gates of the eternal city shall have clanged shut, never to open except for the admission of some celestial embassy returning from some other world, and Christ may strike his scarred but healed hand in emphasis on the arm of the amethystine throne and say in substance: "All my ransomed ones are gathered; the work is done; I have finished my march through the centuries."

When in 1813, after the battle of Leipsic, which decided the fate of the nineteenth century, in some respects the most tremendous battle ever fought, the bridge down, the river incarnadined, the street choked with the wounded, the fields for miles around strewn with a dead soldiery from whom all traces of humanity had been dashed out, there met in the public square of that city of Leipsic the allied conquerors, and kings who had gained the victory—the King of Prussia, the emperor of Russia, the Crown Prince of Sweden—followed by the chiefs of their armies. With drawn swords these monarchs saluted each other and cheered for the continental victory they had together gained. History has made the scene memorable.

Greater and more thrilling will be the spectacle when the world is all conquered for the truth and in front of the palace of heaven the kings and conquerors of all the allied powers of Christian usefulness shall salute each other, and recount the struggles by which they gained the triumph, and then hand over their swords to him who is the Chief of the conquerors, crying: "Thine, oh Christ, is the Kingdom; take the crown of victory; the crown of dominion; the crown of grace; the crown of glory." "On his head were many crowns."

THE TRIBULATION.

The Predicted Time of Trouble, Its Nature, Duration, and the Victims.

BY H. W. FRY.*

UST as it was in the days of Noah, while he was building the ark in which he and his family were to be saved, the world saw no reason to fear a flood: so it is at this moment in which we live. Worldly people, and even many Biblical students, fail to see any reason for imagining that any change is likely to take place. But this instead of making us confident in the stability of things existing, should rather make us mistrust what the world sees and rely wholly on what the Word of God reveals! for it is at the time we think not that the Son of man cometh.

The Prophetic Parable.

We see that events are rapidly ripening for the commencement of the "seventieth seven" [see Daniel 9:24-27], and it is before this can happen that the parable of the ten virgins finds fulfilment. This parable is in part a prophecy. "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, etc.—when? See the latter part of the 14th chapter of Matthew and note that it is about the time when the Lord returns to his household. Also note well that "the kingdom of heaven is likened unto ten virgins, not the kingdom of heaven likened unto five wise virgins and the kingdom of the earth likened unto five foolish virgins—but the kingdom of heaven, or God's people on earth in the last days are likened unto the whole ten virgins, of whom five were wise, that is watching and ready, and five were foolish, that is unwatchful and unready.

This very distinctly proves that many professing Christians will be disappointed of their expectations. They believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, they profess to be waiting and watching for him, but when he comes, they are not ready, and so instead of being caught up, they find themselves left to go through the major portion of the great persecutions and tribulations of the last great seventieth seven! initiated and carried out by the "great harlot" and the Anti-christ, or the Beast. This prospect ought to be the highest and most powerful stimulus to every man and woman who takes these things to heart, to prepare to meet their Lord.

In the early part of the last seven years (Dan. 9:27), the Jews will, to some extent, be back in their land, the earth will have lost the best Christian inhabitants, but there will be of true religion amongst those left behind—they will have been horrified to have found that their spiritual condition was very incomplete, and though they may still be saved, yet they will only be saved as by fire, having to pass through all the terrors of the six seals as well as all the terrors of the six trumpets, but those who are faithful will be saved at the "last trump," that is the seventh trumpet which, when it is sounded, ushers in the seven vials of God's wrath.

These are the individuals who form, after the removal of the "ready" saints, the Church—symbolized by the "woman" of Rev. 12, who is persecuted by the Dragon (Satan.) She is the "true" woman as opposed to the false woman of Rev. 17. Her child, that is the elect few born of her, has been "caught up unto God and his throne," but she, the "main body," is left behind to be tested, tried, and purified in the fires of persecution.

At or about the commencement of this period of the seven years, vast political disturbances will arise, "nation shall arise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom," such wars will take place as are now dreaded by all the statesmen of Europe. These will result in the setting up of ten kingdoms, corresponding to the ten toes of Daniel's image (Dan. 2:41-43), and also corresponding to the ten horns of Rev. 17:12—and out of the confusions of wars and revolutions, a man will arise probably in the way the great Napoleon arose, who will increase in power and might until he becomes, as Napoleon nearly did, the one great Emperor of the civilised world, and this great man will be the Anti-Christ.

At the time of the blessed meeting of saints and Jesus takes place in the air, another stupendous event must take place. Satan and his hosts have been the powers of the air for the whole period from Adam to the present time. But if Jesus Christ and his hosts come in the air, it does not seem consistent that the devil and his hosts should remain there. We need not, then, be surprised to see that the devil is cast, and his angels with him, out of the air down on to the earth (see Rev. 12:7-9), and so the atmosphere is left for the possession of Christ and his saints! The atmosphere, or "the heavens," therefore rejoice (Rev. 12:12), but "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth!" Those ready saints who are taken may well rejoice, but those unready ones who are "left" may well weep! The devil is now obliged to remain on the earth, and he hath great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time! The time of great tribulation has commenced! No doubt are those who will suffer the most acutely at this period, but the worldly will also suffer terribly. God will during this period pour out all the seals, trumpets, and vials of his wrath. Many of these will plague the inhabitants of the earth, including the Christian and Jewish peoples, and that they will be terrible may be seen by referring to Rev. 6, 8, 9 and 16.

The Christian and the Jew

These are all literal plagues, just as much as the plagues of Exodus 7 to 11 were real plagues, but Christian and Jew will not only have these plagues to contend against, but they will have to face the terrific persecutions of the Antichrist and his officers! These are to some extent foreshadowed in Rev. 12. No one will be permitted to buy or sell without giving proof, by exposing the sign of blasphemy, that they are loyal to the great reigning emperor. They will have to display this sign—something like an Indian caste mark—either on their foreheads or on the palms of their hands. No one, for instance, without displaying this sign could buy any refreshment, rent a house, buy a railway ticket, or pass money in any way, and therefore those who won't agree to do the bidding of the Government of the day will be able to take no part in the ordinary affairs of life.

These terrible tribulations coming from the hand of wicked men, will, however, only be a portion of what God's people will have to endure, as they will also share in the fearful plagues coming on all the world direct from the hand of God! There will be no escape from these woes except through death, and we are told that many in those days will seek death who will not find it. (Rev. 9:6.)

A PROVIDENTIAL INTERFERENCE.

A REMARKABLE incident is reported by one of the missionaries of the China Inland Mission. It would appear that many lives were saved in the recent uprising in China by the fact of one gun missing fire.

The uncertainty resulting from that failure and a blunder on the part of the rioters in cutting the wrong telegraph wire gave the threatened missionaries time to obtain the protection of the government. The missionary writes:

"A very serious rebellion was on foot, and even now the embers must be smouldering: the fact that eight heads have been taken off within the past two weeks, and one man hacked to death by what is known as the 'light sword cuts,' and a tenth hung up in a cage, starved to death, and then decapitated, shows that things have been pretty bad. I have only been out in the street once, and things are very quiet, teaching having been very seriously interrupted.

"An organized rebellion was arranged by a well-known secret society for the overturning of the present Tartar dynasty. That society is very strong here, and members are to be found in every class and trade—soldiers and Yaman employes not excepted.

"The firing of three guns was the signal agreed upon for a general rising; two went off, but the third missed fire! Some were caught red-handed, and let the secret out. One or two very influential people have been beheaded quietly within the Yaman fort for fear of a rescue being effected; others were beheaded on the streets in the most public quarters.

"The city lies in a very small space, though the town itself extends for several miles. Two of the city gates are still kept shut, and a strong guard kept at the open gates. No strangers are admitted.

"The telegraph wires were cut previous to the intended rising, but fortunately below and not above the city, so that a message was able to be sent to Chu K'ing, and five hundred soldiers came down river just at the crisis."

FORETELLING HIS DEATH.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 12: 20-36. Golden Text, John 12: 32.

THE raising of Lazarus brought things to a crisis; the chief priests and Pharisees held a council to consider what could be done lest all men should believe on Jesus, and the government should be endangered. Meanwhile, Caiaphas, the high priest, having, by virtue of his office, the spirit of prophecy in a measure, foretold "that Jesus should die for the nation, and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." (John 11: 47-52.) Then a warrant for his arrest was issued. (Verse 57.)

But the living Lazarus, the unanswerable proof of Christ's power over death, became not only the talk, but one of the sights of Jerusalem (12: 1, 9, 17, 18); and the Pharisees were at their wit's end, and said, "Perceive ye how the world is gone after him?" Foreigners, as well as citizens, and the country people who were assembling in Jerusalem for the Passover, were inquiring about this "unprecedented miracle." There were certain Greeks among them which came up to worship at the feast who came to Philip with the request, "Sir, We Would See Jesus."

Philip took the precaution to tell Andrew first. Perhaps the consciousness that a warrant was out for the apprehension of Jesus may have made the disciples cautious. "Andrew and Philip tell Jesus;" but his answer would seem to have been very wide of the mark. He answered: "The hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified." This was the burden of his message to the sisters of Lazarus, yet how little had they understood his meaning. How then should the Son of Man be glorified? He says: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." Life out of death is the glory of Jesus. It is only as all that is of man falls into the ground and dies, as Jesus himself died for us, that the life of Jesus in the place of our life, can exist, and bring forth fruit. He must die for our sins, but not only so, he as man must die to position, honor, comfort, everything which makes up the life of men of the world, that in our nature, he might consecrate dishonor for his sake, lowliness, discomfort, every suffering which following him may entail, that we may say with Paul, "I will rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me."

What is this life which we are to hate? Everything which centres in ourselves, everything which makes us say, "I like this, I don't like that;" everything which makes us say, "I must do this or that." The life of one may be the household; eye and ear, heart and hand are centred in this little world, everything must bend to it, prayer must come in when all household duties are done; Bible study must take a subordinate place; the interest for the Church of God must either be left out altogether, or come in as an occasional thing; the house and the household must be cared for, the things of God may be—This is a life in which there is not the seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Self is sought in such a life, and whoso liveth it shall lose. The life of another is the business; such on engagement has been made, it must be kept, everything must bow to it; such an undertaking has been set on foot, and money must be found for it; if nothing is left to help the poor, if nothing is left to carry the gospel to the heathen, this thing must be carried thro', it has become to the man of business,

His Own Life

the first thing with him; and as surely as he makes it so, he will lose. But in the experience of a Christian, there are symptoms of his own life continually manifesting themselves where they are least expected. Everything which makes us feel important or necessary is our own life, quite as much as everything which we desire and choose. All which we are unwilling to die to, all which we dread to let go, is our own life, and most surely, "He that loveth his life shall lose it." But he that loseth his life," as Christ lost his, "shall keep it unto life eternal." The world was his, "the world knew him not," he proved that it was not his life, for he took the place of a Stranger in the world that he created! He made no claim upon any earthly thing or earthly honor. He, the corn of wheat, which fell into the earth and died, had a right to say: "If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be;" in honor or dishonor with Jesus, in riches or poverty, life or death, with him. It is a bond for better or worse by which the disciple is bound to his Master: "if any man serve me, him will my Father honor."

"Now is my soul troubled, and What Shall I Say,

"Father, save me from this hour?" Is this the corn of wheat in its death?" Nay; "but for this cause came I unto this hour;" this hour is no mistake, it is part of my Father's plan for me, that he may accomplish his purpose; and he shall have his way. I bow and submit; "Father, glorify thy name." The corn of wheat dies, but immediately the laid down life and will bears fruit; "Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again." The glory comes out of the death of Jesus.

But what connection has all this with the request of the Greeks, "Sir, we would see Jesus?" "There shall no man see me, and live," said God to Moses. (Ex. 33: 20.) Neither these Greeks, nor any other can rightly see Jesus without dying to themselves. It is this very thing which accounts for so many unsatisfactory conversions, there are those who have seen pardon, but have never rightly seen Jesus, and the main point in their experience is what they have got, not whom they have got; self does not die before an experience of pardon; but before a revelation of Jesus.

When the people heard the voice from heaven, they wanted to attribute it to natural causes, and said, "it thundered." The more reverent among them recognized the supernatural; "An angel spake to him." Jesus answered and said, "This voice came, not because of me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out." The conflict between the pleasures of this life and of death, which were engaged in the case of Lazarus, were already contending in the person of Jesus, the battle was not fought, but the victory was won; "the prince of this world" could no longer hold his own when his one stronghold, death, was seized and dismantled by the Prince of Life. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." There was

No Other Way Possible.

The balance of power in God's universe could not be maintained without strict justice; "every transgression and disobedience must receive a just recompense of reward. By nature we are sinners, by faith we have in Christ suffered for our sins and risen again—are dead upon his Cross to ourselves and our own life, but alive by faith to him in his life. And, thank God, this is not a mere dry doctrine to be mastered intellectually, it is a life to be lived in the fullness of his Spirit, who shows us where we are failing to die to ourselves, and who takes of Christ and shows to us. All the admiration for the moral beauty of the life of Christ cannot draw men to him. It is in his death for us, his death in which we die ourselves, that we are drawn to him.

The people answered him: "We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever, and how sayest thou, the Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man?" The question was abstract, the answer was personal, yet a little while the light is with you, walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whether he goeth. While ye have light believe in the Light, that ye may be the children of light. Nothing is more deadening than to speculate about divine things. Every light which is a mere theory to us soon becomes darkness. God gives us no light to trifle with. "God is the Lord who hath showed us light," but, "bind the sacrifice with cords even to the horns of the altar." (Ps. 118: 17.)

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

SIR, we would see Jesus. Whosoever will, may. It is not at all necessary to make an appointment with Jesus. There is no danger of not finding him in. You need not fear that he will be too busy to see you at once. As soon as you really want to see him you will have no trouble in finding him, for the day ye seek him with all your heart he will be found of you. Yes, he will even go out to meet you and as the father welcomed his prodigal boy so will Jesus welcome you. Then come to him all ye weary and heavy laden ones, come and see Jesus and the peace and joy and comfort that will fill your soul will enable you to sing from a full heart:

'Tis a heaven below
My Redeemer to know.

In one of the upper chambers of a city boarding house, late one autumn night, a young man was walking nervously to and fro. He was quite alone and very unhappy. To him the chief value of life had been the opportunity it gave him to make money. He had bent all his scheming and striving to that sordid use, and worst of all, he had signally failed.

As he walked, nursing his miserable thoughts, he heard some one begin to sing. Ordinarily he would have paid no attention, perhaps, and he was even less likely to do so to-night, absorbed as he was in gloomy and bitter reflections. But this sound had in it nothing of the merry music that is mockery to the heavy of heart. The voice was a female voice and though low and gentle, it was exceedingly clear and sweet, and the words she sang were those of the immortal hymn of Chas. Wesley:

Jesus lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly.

Involuntarily the young man stopped and listened. The melody and the hymn both arrested him. He became interested. Opposite his own chambers, in the next house across a narrow alley, was a sick room, and it was from this that the singing came.

The windows were open, and he could distinctly hear every syllable. He gently parted his curtains, and saw a sight that held him motionless. A little group gathered with bowed heads by the bedside of one who lay dying, and the singer, a fair young girl, sat close, holding the sufferer's cold hand in hers. Her tones grew more tremulous, but very distinctly came the words:

Other refuge have I none,
Hangs my helpless soul on thee;
Leave, oh, leave me not alone,
Still support and comfort me!
All my trust on thee is stayed,
All my help from thee I bring;
Cover my defenceless head
With the shadow of thy wing.

At a faint signal from the dying one, the friends knelt around the bed. Strangely touched and subdued, the young man at his window knelt too. The plaintive, weeping song went on, its words of trust still clear in the supreme moment of grief:

Thou, O Christ art all I want,
More than all in thee I find.

And then the singer ceased, for the hand she held in hers was the hand of the dead. The young man dropped the curtain and turned away in tears. It was not from mere sympathy that he wept, nor for his own losses and disappointments, now.

That hymn and that peaceful death-bed scene had called his thoughts from himself to his Saviour. He felt his great need, and like the "certain Greeks" in the lesson, he would see Jesus. That night he spent in earnest prayer, with a yearning heart, repeating:

Hangs my helpless soul on thee;
Leave, Oh, leave me not alone,
Still support and comfort me.

And the morning's sun brought him also the light of the believer's joy. He lived to bless the Providence that so strangely and tenderly on that autumn night pointed him away from his selfishness and sorrow, and led him to seek Jesus, the lover of his soul.

And I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me. This does not mean that every person who hears about Jesus will be drawn to him and be saved, but rather that men of all kinds will be made to feel the magnetic and attractive power of redeeming love. It would be an easy matter, did space permit to cite illustrations to prove how people of all ages, stations, degrees, nationalities, races and conditions, were and still are drawn to Jesus, even as he said, but the following well authenticated incident merits repetition in this connection.

John Wesley, the honored founder of the great Methodist denomination, was once attacked by a robber who demanded his money. After handing it to him, as the man was going away, Mr. Wesley called him back, and said: My friend, let me say a word to you. The time may come when you will be sorry for the kind of life you are now leading. Remember then this passage from the Bible "The blood of Jesus Christ his son, cleanseth from all sin." He said no more and they parted.

Many years after, as Mr. Wesley was one day leaving a church where he had been preaching, a person came up to him, and asked if he remembered being robbed once, in a particular place. "I do," said Mr. Wesley. "I was the man who robbed you, sir," said the stranger. "I wish to thank you for the words you spoke to me on that occasion. That sweet verse of Scripture that you then quoted took such hold of my mind, that I could never rest till I turned from my wicked ways in deep repentance and became a Christian."

Jesus was lifted up to this robber when Mr. Wesley spoke those simple words to him and that one text from the Bible was made the means of drawing that robber to Jesus.

RAISED BY SUFFERING.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Oct. 11.
"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." John 12: 32.

EDMONTON Academy was living on its past achievements. It had been a great school and the public supposed it was so still. But the long illness and subsequent death of the great and wise man who founded it had caused a change. The school fell into the hands of a ring of speculators who placed an incapable man in charge and removed the lower teachers to make room for their friends. So the school deteriorated, discipline grew lax, the standard of scholarship was lowered and, worse than all, immorality grew rampant among the boys.

Affairs were growing worse and worse when a boy named Charles Arnold was entered as a new scholar. He was the only son of a pious widow whose husband had been educated at Edmonton and had enjoined on his wife to send their boy there when he was old enough. She knew nothing of the deterioration of the school, but she knew that away from home he would necessarily be in the way of temptation and she had earnestly endeavored by teaching and prayer to prepare him for the ordeal. When Charles entered Edmonton he was a follower of Christ.

A more painful position than the one held in the school by the pure minded boy, it would be difficult to imagine. He was called "a saint, a nincompoop, a hypocrite," and other opprobrious names by the bigger boys whose precocious vice disgusted and shocked him. The leaders among the boys came to hate the boy who would not laugh at their profanity, their wicked stories and vulgar jokes. His very silence was a rebuke to them. That he suffered under their jeers and taunts they could see by the flush on his face and the flash of his eye, but as he did not resent their insults they said he was too cowardly to do so and they enjoyed seeing him suffer.

In his second term, there came an alleviation in Charles Arnold's trials. A few new boys of about his own age responded to his proffered friendship, and one or two of the older boys, who had secretly admired his consistency during the former term, became his companions. It was only a little band in so large a school, but the seed was growing. Charles reflected that he had stood alone last term and he was cheered by these accessions. It had also been in his power to render a service to some of his persecutors and he had rendered it cheerfully, much to their surprise. "Why do you cut yourself off from fun? You are not such a bad fellow after all," one of them said to him.

The remark gave Charles his opportunity and he spoke earnestly on the consequences of the course, they were pursuing. "There can be fun, without sin," he said, "and that kind I like as well as any boy in the school." The memory of Charles's service soon passed away and he was soon persecuted as bitterly as before.

"Do you know where the boys are gone?" Charles was asked one evening by one of his friends. "They are hiding in the lane and when it gets dark, they are going to clear Old Murdock's orchard."

It was just possible that Charles could prevent this crime by a timely protest. In any case, it was, he thought, his duty to try. He hurried out as soon as he heard the news and finding them in the lane, begged of them not to do so wicked a thing.

"You had better come with us and get your share," said one of the boys to whom he spoke. "I have a good mind to make you come and climb the trees."

"Oh, he is too much of a coward," said another. "Go back and lead your prayer-meeting."

No boy can lightly bear the taunt of cowardice and Charles felt it keenly. He made no reply, however, but walked back toward the school. On his way he saw the man they called Old Murdock leaning over his gate. It occurred to him that possibly a warning of danger might do more to prevent the expedition than his protest had done, so he turned back and went up the lane again to tell the boys that he had seen the old man, who would probably catch them. They laughed at his warning and bade him begone. He turned away sorrowfully and as he passed the gate he saw that the old man was gone.

There was trouble in the school the next day. Old Murdock was there with his complaint. He was sure his orchard had been robbed by the boys, though he had not caught them. His eye wandered over the school and lighted on Charles. "That is one of them," he said. "I saw him going up the lane last night on the way to the orchard." Charles was called out and questioned. Every eye was upon him. Would he tell the names of the guilty boys? There were many whose hearts sank as they looked at him. Like all lax disciplinarians the principal was apt to be very cruel in the spasmodic times when he was aroused from his habitual negligence. Charles was taken to the principal's private room that he might be free from the intimidation of the presence of the bigger boys. The whole school seemed to hold its breath in suspense.

It was more than an hour before the principal returned. He was looking hot and flushed. "I have given that boy a severe punishment," he said. "He persisted in denying his guilt, but I do not believe him. He must have had confederates, but he will not disclose their names. So I have punished him first for his own share in the crime and secondly for contumacy. If I can find out the other guilty boys I shall punish them, too."

"Why did you not tell, and save yourself, Arnold?" one of his friends asked him a few days afterward. Charles was in the school infirmary. His beating had been severe and his constitution was delicate. Besides, the mental worry of the past few months had somewhat unnerved him. The boy was very sick and the doctor looked anxious. He had consented to the visit of the other boy hoping that the patient might be cheered.

"I could not save myself," said Charles, "except by giving the boys away." It was better that I should suffer. They said I was a coward, but they will not think so, now. I shall be able to do them some good, perhaps, after this. They will be more ready to listen to me when I get back to them."

But it seemed as if Charles would never come back. His illness grew serious. There was a fever and after that weakness, which could not be overcome. Every boy in the school was anxious. A strange revulsion of feeling had taken place. Charles's heroism was celebrated by every boy. That he should willingly bear a punishment before which they would have quailed, when he might have saved himself at their expense, was a sublimity of heroic self-sacrifice to which they knew they were not equal. He had suffered for them, would he have to die for them? The thought was agonizing. In those days of suspense and dread, every boy pledged himself to be Arnold's friend if he recovered. The pinnacle of suffering on which his self-sacrifice had placed him was a throne at which the boys offered homage. When Arnold slowly regained his strength and once more took his place in school and playground there was not a boy among them all who had a tithe of his power and influence, and it was exercised for good. His sway over them was one of love founded on suffering.

FATE OF A DICTATOR.

Balmaceda, the Tyrant Ex-President of Chili, Dies by His Own Hand.

CHILI'S revolution has produced a startling climax. Intelligence was received in this city last week of the death, by suicide in Santiago, of Jose Manuel Balmaceda, Ex-President of the Republic. On the downfall of his Government in August, Balmaceda fled from Santiago and attempted to escape from the country, but found every avenue of retreat guarded. He made successive efforts to cross over to the Argentine Republic and to escape by steamer, intending to reach San Francisco, but each attempt failed. A refuge to the fugitive Dictator was afforded by Senor Urriburua, in Santiago, Balmaceda hiding in the garret of Urriburua's residence, and his presence being unknown to all in Santiago save the Senor's wife and a trusted servant. He remained there from Sept. 2d to Sept. 19th, his meals being taken to the garret by the Senora.

During his concealment, he had many earnest talks with Urriburua, and a number of schemes were discussed looking to his escape, but none were found practicable.

JOSE MANUEL BALMACEA.

On the 18th, he went to bed at midnight; at eight o'clock next morning, Senora Urriburua heard a pistol shot upstairs, and notified her husband. He at once left the house and went to the residence of Carlos Walker Martinez, with whom he returned and ascended to the upper rooms. They found Balmaceda dead, with a pistol wound in the temple. They promptly notified the Junta of the occurrence, and the necessary legal steps were taken by the government officials.

Balmaceda left a letter in which the following passages occur:

I acted all during the past eight months with the firm conviction that I was right. I had no one in the army in whom I could place any trust. My Generals were false to me. They lied all through the war. Had my orders been obeyed I believe that the battle of Concepcion would have resulted in a decisive victory against the enemy. My heart all through this trouble has been with Chili. I sought to rescue my country from foreign domination. I strove to make her the first republic in America. My enemies say that I was cruel. Circumstances compelled me to sanction certain acts, but many bad deeds that have been attributed to my orders were never known by me until they had been committed.

Minister Patrick Egan many times offered me good advice. He urged me to make peace with those opposed to me and to retire from Chili.

I did not heed his wise advice, for I thought that he was under the influence of the Junta's orders, who were then refugees in the American Legation. All through the trouble my closest advisers were always opposed to any overtures for peace.

The tragic fate of Balmaceda closes what at one time was a brilliant and most promising career. He was born in 1840, educated at the Seminario Conciliar of Santiago, and for twenty years was a leader among the most distinguished statesmen of Chili, ranking high as an orator and diplomatist. During the war with Peru he distinguished himself by his diplomatic ability in securing the goodwill of the Argentine Republic. In 1886 he was nominated, and subsequently elected President, succeeding Santa Maria in that office. The downfall of this ambitious and brilliant ruler may be traced to the course adopted immediately after his election as President, when he antagonized the Congress and took steps subversive of the Constitution. Balmaceda refused to call the Congress together, when the people demanded a special session for the purpose of voting on a franchise amendment to the Constitution, in which the entire population of Chili, and especially the navy, were interested. From this point on to the time of actual warfare, his stubborn ambition and determination to conduct the Government for his own selfish purposes, and to secure either in his own re-election or the choice of a successor who would be pliable in his interest, all combined to bring about the fatal crisis.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.*

His Early School Days.

IN winter we were squeezed into the recess of the furthest corner, among little boys, who seemed to be sent to school merely to fill up the chinks between the bigger boys. Certainly we were never sent for any such absurd purpose as an education. There were the great scholars; the school in winter was for them, not for us pickaninnies. We read and spelled twice a day,—unless something happened to prevent, which did happen about every other day.

"A woman kept the summer school, sharp, precise, unsympathetic, keen, and untiring. Of all ingenious ways of fretting little boys, doubtless her ways were the most expert. Not a tree was there to shelter the house. The sun beat down on the shingles and clapboards till the pine knots shed pitchy tears, and the air was redolent of warm pine-wood smell. The benches were slabs with legs in them. The desks were slabs at an angle, cut, hacked, scratched, each year's edition of jack-knife literature overlaying its predecessor, until in our day it already wore cuttings and carvings two or three inches deep. But if we cut a morsel or stuck in pins, or pinched off splinters, the little sharp-eyed mistress was on hand, and one look from her eye was worse than a sliver in our foot, and one nip of her fingers was equal to a jab of a pin;—for we had tried both."

A Profane Acquaintance.

"There lived over on the other side of the street in Lawrenceburg, where first I had my settlement, a very profane man, who was counted ugly. I understood that he had said some very bitter things of me. I went right over to his store, and sat down on the counter to talk with him. I happened in often—day in and day out. My errand was to make him like me. I did make him like me—and all the children, too; and when I left, two or three years later, it was his house that was opened to me and all my family for the week after I gave up my room. And to the day of his death I do not believe the old man could mention my name without crying."

A Valuable Secret.

"I have often been asked by what secret I retain health and vigor under labors multiform and continuous. I owe much to a good constitution inherited from my parents, not spoiled by youthful excesses or weakened by overstudy; much also to an early-acquired knowledge of how to take care of myself, to secure invariably a full measure of sleep, to regard food as an engineer does fuel (to be employed economically, and entirely with reference to the work to be done by the machine); much to the habit of economizing social forces, and not wasting in needless conversation and pleasurable hilarities the spirit that would carry me through many days of necessary work; but, above all, to the possession of a hopeful disposition and natural courage, to sympathy with men, and to an unflinching trust in God; so that I have always worked for the love of working."

Beecher's Imagination.

We were speaking of a report of the sermon in one of the papers: "But," said he, "how stupid of the writer to make that a diamond-studded scepter! It was a diamond scepter—one flashing crystal." "Now, Mr. Beecher, that's not likely. Whoever knew of such a thing? Besides, the phonographer probably wrote just what he heard, and it is my recollection that you said 'diamond-studded.'"

With one bound he was on his feet. "I don't know what I said, but I know what I saw."

SCRIBNER'S FOR OCTOBER.

A Baptismal Procession in Rome.

PERHAPS it is a baptism, or a wedding, or a funeral procession. If it is a baptism, in the first carriage, triumphant, dressed in costume, with her long ear-rings in her ears, her gold chain on her neck, her filigree pin in her hair, sits the nurse, the commander of the occasion, with the infant in her arms swaddled in white. You may know if it be a girl or a boy by the color of the ribbon that is attached to its dress, which the nurse takes proud care shall be full in sight. If it is a boy, the ribbon is red—if a girl, it is blue, for that is the color which belongs specially to the Madonna. You are not left in the condition of the man who has to guess the sex. At the side of the nurse, somewhat obliterated, and playing, as a rule, a most secondary part, sits the "commare," or godmother, and two of the nearest female relatives of the infant. After this carriage comes another, in which sit the male relations, who are, of course, relegated to the second plane, as of far less consequence on his grand occasion. The crowd in the street stops at the church door as this party descend and enter the sacred precincts, when the holy water is sprinkled on the child; and if startled by this operation it cries out, it is a good sign, for it shows that the innate devil which is always born in us has been driven away by the sacramental blessing.

The Voices of Earth.

We have not heard the music of the spheres, The song of star to star; but there are sounds More deep than human joy or human tears, That nature uses in her common rounds; The fall of streams, the cry of winds that strain The oak, the roaring of the sea's surge, might Of thunder breaking afar off, or rain That falls by minutes in the summer night. These are the voices of earth's secret soul, Uttering the mystery from which she came; To him who hears them, grief beyond control, Or joy inscrutable without a name Wakes in his heart thoughts buried there, imperaled Before the birth and making of the world.

WHEN MEETING IS OVER.

AROUND the door of country meeting-houses it has always been the custom for the people to gather before church and after church for social intercourse and the shaking of hands. Perhaps because we, ourselves were born in the country, the custom pleases us. In the cities we arrive the last moment before service and go away the first moment after. We act as though the church were a rail-car, into which we go when the time for starting arrives, and we get out again as soon as the Depot of the Doxology is reached. We protest against this business way of doing things. Shake hands when the benediction is pronounced with those who sat before you and those who sat behind you. Meet the people in the aisle, and give them Christian salutation. Postponement of the dining hour for fifteen minutes will damage neither you nor the dinner. That is the moment to say a comforting word to the man or woman in trouble. The sermon was preached to the people in general; it is your place to apply it to the individual heart.

You may call it personal magnetism, or natural cordiality, but there are some Christians who have such an ardent way of shaking hands after meeting that it amounts to a benediction. Such greeting is not made with the left hand. The left hand is good for a great many things, for instance to hold a fork or twist a curl, but it was never made to shake hands with, unless you have lost the use of the right. Nor is it done by the tips of the fingers laid loosely in the palm of another. Nor is it done with a glove on. Gloves are good to keep out the cold and make one look well, but have them so they can easily be removed, as they should be, for they are non-conductors of Christian magnetism. Make bare the hand. Place it in the palm of your friend. Clench the fingers across the back part of the hand you grip. Then let all the animation of your heart rush to the shoulder, and from there to the elbow, and then through the forearm and through the wrist, till your friend gets the whole charge of Gospel electricity.

In Paul's time he told the Christians to greet each other with a holy kiss. We are glad the custom has been dropped, for there are many good people who would not want to kiss us, as we would not want to kiss them. Very attractive persons would find the supply greater than the demand. But let us have a substitute suited to our age and land. Let it be good, hearty, enthusiastic, Christian hand-shaking.

UNFIT EPITAPHS.

IT is a natural and right desire to commemorate departed friends, but I do not wonder that people have sometimes dictated the inscription on their own tombstones when I see what inappropriate lines are chiseled on many a slab. There needs to be a reformation in epitaphology. People often ask me for appropriate inscriptions for the graves of their dead. They tell the virtues of the father, or wife, or child, and want me to put in compressed shape all that catalogue of excellences. Of course I fail in the attempt. The story of a lifetime cannot be chiseled by the stone-cutter on the side of a marble slab. But it is not a rare thing to go a few months after by the sacred spot and find that the bereft friends, unable to get from others an epitaph sufficiently eulogistic, have put their own brain and heart to work and composed a rhyme. Now, the most unfit sphere on earth for an inexperienced mind to exercise the poetic faculty is in epitaphology. It does very well in copy-books, but it is most unfair to blot the resting-place of the dead with unskilled poetic scribble. It seems to me that the owners of cemeteries and graveyards should keep in their own hand the right to refuse inappropriate and ludicrous epitaph.

Nine-tenths of those who think they can write respectable poetry are mistaken. I do not say that poesy has passed from the earth, but it does seem as if the fountain Hippocrene had been drained off to run a saw-mill. It is safe to say that most of the home-made poetry of graveyards is an offence to God and man. One would have thought that the New Hampshire village would have risen in mob to prevent the inscription that was really placed on one of its tombstones descriptive of a man who had lost his life at the foot of a vicious mare on the way to brook:

As this man was leading her to drink
She kick'd and kill'd him quicker'n a wink.

One would have thought that even conservative New Jersey would have been in rebellion at a child's epitaph which in a village of that State, reads this—

She was not smart, she was not fair,
But hearts with grief for her are swellin';
All empty stands her little chair:
She died of eatin' watermelon.

Let not such desecrations be allowed in hallowed places. Let not poetizers practice on the tombstone.

OUR HOLD ON GOD.

COMMUNICATION exists between city and city, between continent and continent—telegraphic, telephonic, postal, and by messenger; yet many seem to think that there are no lines up between earth and heaven. The interspace to many is a trackless desert. Who is your God? Is he deaf and pitiless? Is he enthroned stupidity? That is not our God. Our God is a Father, all tenderness and sympathy and love, never sending trouble of any kind save to make us pure, and good, and elevated, and Christian. His eyes are full of pity. His hands are full of help. Oh! drive up your flocks of cares and griefs to this fountain of the rock, and let them drink. If you want anything, ask for it, and you shall have it, or something better. In the direction of prayer is our chief victory, I believe the time will come when physicians will come to a patient, kneel down and pray to God for direction, and then rise and give the medicine that will make infallible cure. The time will come when drought appearing, multitudes will gather in prayer, and independent of all weather probabilities, and without any reference to which way the wind blows, the rain will descend in torrents. When Elijah prayed for rain he did not look to see which way the wind blew. Open an account with God on this subject. I took a blank-book and put on the front pages the things for which I would especially pray, leaving the opposite pages open for record of Divine answer. And they have all been answered. Some of them not in the way I expected, but all answered. There is no need of a man talking to me about prayer being an absurdity. I know of what I speak. Any man may know this if he will only test the Lord. The trouble is, many of us are afraid of being laughed at for our credulity. Laying aside all our cowardice and all our infidelity, let us lay hold of God in an enthusiasm of supplication. Let them laugh who win.

A young man went off from his mother's house, went off to sea. She prayed for his return day after day, month after month, and year after year. After awhile he started homeward, and the ship was in the offing; but a sudden storm swooped, and that vessel was broken to pieces on the rocks, and it was supposed that all the crew perished; but the night after, there was a knock at the door of that aged mother's house. Her long-absent son had returned, and the first words he uttered on entering the old homestead, were: "Mother, I thought you would pray me home." The grandest, mightiest and most stupendous agency in the universe is prayer. It is second to nothing but omnipotence, and their shoulders touch.

HONORABLE TITLES.

WE do not know why the learned professions, so called, should have all the titles. Why not treat as honorably the work of the hand as the work of the brain, or that which employs both hand and brain? We know men who are doing nothing for the bettering of the world's condition—great hulks of laziness and obesity—who have fastened to the end of their name titles as long as the tail of a kite; not a modern Chinese kite, but one of the splendid old-fashioned kites pretty much all tail, with appendages that looked as if a clothesline with a whole week's washing were being translated: a frail, "professional" name made to carry a big string of D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., S.T.P., X.Y.Z., etc.; while some man who has lightened the labor of a continent, and saved the lives of ten thousand sewing women, is called by the name of his infancy.

We cannot see the practical use of any title at all, if our mother has given us a good name to start with. We like the Quaker way of calling people by their first name. But if titles are to be given, let them be distributed among those who are eminent in any useful employment.

If a merchant show great skill in his business, if he stand head and shoulders above others on the street in his judgment of commercial vicissitude, if he be a pattern of integrity and large-heartedness as well as intelligence, why not, on exchange, or somewhere else, confer upon him some honorable recognition? What that title shall be we cannot now suggest; but till you can get a better title for such vigorous merchant, call him D.Y.S.—Doctor of the Yard Stick. Why not?

If a farmer know the best order of crops, and can raise thirty bushels of oats where his neighbor can raise only fifteen, if, while other orchards are being devoured, he succeed in exterminating the curculio from his premises, and turn a field of thistles and mullein stalk into a garden of the Lord, and can work miracles by subsoil plough and drainage, and, while others are having their corn uprooted by the birds, sets up in his own fields a scare-crow so natural that all the crows within fifty miles have heard of the horrible apparition, and a young man, crossing the lots at midnight, from a visit to his sweetheart, thinks himself assaulted in the middle of the corn-field by a highwayman with old straw hat and outspread arms, whom he shoots through the heart; in a word, if he be the best agriculturist in all the neighborhood,—why not confer upon him a title suggestive of his superiority? If you think of nothing else, call him F.B.A. Forty bushels to the acre.

BRIEF NOTES.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is so far on the road to recovery that his physicians have ceased to issue daily bulletins.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne commences next Sunday, a series of services at Red Bank, N. J., in the Baptist Church, of which Rev. J. K. Manning is pastor.

Evangelist Charles Inglis, whose portrait appears on page 617, preached on Sunday last at Sing Sing, N. Y., at the large Union meetings, now being held there by the invitation of Mrs. McAlpin.

Evangelist S. D. Towne reports the largest religious awakening in the town of Dedham, Me., that has ever been known there. The pastor, Rev. G. F. Bradford, is left to care for the work, and Mr. Towne goes now to Jackman.

Whitman College, Walla Walla, Washington, has opened with ninety-eight students in attendance, and a prospect of more. Prof. James F. Eaton of North Adams has been called to succeed Dr. A. J. Anderson in the presidency.

The Fraternity of the Sea is the name of an association formed by two hundred captains of Norwegian vessels, who pledge themselves to arrange for religious services regularly on board their ships, and whether in port or at sea, to do their duty and direct those under them in the fear of God.

Rev. Samuel Weyler, a specialist in Bible study and a student of Professor Harper at Yale Seminary, is preaching at the Grove and Irving Park, Pueblo, Colo. He recently gave three lectures on Biblical themes in the Episcopal Church, by request of the rector, and a series of talks at the Y. M. C. A. Rooms.

The telephone has been introduced in England into churches in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Worcester and other cities. Members of the churches, who are confined at home by illness, if they are telephone subscribers, now have the privilege of listening in their own rooms to the services in the church.

A man living at Bridgeport was married by a Methodist minister. He has become a Roman Catholic, and desires to have the Catholic Church pronounce the marriage null on the ground of its being celebrated by a heretic, or if it is valid, grant him an ecclesiastical divorce. The case has been appealed to the Pope, who has declared the marriage valid, and refused a divorce.

The sum of ten dollars has been received from a correspondent in Montana, who signs herself "Laborer." She wished it to be expended in sending copies of this Journal to persons on the ranches and in other places, where no religious services are held. We have carried out her instructions and heartily unite our prayers with her's that God will bless this effort to carry his truth to men who appear to have forgotten him.

University Place Presbyterian Church, New York, of which Rev. George Alexander, D.D., is pastor, has just issued its annual report. This shows that beside paying the ordinary expenses of the church-work during the past church-year, it has maintained two mission chapels and raised $39,000 for the missionary objects presented by the General Assembly. It has now 1650 members on its church-book and there is a flourishing Sunday School.

Rev. H. M. Warren, whose portrait and sketch of his work at the People's Baptist Church on West 48th Street, New York, recently appeared in this journal, is delivering series of Sunday evening lectures on the Pilgrim's Progress, illustrated by large pictures. Large numbers of non-churchgoers attend these lectures and listen intently to the earnest Gospel talks which Mr. Warren gives, and join in the hymns and Gospel songs, which are led by an efficient choir.

Rev. H. Parrish and Mrs. Parrish who labored so successfully in various churches in New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia last winter are now holding services in Spring Garden St. M. E. Church, Philadelphia. Evangelistic services are also held by them in the rooms of the Y. M. C. A. (Central Division) every Sunday afternoon. The Evangelists will close these services in October, when they will be glad to visit other churches needing help. Mr. and Mrs. Parrish belong to the Primitive Methodist Church but their labors in churches of other denominations have been heartily appreciated and have been very successful. Their address is 1322 Coffman St. Philadelphia, Pa.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

More Chinese Riots—Western Earthquakes
—Our Harbor Warships—The Oklahoma
Boom—Europe's War Talk—General Notes.

NEWs of further rioting comes from Shanghai. This time the scene of the disturbance was the town of Ichang, where an outbreak occurred on September 12, being directed, like all the others, against foreigners, but the disturbers in this case were Chinese soldiers. The authorities were powerless to quell the trouble. Gunboats cannot ascend the river as far as Ichang, but a force of British marines was detailed to go up in a merchant steamer and protect foreigners. Trouble is also threatened at Foochow, where a plot to seize the arsenal was discovered. During the Ichang affair, the Catholic and Protestant Missions and the houses of Messrs. Cain, Aldridge and Cockburn, were plundered and destroyed. The disturbance arose from the fact that a child had been taken to the Franciscan Convent by some of the priests. The sisters and priests were very roughly handled by the mob and fled for shelter to the gunboat Paolina. Over $300,000 worth of property was destroyed by the rioters.

Earthquakes in the West.

REPEATED shocks of earthquake have been experienced on the Pacific Coast and in South Carolina, during the week. Such was the violence of the seismic disturbance in Washington and Oregon, that it was concluded that great subterranean fires were at work; four distinct shocks being felt within two weeks, and the tremors extended across an entire State, giving the ground a motion like that of the sea lightly agitated. In some of the large buildings and hotels in Tacoma, the inmates were terrified, and many of them fled from their bed-rooms to the hallways, only returning after the disturbance ceased. The duration of the shocks was about three seconds.

A Historic Family.

MRS. ELIZABETH BORDEN BIDDLE, the widow of William S. Biddle, died last week at Philadelphia, of heart failure, at the age of 92. She came of a famous family. Her father, Judge Joseph Hopkinson, was the author of the national song, "Hail Columbia," her grandfather, Francis Hopkinson, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and her great-grandfather, Thomas Hopkinson, was a member of the Provincial Council and Judge of the Vice-Admiralty court under King George.

Civil Service Board Changes.

PRESIDENT HARRISON has made a very important change in the personnel of the Civil Service Commission. The resignation of Charles COMR. L. E. M'COMAS.

Lyman, President of the Commission has been accepted, and he will hold over until his successor is ready to assume the duties of office. It is understood that Hon. Louis E. McComas has been chosen to fill the office. Mr. McComas is a Southern republican and was born in Washington county, Md., October 28th, 1846, graduated from Dickinson College in 1866, and read law at Hagerstown, where he was admitted to the bar in 1868. He was defeated for Congress in 1876, but was successively elected to the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses. Last fall he was defeated by the democratic candidate, William M. McKaig.

Disasters of the Week.

THE latest railroad horror occurred on the Pittsburg and Western Railroad at McKim's Siding near Newcastle, Pa., on Sept. 24th. A construction train was run into by a freight train and many workmen injured. Nine were instantly killed and twenty were found lying about among the debris, badly injured. Those caught in the wreck were more or less scalded by escaping steam. Engineer Houghton of the construction train was the only American killed, all the other victims being Italians, who lived in Zelionople, near Newcastle. During a fire in the building of the Morewood Carving Wood Machine Company at Minneapolis, on Sept. 24, eighteen firemen were burned, some of them very badly. An explosion occurred and a great stream of fire burst through the roof at different points, shutting out the firemen from view. All escaped but two or three are not expected to live. While service was in progress in the Harmony Baptist Church (colored) in Jacksonville, Fla., on Thursday night last the lights went out and a panic followed. During the wild rush for the doors, one woman was killed, three others fatally injured, and some twenty more or less badly hurt. When the place was plunged in darkness, a frenzied worshipper shouted "judgment!" and this started the panic.

Our Harbor Defence War-Ships.

In the great iron shipyards of the Kennebec River, near Bath, Me., are now building a number of vessels for our navy, some of which are of unique design. Two cruisers are now to be seen there, progressing toward completion, and near them a formidable harbor defence ram, which, when finished, will be the oddest-looking vessel in the American Navy. Her make-up has many peculiarities, and the line of her hull, in its present condition, resembles the half of a barrel hoop, slightly flattened. The aim of the designer has been to construct a vessel that will sit in the water, practically on a pivot, with little or no resistance at either end, so that she can readily be turned about. The ram (which is shown, completed, in the accompanying illustration) is not meant for long-distance fighting, but is intended to sail right up to the enemy and impale her on the great metallic prong on the prow. The ram's dimensions are: Length over all, 251 feet; on water line, 242 feet 9 inches; breadth, 43 feet 6 inches; on water line, 41 feet 10 inches; draft, 15 feet 1 inch; displacement, 2,182.75 tons. If the requirements of speed are lived up to, as they doubtless will be, the ram will be the swiftest vessel of her class afloat. Her armament is a secondary matter and will consist simply of two four-inch rifles ranged fore and aft. She will be armored with six inch steel. She is a type of the class of vessels designed for the future defense of all the great sea-ports of the United States, and will be able, marine experts say, to hold her own with anything afloat.

Russia's Warlike Front.

ALL Europe is watching with deep interest the movements of the Russian troops in Volhynia and Poland, where a great series of manoeuvres is in progress. High military authorities believe that Russia means war at an early date, and that her soldiers will make a venture for Constantinople by the way of Bulgaria. Should King Charles of Roumania abdicate, as seems likely, the road to Bulgaria will be open to the armies of the Czar. Bodies of Russian troops are massed near the Austrian frontier, an indication that Russia will not tolerate Austrian interference. General Vladimiroff and General Gourke, two of the ablest tacticians in the Czar's service, are in command of the manoeuvres. The Admiral has ordered all the large vessels in the Russian commercial service to be equipped with powerful davits, like those used on men-of-war. Besides, hundreds of railroad engines and carriages for transportation purposes have been ordered to be in readiness, and the Russian military depots on the frontier have been trebly fortified recently. The apprehensions of war have been strengthened by a speech by the Grand Duke of Baden at the close of the manoeuvres of the Southwestern German army, when he said, "The time is near when Germany must again unsheath her sword in defence of her independence against an enemy who has not learned prudence by bloody defeat." The Turin Gazette (Italian official organ) also foreshadows early hostilities and says: "Europe is on the eve of a terrible war, which is to end in the defeat of Russia and the utter destruction and partition of France. Austria will employ her entire force to keep back Russia. The Italian and Austrian fleets will unite for vigorous action in the Mediterranean, while the English fleet will remain in observation ready to help them in case the French fleet should appear to be too strong for them. An Italian army will invade France through Dauphine at the moment when the German army, after passing through Belgium, will strike France from two or three points on the frontier. This Italo-German shock will be so terrible that France will be knocked down and out before Russia can render her any assistance. France will be obliged to pay the cost of the war, after which she will be divided up into a number of small States, each independent of the other, and none amounting to anything from a military point of view."

A New Oklahoma Boom.

At noon on Sept. 22d., over a million acres of land in Oklahoma were declared open by Presidential proclamation, and a great rush of "homesteaders" over the line took place. Thousands of men and many women on horseback and afoot, took part in the land chase. Many set their watches ahead and were far inland over the line at noon, and it is estimated that fully two thousand crossed surreptitiously, despite the military guard, and were awaiting in the interior the hour fixed by the proclamation. In one place over eighteen hundred negroes located new homesteads. Among the boomers were persons of all ages, including mere children on horseback, and men and women of sixty and over, who hobbled along as best they might. Some of the races for eligible sites were quite exciting. One woman levelled her revolver at an officer who attempted to stop her as she was speeding toward the location she had selected. There were, however, no tragedies, as on the first opening of the territory, and the day passed in comparative peace. In one place a town sprang up in twelve hours, as if by magic, and before 10 o'clock at night it had selected a Mayor and organized a city government. Altogether ten thousand persons have acquired homes and farms, and a half score or more promising towns have been created by the boom.

The War Feeling in France.

It is unquestioned that the war feeling in France has been greatly intensified by the recent remark of Emperor William styling the First Napoleon a "Corsican parvenu." Although now Republican, France retains its admiration for the great leader whose conquests made Europe tremble, and the German Emperor's fling has excited people and press to a pitch that was altogether unexpected. William's advisers evidently appreciate that he made a blunder in saying what he did, and that he has come to recognize this is shown by the fact that in the report of his remarks, sent to Italy, the word "conqueror" is substituted for parvenu. This is doubtless done to avoid offence to the imperial Italian family which is related by ties of blood to the Bonapartes. But if France has found cause for anger at Germany, she has on the other hand had reason for gratification at the magnificent reception accorded by England to Admiral Gervais and the French Squadron. The combined French and English fleets were inspected by the Queen and fetes, receptions, and illuminations were the order of the day while the visitors remained in British waters. Admiral Gervais, whose portrait appears on this page, while still young is a commander of fine abilities and tried experience. His tact and diplomatic speeches made a deep impression in England.

A Railroad King Dead.

Ex-CONGRESSMAN Wm. L. Scott of Pennsylvania, died suddenly in Newport, R. I., on Sept. 20th, of heart disease. He was born in Washington in 1828, and at twelve years was a page in the House of Representatives. In 1850, he became interested in the oil fields of Pennsylvania and Lake Erie iron and shipping interests, and gradually amassed great wealth, ultimately owning or controlling twenty-two thousand miles of railroads. He served for several terms in Congress, and was an active Democrat, taking part in all of the National Campaigns from 1860 till 1888.

NEWS NOTES.

Cables are to be laid shortly for a telephone service from Boston to London direct.

The International Labor Congress at Berne, Switzerland, has been discussing the causes of accidents to workmen, and the liability of employers in such cases. Only one hundred delegates were present.

A rain and wind storm at New Orleans, on Sept. 21st, swept thousands of English sparrows into Lake Pontichatrain and the Gulf. The city was formerly full of these sparrows, and now there is hardly one to be seen.

The great floods in Spain, by which over three thousand persons lost their lives two weeks ago, have been succeeded by violent wind-storms which destroyed many of the houses previously undermined by the waters.

The twenty-first Anniversary of the entrance of the Italian Army under Victor Immanuel into Rome was celebrated by the Italians in New York. A parade, picnic, speeches, music and patriotic demonstrations generally, characterized the occasion. During a similar celebration in Newark, N. J., six persons were killed by the explosion of a dynamite bomb and twenty more injured.

The Government rain-making party failed to bring a drop of moisture from the clouds at El Paso, Texas, notwithstanding repeated dynamite explosions in midair and on the ground. This was the first failure since the experiments began.

The plea of the Tennessee miners to the State Legislature for relief from the competition of convict labor in the mines has passed unheeded, the special session of the Legislature having adjourned without action. A renewal of the riots is expected.

Stephen VanCullen White, one of the greatest Wall Street grain and stock operators, failed last week with liabilities of about $2,500,000. His firm of S. V. White & Co., had speculated too heavily in September. Corn and the fall in prices exhausted their resources. Creditors will be paid in full.

Still another political craze has been stirred up in Canada by serious charges, brought in the Dominion Parliament last week against Postmaster-General Haggart. Mr. Lisler, a member of the Commons accused that official of profiting by railroad contracts and demanded an immediate inquiry.

The English railway companies have obtained a new system of tariffs, after five years of unceasing struggle and expense, involving Parliamentary agitation and a public investigation by two official commissions, costing $700,000. The new schedule goes into effect in August 1892 and will not affect passenger traffic. It puts an end to discrimination, and will be beneficial to foreign traders.

Joseph E. Knapp, the millionaire photographer of New York City and long a prominent Republican, died while en route home from Europe on the steamship La Champagne, on Sept. 14th. It is said that at least a dozen men owed their start in life to his kindness. He was an active member of the M. E. Church and was associated in the management of a number of leading Insurance Companies.

LIVING LIGHTS.

"Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all who are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."—Matt. 5: 15, 16.

OUR Saviour was speaking of the influence of his disciples upon their fellows, and he first of all mentioned that secret but powerful influence which he describes under the figure of salt: "Ye are the salt of the earth." No sooner is a man born unto God than he begins to affect his fellow-men with an influence which is rather felt than seen. But there is about every true Christian a manifest and visible influence which he is bound to exercise, and this our Lord sets forth under the figure of light: "Ye are

The Light of the World."

The Christian will exercise the silent, unseen, salting influence upon those who come into immediate contact with him; but let him labor to possess the second, or illuminating influence, which covers a far larger area, and deals more with real life; for salt is for dead flesh, and light for living men. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

The figure which our Saviour uses is a homely one, borrowed from the eastern tent and house. He speaks of a candle, or, more accurately, of a lamp. We should read the passage—"Neither do men light a lamp and put it under the bushel, but on the lamp-stand, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." I shall use the figure both in its eastern and in its western dress, and sometimes we will make a lamp of it and sometimes a candle; and, though we may confuse the metaphor, we shall not confuse anybody's mind upon the important truth which it sets forth. Three things are in the text. The first is the lighting, the second is the placing, and the third is the shining. The first two are both intended to produce the third.

I. First let us consider

The Lighting.

"Neither do men light a candle." What is this lighting up of the souls of men? It is, first of all, a divine work. God began his creating work of old by saying, "Let there be light," and there was light. And as in the old creation so in the new, the first thing that God worketh in the heart of man is light: "the entrance of thy word giveth light." Well said David, "The Lord is my light and my salvation." When this light comes it separates a man from those around him who are as the darkness. It does not take him away from his surroundings, it does not shut him up in a monastery, but the separation is complete; for to set a division between a candle and the darkness all that is wanted is to light it. The tiniest spark will by its very existence be distinguished from the darkness.

Furthermore, this light giving is a personal work to every man who is the subject of it. The text says, "Let your light so shine before men." When a man lights a candle the light does not belong to the candle originally; but when once the candle has accepted the flame the light becomes the candle's own light, and the candle begins to shine by its own light. So, beloved, the grace of God, the light from heaven, must come to each one of us individually from the divine hand, and we must personally receive it. Light is not inherent in any one of us, and therefore it must be bestowed. Its bestowal necessitates

A Personal Acceptance.

One by one each man must accept the light, permitting it, as it were, to kindle upon him, so that the very wick of his being, that innermost life which goes through the very centre of his nature, shall embrace the flame and begin to burn with it. There must be an individual appropriation of the light, so that to each one of you it becomes your own. "Let your light so shine before men." Do not deceive yourselves with the notion of national Christianity or hereditary Christianity; the only true religion is personal godliness. There is no way by which individuality can be destroyed and men saved en masse.

In each man the light is peculiar and distinct. The light that burns in one true minister of Christ is the same which shines forth in another, and yet one star differeth from another star in glory: Peter is not John, Paul is not James, Whitefield is not Wesley. Light is one, and its glory is one, and yet there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars. There is a difference in the

and gases, and so there is in your light, my brother, and my light. It is very possible that you would like to put my candle in order; you may do so if you can, but do not snuff me out. Your own light is, however, your main concern, and you had better ask for special grace that it may not fail.

I like our translators reading the word candle—"Neither do men light a candle," for nowadays a candle is the smallest of all lights. We almost despise a candle in these days of the electric light; yet small lights are useful, and tiny lamps have their sphere. God has many small lights; in his great house he has candles as well as stars, and he would not have even a small light wasted. Even the most twinkling ray of light is of God's kindling: think of that, you who cannot do more than talk to a child or give away a tract for love of his dear name. You are a little light, but if the Lord has given you even a spark of the sacred fire he means that you should shine.

Note further, that lighting is a work which needs sustaining. Whilst lighting is a process performed in a moment, it is also, as a matter of fact prolonged; for the lamp needs to be trimmed, and it would be ill to light a lamp and leave it to itself. The lamp

Must Have Fresh Oil

from time to time, since by shining it consumes its fuel. Do not any of you, therefore, think if you can fix upon a certain time and say, "I was converted then" that you may live as you like afterward. God forbid! The saints prove their conversion by their perseverance, and that perseverance comes from a continual supply of divine grace to their souls. Judge ye, then, yourselves by this, not so much whether on a certain special occasion you were turned from darkness to light, but are you still "light in the Lord?" Have you oil in your vessels with your lamps? Are you looking unto Jesus? It was well that you looked; but are you looking? for that is the great thing. We continually need to be built up as to our bodies, and it is just the same with our souls, and if we neglect this, if we fancy that something done twenty years ago is all that is wanted, we shall make a great mistake.

I wish that some men kept earthly things much more subordinate than they do. They are lamps and their one business is to shine. You may use a candle for many purposes; I saw a man grease a saw with one the other day, and another made his boots fit for walking in snow in like manner; but still these are not the objects for which a candle is designed: it has missed the object of its existence if it does not give light. Let us take care then about this lighting, that it be lighting from above, that it be a lighting such as makes the light our own, and that it be a lighting which takes possession of us, and consecrates us entirely, and is perpetually sustained by the visitation of the Spirit of God.

II. We will now consider

The Placing.

"No man lighteth a candle and putteth it under a bushel." It is a great point, this placing of a man—it may hide his light or send it further afield. The chief matter is the lighting him, and getting him to have light to give; but the next most important thing is where to put him when he is alight. For some men when they first find Christ are in the wrong place altogether. How can a lamp shine if it be dropped into a river? After the conversion of certain persons their removal becomes necessary. Most men will be wise to stay where they are and shine; but others must undergo a great change of position before they will be able to scatter their light to the extent which the Lord intends for them. That may account, my friend, for your having more trouble since you were converted than you ever had before. You have been left to lie still till now, but you are wanted, and so you are fetched out from your hiding. It did not matter where you were when you gave no light, you were just as well behind a box or in a closet as anywhere else; but now that you are lighted you must be put on a lamp-stand, and hence you are undergoing processes of providence that are somewhat painful.

Where Light is Needed.

Our placing, whether it has necessitated removal or not, is largely done by the providence of God: one man is placed here and another there, and it is well for us to look at our position from this point of view. God puts us where we can best serve his cause and bless our age. If you had your choice, perhaps, if you had to be a street lamp, you would like to be a lamp near a palace, to shine upon the nobles who pass that way. But the poor souls want lights far more down that blind alley, down that den of a court, where drunkards are murdering their wives. He that loves God, if he had his choice, might sooner choose to shine in the worse place than in the better. "Oh, that I lived in the midst of a warm-hearted church!" says one. If you are an earnest, thorough-going man, I am glad that you are placed in that dreary village where the people are pretty nearly starved for spiritual life. "What," cries one, "glad that I have to suffer so much?" No, not for that, but because if you are a strong man, you will not suffer, but you will make other people suffer; that is to say, make it hard for the minister, and the deacons, and the church to remain in their wretched condition of lukewarmness. I hope you will be the means of arousing them, and bringing them nearer to Christ.

The Light Hidden.

But though I have spoken of Providence, a good deal of our placing is in our own hands. There are ways of placing yourselves—for instance, that mentioned in the text, which may be as ruinous to our influence as if a candle were placed under a bushel; or you can put yourself in a place of advantage, as when a lamp is set upon a lamp-stand.

First, note the word in the negative—"Neither do men place it under a bushel." A bushel is a good and useful article. In almost every eastern house there was a corn-measure, here called a bushel, though it did not generally measure much more than a peck; this measure was commonly in every house, because they ground their own corn, and so were generally dealing with the neighbors. That useful corn-measure to me represents the pursuits of ordinary life—the proper and natural avocations of

The Household.

Many men and women hide the candle that God has lit under the bushel of business and domestic cares. But, you ask, is not a housewife to be a housewife? Certainly; but not so a housewife as to conceal her godliness. Is not the laboring man to work with his hands? Certainly, but not so to work for the bread that perisheth as to miss life eternal. Is not the man of business to give his best attention thereto? Of course he is, but he must see to it that he does not lose his own soul, or injure the souls of others. Keep your bushel; nobody asks you to burn it; but do keep it in its place. Subordinate all worldly things to the glory of God. Suffer not your possessions or your desires, your pleasures or your cares to act as a bushel hiding his light. This happens with a great many. I know how a minister can put his light under a bushel—he can be a mere official and perform service, being nothing more than a performer. The worst thing to do with the gospel is to parsonificate it. As soon as we preach as mere officials we have lost all power: we must speak as men to men. We can also cover the candle by using hard words, words which are not hard to educated people, but to the bulk of our hearers.

The Bushels.

I know some Christians who put their light under a bushel by being excessively bashful and shamefaced. Oh that they could overcome this hindrance. Others put their light under a bushel by inconsistency: they do not act as Christians should act, and when people see their bad works they do not glorify God. God forbid that in the house our darkness should be more conspicuous than our light. Some, I fear, cover their light under the bushel of indifference: they do not seem to care how things go with the cause and kingdom of Christ. They look well to the state of their flocks and herds, but for the house of the Lord they have small concern. I pray you, dear friends, do not hide your light in any way. Let not your lawful callings, your relationships, your sicknesses, your literary pursuits, or your personal sorrows become so exaggerated as to conceal the divine light within your soul.

The text is, however, positive. Put yourself on a candlestick or on a lamp-stand. What must that be? A candlestick is of light; and each man should make an appropriate confession of his faith. The best way is prescribed in God's word. It is written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Take care that when you have faith you declare it in the ordained manner; for he that with his heart believeth and with his mouth maketh confession of him shall be saved. O lamp, do not say, "I will shine, but I will lie upon the floor and do it." No, your place is on the stand which is provided. Dear Christian friend, join the church that you may be in order with the arrangements of the divine household.

I long for the day when the precepts of the Christian religion shall be the rule among all classes of men, in all transactions. I often hear it said "Do not bring religion into politics." This is precisely where it ought to be brought, and set there in the face of all men as on a candlestick. I would have the nation, either in making war or peace, consider the matter by the light of righteousness. We are to deal with other nations about this or that upon the principles of the New Testament. I thank God that I have lived to see the attempt made in one or two instances, and I pray that the principle may become dominant and permanent. We have had enough of clever men without conscience, let us now see what honest, God-fearing men will do. But we are told that we must study "national interests," as if it were not always to a nation's truest interest to do righteousness. "But we must follow out our policy." I say, No! Let the policies which are founded on wrong be cast like idols to the moles and to the bats. Stand to that most admirable of policies,—“As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.”

III. Our time has gone, but I must detain you a little while I speak upon

The Shining:

“Let your light so shine before men.” When a candle shines it is because it cannot help it. Shining, however, is not altogether a thing of necessity so as to forbid our attention to it, for the text demands care of us. “Let your light so shine.” You will not shine in the best manner though you may have grace in your heart unless you abound in prayerful, watchful, earnest care. You must guard heart and lip and hand, or your light will not so shine before men as could be desired. Your light will need trimming. Neglect it not.

The shining which comes from the Christian is here described as “good works.” Good talk is very well, but it takes a great deal of talk to light a room. Good works are the splendor of the light of God. What works are good works? I would answer—upright actions, honest dealings, sincere behaviour. When a man is scrupulously true, and sternly faithful, all right-minded persons admit that his works are good works. Good works are works of love,

Unselfish Works, works done for the benefit of others and the glory of God. Deeds of charity, kindness, and brotherly love are good works. As also careful attendance to duty, and all service honestly done, together with all courses which promote the moral and spiritual good of our fellow-men. Works of devotion in which you prove that you love God and his Christ, that you love the gospel, that you desire to spread the kingdom of Christ,—these may not be so highly valued by ordinary people, but are eminently good works. Let these good and true things abound in you, and shine out from you.

The text says that the candle gives light to all that are in the house. Some professors give light only to a part of the house. I have known women very good to all but their husbands, and these they nag from morning to night, so that to them. I have known also many husbands so often out at meetings that they neglect home, and thus their wives miss the light. I have known masters who are utterly indifferent about their servants; and mistresses who quite forget to seek the good of their maids. If our light be in good order it will illuminate the parlor and the kitchen, the drawing room and the scullery, shining upon all that are in the house.

I have had to hasten over all this, but I pray God to make it none the less effectual for the stirring up of every Christian here to use all the light he has. It is a dark world, and it seems to get darker, for the emissaries of Satan are going about thirsting to quench every light. Look ye well to your lamps—look ye well to your lamps, ye virgin souls. Trim well the flame, and go up forth even into the black night to meet the Bridegroom. Lift high your torches into the very face of darkness, and make men see that God is in the midst of his people.

A NOTED EVANGELIST.

Mr. Charles Inglis Invited by Mr. D. L. Moody to Give Bible Lectures in Chicago.

ANOTHER famous English preacher has accepted Mr. Moody's invitation to lecture at his Bible Institute. It is announced that the Bible lecturer for October will be Mr. Charles Inglis, whose portrait is here given. Mr. Inglis is an earnest Bible student, and he has strong faith in the power of the Word to win its own way with the masses. Like all the most successful evangelists of the day—those whose work is followed by permanent results—he places little reliance on pulpit oratory, but a great deal on the explanation and application of God's own Book. It is his power of opening up the mine of spiritual wealth in the Bible, and of showing its adaptation to the needs of daily life, which has made his name famous and has brought multitudes to listen wherever he has spoken.

Charles Inglis is an active vigorous man in the prime of life. He was born in 1848 in England. While little more than a boy he was aroused to a sense of his condition as a sinner in God's sight. It was in one of the London missions that the Holy Spirit arrested him and he was led to Christ by the earnest preacher who was conducting the mission. The young convert was eager for work. His soul overflowed with joy in his own salvation, and with love to the Master. He could not wait for training or for any regular sphere of labor. He began to give addresses on the corners of the streets, and was rejoiced to find that people listened to him and souls were saved. It was the effect that we have come to expect from personal testimony. The young preacher's efforts consisted at that time of little else. He could tell his hearers of his own personal experience of salvation, and urge them to find rest and peace by the same means.

The blessing of God was so clearly resting on his efforts that he was urged to speak in missions and he gladly consented. So numerous did these invitations become and so signally were his addresses blessed that he relinquished his business and gave himself up entirely to the glorious pursuit of soul-winning. From that time until the present he has been one of the most indefatigable of workers. In almost every city and town in Great Britain he has labored with marked success and in London he has been exceptionally blessed. The great Mission Hall which Mr. Charrington has built in the Eastern District of the city was thronged by an immense multitude during his services. He also gave Bible readings in the afternoons to which Sunday School teachers and college students came in large numbers to study the Bible under his guidance.

In 1881, Mr. Inglis accepted an invitation to visit Australia and New Zealand. He spent about a year in that region and there, too, his meetings were crowded and much good was done. Last year he paid a flying visit here. He held services at Portland, Me., in the City Hall which was densely crowded every time he preached. His visit was but a short one, but he has now been urged to return and has arranged to stay until the end of the year. During October he will be in Chicago lecturing to the students and holding public services in the evening. During the two following months he hopes to visit most of our principal cities and labor for Christ. We trust our readers will not miss the opportunity of hearing one whom God has so strikingly honored in the salvation of souls. Letters for him sent to this office will be forwarded to him.

A LOST DINNER.

A SUIT for damages for the loss of a dinner was tried last week at Benecia, Cal. A friend of the plaintiff, in San Francisco, recently arranged to give a dinner at which the plaintiff was to be the guest of honor. Certain circumstances rendered it necessary to have the dinner on an early day, so the invitation was sent by telegram to the plaintiff at his home at Benecia. At the appointed time the party assembled, several eminent legal gentlemen and a number of well-known clubmen being among the guests. The guest of honor, however, was not there. After waiting for some time, the dinner was eaten without him. When a day or two afterward, he was asked the reason of his absence he said he had not received the telegram of invitation. He felt very much mortified about it and sued the Western Union Company for negligence. The court awarded him $150 damages. It seems a large sum to receive as compensation for the loss of a dinner, but the court doubtless took into consideration the plaintiff's annoyance at having appeared to cast a slight on the kindness of his friends. The Bible tells us of another feast from which many invited guests will be absent, but in their case the absence will be due to their own negligence or wilful contempt of the invitation and for them there can be no remedy. (Luke 14:24.)

A DEFAULTER'S OFFER.

AN extraordinary offer has been made to the directors of a Bank in Tacoma, Washington, by a defaulting cashier. He absconded on August 22nd, taking with him over $20,000 in money and $900,000 in notes and other securities. He has sent to the President of the Bank an agreement which he asks the President to sign by which the bank will be pledged not to prosecute him. In return he offers to refund some of the stolen money and securities. He also offers if the agreement is signed, to reveal the combination by which the doors of the bank-vault can be opened. Before absconding he changed the combination and he alone knows the new one. As the bank ledgers and other books are in the vault, the embarrassment caused by the abstraction of the money and securities has been increased. The defaulter says that he lost about $4,000 by speculating with the bank's funds and, knowing that when the discovery was made he would be prosecuted, he seized the other money and securities and changed the combination of the vault, that he might have means at his command to make a bargain with the bank. The calculating effrontery of the defaulter's offer shows that he is an unusually deliberate and astute wrongdoer. But his conduct varies little in principle from that of men who hope to escape the righteous judgment of God, by giving to the church or philanthropic institutions large sums out of the fortunes they have made by defrauding the poor of their just earnings, and by selfish indifference to the interests of others. (Isa 1:13-17.)

A STOLEN HEIR.

A CHILD was found by a detective on Sept. 15, who was stolen six years ago. He is the only son of a millionaire of Portland, Oreg., and when he was stolen he was only fourteen months old. One day his nurse left him alone in his carriage while she went into the house on an errand. When she returned, the baby was gone, and nothing had been heard of him since. The detective found him in a hovel with a laborer, a few miles out of Duquesne, Pa. He has been searching for him ever since he was lost. Recently he heard of the child at Richburg, Pa., and thence traced it to Duquesne, where he found the boy in a most pitiable condition, being clothed in rags and living in the utmost squalor. The laborer whom the child lived with, said that it was the son of his wife, now dead, by a former husband. The detective, however, had no difficulty in identifying the child as he bore a conspicuous birth-mark which was seen when his clothes were removed. The parents of the child are now travelling in Australia, and are expected to return as soon as they receive the telegram announcing the discovery of their son. They have spent thousands of dollars to recover the lost one, and have travelled over a good part of the globe in search of him. There has been a standing reward of $5,000 for his recovery which the detective will have. He is much elated by his success. The parents, too, will be delighted and the child will exchange his rags and squalor for wealth and comfort. The discovery, therefore, is a general blessing. It is an infinitely greater blessing when one of God's children whom Satan has captured is found and rescued. He becomes an heir of heaven; there is joy over him in the presence of the angels of God and he who is the means of his restoration is rewarded. (James 5:20.)

A FATAL BARREL.

A SALOON-KEEPER in New York opened a fresh barrel of whiskey on Wednesday last and rolled the empty one out on the sidewalk. A number of small boys played with the barrel all the afternoon. At length they turned the barrel upside down. One of the lads struck a match and dropped it into the barrel through the faucet hole. He leaned over the barrel and peered in to see the effect. There was a loud explosion, and the head of the barrel was thrown into the air as high as the second-story windows. The explosion was followed by a flash of flame. The boy was blown twenty-five feet away by the explosion. When picked up he was moaning piteously and presented a terrible sight of burned, bruised, and bleeding flesh. He was taken to his home by his friends, but his condition became so serious that an ambulance was summoned and he was taken to Gouverneur Hospital. Another boy fifteen years old, who was standing close to the barrel when the explosion occurred, was severely injured. Still another was slightly injured and went home. This is a novel way for whiskey to manifest its power to work mischief. It would be well if it were its only way. But when a man is impregnated with it a very small spark of provocation is apt to make him as destructive as this barrel to himself and others. (Prov. 23:29-30.)

DELUDED INSURERS.

A LARGE number of householders in the country districts around New York are complainants against a man, who was arrested on Sept. 15. It appears that he has been making a living by going to farm houses and the dwellings of widows and others who seldom visit the city and, representing himself as the agent of a well-known insurance company, persuading them to insure against fire. He collected the premiums of five and ten dollars and assured them that if a fire took place, the company would pay them $500 or $1000 according to the amount of premium paid. One of the insurers desiring to increase the amount of the sum for which she supposed her property insured went to the office of the company in New York. She there learned that no policy had been effected on her property and the man was not an agent of the company. She informed her neighbors of her discovery and the man was arrested. Then it was found that there are large numbers of persons similarly living in fancied security, who if their property were to be burned would get no compensation. There is reason to fear that many persons are similarly deceived as to their eternal safety. A false security is often founded on baptism, confirmation, church membership or good moral character, though the Bible explicitly warns us that nothing avails, but becoming a new creature. (Gal. 6:15.)

A NIGHT IN A SWAMP.

A CITIZEN of Oakland, Cal., had a narrow escape from a terrible death on the night of September 16. He retired to rest at the usual hour, but, feeling restless, he rose, dressed and went for a walk along the banks of Lake Merritt which is near his house. He chose the road where the rock-work follows the line of shore, having the Lake on one side and a swamp on the other. He had not proceeded far before his foot slipped and he fell down into the swamp. He made an effort to climb out but as he struggled he sank deeper into the mud. He soon found that it was dangerous to struggle, and if he kept up his exertions to release himself he might go completely out of sight, so he stopped struggling. The whole night long he hung suspended in mud, with his head thrown back to keep his mouth above the water, not daring to move for fear of sinking still deeper in the soft black ooze. About five o'clock a boy rode across the dam and saw a face peering above the mud and water. He stopped, not knowing whether it was a corpse or not. The man waved one hand and sank a little deeper, and then the boy determined to examine. Help was found, a plank was run out to him, and he was taken to the receiving hospital almost insensible. He is now slowly recovering. Doubtless, he owes his life to his relinquishing his efforts to save himself, and waiting for help. The sinner under conviction finds, too, that that is his way of salvation. When he ceases to try to save himself and trusts only in Christ, then he finds rest and peace. (Acts 16: 31.)

AN OPERATION DELAYED.

AN injured youth in the Manhattan Hospital in New York was in imminent danger of death last week through his own reluctance, and that of his parents, to have an operation performed. He had met with an accident while riding, and his right leg was broken in two places. As the surgeons found that the bones were crushed and therefore it was impossible to unite them, and as the flesh and muscles were torn and lacerated they advised amputation. The boy would not consent and the surgeons appealed to the parents. They also refused, because if the boy lost his leg he would not be able to continue his business. They were told that he could not continue his business in any case and that if the leg was not removed the boy would die. They were obstinate and for three days they would not give their consent. The surgeons did all in their power to prevent blood-poisoning setting in, but they warned the boy and his parents that there was a terrible risk involved in delaying the operation, and that there was no hope of saving his life but in amputation. On the fourth day, when it was almost too late, they yielded and the leg was taken off. Ministers and Christian workers have often a similar difficulty with people who have some besetting sin which keeps them from Christ. They want to be saved but cannot bear to part with their sin. Happy are they if through God's help they are able to give it up though it be dear to them as a right hand or a right eye. (Matt. 5: 29, 30.)

A BAD BOY'S SERVICE.

THE teacher of a school in Connecticut had an exciting adventure on September 18. She is the daughter of a widow, and is supporting herself and her mother by teaching school in the "Cottonwood District." Among her pupils is one rough lad whose fighting propensities and insubordination have been particularly trying. It seemed impossible to control him and expulsion was his probable destiny. He was one of several pupils who remained in the school-house during the lunch-hour on Friday. The teacher stayed, too. She lives two miles away and carries her lunch with her every day in an old-fashioned, covered basket. That morning, as she passed through the Burnside woods on the way to school, she set the basket down at the foot of a tree for a few minutes, while she gathered some wild flowers. She did not open it until luncheon-time came, when she placed it on the floor by her side, and, as she was reading, put her hand in, without looking, to take out some food. Instantly she gave a loud shriek, and the boys looking up, saw a rattlesnake clinging to her arm. The bad boy ran to her side, and seizing the snake by the neck dragged it off and killed it. The teacher had fallen back in a faint. The boy noticed a drop of blood on her arm, and concluding that the snake had bitten her, sent one of the other boys for a doctor. Then he applied his lips to the wound and sucked it vigorously. The doctor was at the school-house within an hour, and applied his remedies. He said the teacher would recover, but he could not have saved her if it had not been for the boy's promptitude in extracting the poison from the wound by his amateur operation. The teacher will have very different feelings toward that boy when she learns that she owes her life to his courage and presence of mind. She is little likely to show the ingratitude toward him which men display toward Christ who "by the grace of God, tasted death for every man." (Heb. 2:9.)

CHILDREN OF LIGHT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 11. John 12:35, 36; 8:12; Matt. 5:14-16.

Who has light gives light to others. There is light within him, and about him, and in his own sphere he gives light, being part of that body to whom the Lord said, "Ye are the light of the world." Thus he is blessed and is a blessing. His spirit is a candle of the Lord. It is a taper kindled from the ineffable light, on which no man can look and live. The same light, in essence, but infinitely diminished in intensity and veiled in human flesh. If his eye is single, if it is not turned away to worldly delights, worldly aims and desires, then his whole body is full of light. Other men do not always see it, even when it is shining, but that may be because its rays are obstructed. When a candle is inside a lantern there is very little light shed on the path, if the glass in the lantern is encrusted with dirt, or is stained of a dark color. So the rays from the candle of the Lord are often obstructed by the physical nature in which it is enshrined, which may not be "unspotted from the world," or unstained with the remains of past sinful life. Christ places before us an ideal: "That ye may be children of light;" and an injunction: "Believe in the light;" and a promise: "He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life;" and a warning: "Walk in the light lest darkness come upon you."

On each of these points the Christian Endeavorer should meditate. Some helpful hints will be found in Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's sermon on "Living Lights;" see page 616 of this number.

Lead, kindly Light! amid the encircling gloom,
Lead Thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead Thou me on;
Keep Thou my feet: I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

Some two or three years ago a Christian man was living in a mining district. Late one evening he received a message from a sick boy whom he had previously visited, begging him to come and see him as it was thought he was dying. He set out immediately, but in the dim light he missed his way. As it became quite dark he found himself on a wide stretch of land, devoid of houses, and through which he could find no path. He saw in the distance the lights of the town to which he was going, but he hesitated to walk straight thither. The reason of his hesitation was that he knew the people of that district did not fence in the shafts of abandoned workings and in crossing the open space he might fall down one of these openings. He was afraid to move a step, so he sat down on a heap of stones and waited. Presently a man came along with a lantern. The lost man hailed him. Was he going to the town? He was. Was he familiar with the way? He was. Then believing in that light he walked without fear, though at intervals he saw by the light of the lantern the dark circles which showed where the open shafts were.

In the parlor of a lonely house a family was gathered one stormy winter night. Inside, all was bright and warm and cheerful; outside, the wind howled, the sky was black, and the roads heavy with mud. A knock was heard on the outer door. Who could be there so late? It might be a burglar, or a tramp. The husband and father, a gruff, surly man, armed with a bludgeon, went to the door, and his wife, a kindly, gentle woman, being concerned about his safety, followed him. Looking out into the darkness, they saw in the stream of light from the opened door only a boy in shabby clothing. "Will you give a poor boy a light?" he said in plaintive tone, holding up a lantern the candle in which had been blown out by a gust of wind. The man vexed at being disturbed by a beggar, as the boy evidently was, by his tone, did not heed what it was that was asked of him and was about to close the door. "O John," cried the wife, "let us give him a light. It is nothing to us and so much to him." That was true and the boy's candle was lighted. How many all around us in these great cities, are toiling on their heavy road in the darkness and storm who might be helped, if we were always ready to give the poor traveller spiritual light! The giving would not impoverish us and it might save him from stumbling.

LITTLE SERVICES.

EVERYONE who realizes how much of the burden of life consists in trifles and how many of the annoyances which go to make up a day of weariness might be spared if others were thoughtful and considerate, will appreciate the effort of a circle of King's Daughters in Louisville, Ky. In describing their aim in a report to the Silver Cross, the Secretary says that the motto of the circle is, "Bear ye one another's burdens," and the members try to carry it out in all their dealings. They do not make their purchases late in the day, when the clerks in the stores are anxious to close up their work; they avoid giving unnecessary trouble to car-drivers and conductors; they do not needlessly complain of defective service on the part of messengers and others whom they employ; they try by kindly words of sympathy spoken or written to cheer the sick or people in trouble; and in all ways at home and abroad avoid adding to a burden. One would be glad to hear of the forming of many such circles and would rejoice if all the daughters of Eve belonged to them. The little stinging annoyances, vexations and humiliations which are now so trying to the nerves of overburdened humanity and which are generally inflicted without intention and through sheer thoughtlessness would be diminished and by so much the world would be made brighter.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN CANADA.

A CHRISTIAN Endeavor Society has just been organized at Woodville, Ont., Canada, in connection with the Presbyterian Church in that town. It is now in active operation with forty members. Its officers are: Rev. A. McAuley, M. A., President; J. H. Rogers, Vice-President; Miss Clara Munro, Secretary; Miss Lily Gilchrist, Corresponding Secretary; Herbert B. Barnes, Treasurer. The Society starts with the earnest hope that God will bless its efforts to the salvation of souls, and asks the prayers of the readers of this journal that it may be helped and guided of God in the course best adapted to that end. It is gratifying to learn from the correspondent who reports the organization of the Society that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been found very helpful there.

THE Y. M. C. A. TRAINING SCHOOL.

THE sixth annual report of the Young Men's Christian Association Training School at Springfield, Mass., has just been issued. Mr. Oliver C. Morse, the Secretary, calls special attention to the following facts, contained therein: The design of the School is to train men for the positions of General Secretary, Physical Director, and other officers of the Young Men's Christian Associations. Rev. David Allen Reed, the founder of the School has, this year, retired from the Presidency, and is succeeded by Mr. Henry S. Lee, a man of wide business experience, the treasurer of the Springfield Institution for Savings, and a Director of the New York, New Haven and Hartford R. R., and at the same time, a man who has been deeply interested in the work of the Young Men's Christian Associations, as well as in the work of their International Training School. Forty-six students have attended the School the past year, twenty-six belonging to the Secretarial Department, and twenty to the Physical. Nineteen of these belonged to the graduating class. Thirty-four other students have attended the summer session of the school. Towards the purchase of a thirty-acre tract of land, (which with the equipment of a part of it for athletic purposes, will cost in the neighborhood of $25,000) nearly $17,000 has been subscribed and a little more than half of this amount paid.

It has been found necessary to somewhat increase the force of instructors in both departments of the School, owing to the establishment of Correspondent Courses this fall in connection with each Department. By means of these additional Courses it is hoped to extend the helpful influence of the School to quite a number of men already engaged in Association work, who desire, but are unable to avail themselves of the advantages offered by the regular Course of Instruction.

As fast as adequate funds can be obtained, the Trustees of the School propose to erect four buildings on the new grounds; one for a dormitory, a second for a gymnasium and Physical Laboratory, a third as a library and a fourth for recitation rooms and office.

It is a fact of special interest and of great encouragement to the friends of the Institution that although so young (having been established in 1885), the School has thus far furnished one out of every five Secretaries now engaged in Association work in the Dominion of Canada, one out of every eight in the United States, besides five in the foreign field, and over fifty per cent of the Physical Directors employed by the Associations on this side of the water. The School, however, is without endowment funds and without buildings, but hopes that its work will soon attract the attention of those who are specially interested in promoting the cause of Christian education in one of its most practical forms.

A BROOKLYN CHAPTER.

THE Epworth League of the Hanson Place Church, in Brooklyn, N. Y., inaugurated its season's work on Sept. 21, with an enthusiastic meeting. Dr. William H. Johnston was in his place as President of the Chapter, and Miss Maude B. Gilbert, the Secretary, presented the report. The Entertainment Committee has been busily engaged in arranging an attractive programme of sociables and other gatherings, which were described in detail by the Chairman of that Committee, Mr. E. K. Todd. The President reminded the Chapter that its chief business is not to provide amusement, though amusement was valuable in promoting the highest objects of the League, by bringing its members into personal contact and breaking up cliques and bands, which are the bane of Church organizations. The primary functions of the League, Mercy, Help and Devotion, must ever be kept to the front, whatever else may be neglected. Congratulating the Chapter on its spirit and enthusiasm, he augured for it a season of unprecedented usefulness. The evening closed with a number of choice musical selections excellently rendered by members of the Chapter.

Y. M. C. A. PROGRESS.

THE following figures show the growth of the Young Men's Christian Association movement in the United States since 1866, when the organization of the International Committee made it possible to obtain reliable statistics:

In 1866, there were less than one hundred associations, with a membership of about 15,000. There were not a dozen employed agents all told; only one association building and that worth but ten thousand dollars, and not adapted to association work; very few libraries; no gymnasiums; and but few religious or social meetings. The total net property was less than $100,000, and $50,000 more than covered the entire expenses of the work, both local and general. Then, there were no state organizations; no special work for any of the classes of young men mentioned above. Now (twenty-five years after), there are over 1,200 associations, with a membership of 225,000; 231 buildings, worth $10,000,000; 1,186 men giving all their time to the prosecution of the work as secretaries, physical directors, etc.; thirty-two state and provincial committees, employing sixty-six agents; a total expenditure for local and general work of over $2,000,000 annually; a total net property of $12,000,000; 100 railroad associations; 345 college associations; 11 German associations; 37 colored associations; 4,856 lectures and 4,357 sociables were held last year; and 987 Bible and Bible training classes and over 1,200 other religious meetings, were held weekly during 1890. How much these agencies have done to bring young men to Christ, only eternity will disclose.

We shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

HEAVEN'S WELCOME.

FREE salvation!—God in glory
Calls to men, for Him to live,
Oh! the wondrous, wondrous story—
“Come to me, I will forgive.”

Sinful man! regard the offer
God through Christ to you hath made;
Repent, believe, accept the proffer,
Seek forgiveness, ask his aid.

Glorious prospect, full fruition,
When thy toils and cares are o'er;
In His love,—oh blest condition!
Thou shalt be forevermore.

Glorious welcome!—Christ in glory
Calls to us with love untold;
On the throne, now this, his story,
“Come, receive your harps of gold.”

Strike the harps! sound out His praises
Who for us did shed his blood;
Let it echo down the ages,—
God in Christ,—eternal love.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells of Easter Weddings and Festivals—A Young Jewish Bride.

IT was perhaps natural that the children, remembering what Uncle John had said as to the more serious aspect of life in Eastern lands, should express sympathy for the little ones who lived in these countries and who as Tom concisely remarked “never had no holidays to speak of.” Visions of pilgrimages and feasts and similar observances ran through the minds of the children and so, when Uncle, seeing their somewhat grave faces, began to talk merrily about the delights of life in the Orient, the juvenile atmosphere cleared up with surprising alacrity.

“But they haven't any Fourth of July nor Thanksgiving nor New Year's and Christmas,” persisted Tom, “and they miss a good deal, don't they?”

“On the contrary,” replied Uncle John, “the folks there have more holidays twice over than we have. In Turkey almost every month brings a holiday and there are the great feasts ordained by the Prophet who, you should understand, is also the mussulmans' George Washington. Persia, too, is a great country for festival days and Egypt has quite a number—too many to recount just at present. Every other week a stranger notes the gayety of Eastern cities on these fixed public festival days. Then there are many others besides, such as birth-days, weddings and betrothals, when families make up holiday parties of their own.”

“And they give presents, just as we do?” inquired Tom.

“Yes. And the children enjoy such occasions to the full. In fact the social life of the East is kept up more largely for the sake of the children than in our own land. In Syria, in all the larger cities, the religious, civic and social festivals are faithfully observed and the latter particularly are occasions of great joy among the young. You remember the three great Jewish feasts, do you not?”

“Yes, the Passover, the Pentecost and the Feast of Tabernacles,” said the listeners, in chorus.

“Right; well, these are rigidly observed by the Hebrews all over the world and nowhere more enthusiastically than in Palestine and Syria.”

“One of the pleasantest social occasions I ever knew was a betrothal at which a large party of young people were present. The principals were a remarkably handsome young Jewess of Beyrout and a manly young fellow, who was present with his relatives big and little, at the lady's house, for the ceremony and the subsequent merrymaking took place there. First there was a solemn service of betrothment in which the young couple were formally dedicated to each other and the youth, in accordance with the ancient law, presented his affianced with a golden coin. Under the old Mosaic law it was fixed that the coin should be a denar—equal to ninety grains of pure gold, if the parties were well-to-do, and if poor, that the gift should be a perutah, or half a grain of pure silver. Then the loving compact is recorded in writing and duly signed, after which the balance of the day is devoted to feasting and merrymaking. It is a famous occasion for the young ladies and gentlemen of both households. Cakes, ears of roasted corn, and a variety of sweets are liberplaces of gold and precious stones. Some of the ornaments worn on such occasions are very ancient and have been in the same families for many generations and now they are brought out to adorn the timid young maiden who is soon to take on new responsibilities and to leave the companions of her childhood forever. And the youth, turning to her, can repeat in the beautiful language of the prophet Hosea (2: 19) ‘I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness and in judgment and in loving kindness and in mercies.’”

A Western Woman's Home.

ONE of the richest gifts of God is a cheerful spirit. C. L., writes: “I wish I could do much more for my Saviour. I am doing my best in my way at present. I live on a farm with a good many cows to milk and other work in proportion, indoors and out. I do want to be a very, very useful woman in God's vineyard. I am not anxious for public work, but, oh! I should like to be greatly used in saving souls and in helping the helpless children of this world. My sphere has not been a very wide one, so far. Helping at home, teaching school, Sunday School work, has been the extent of my labors so far. If it be God's will, I want to have the way opened for some other things which I think would add to my being really of home duties, there is opportunity to do good and to shed a refining Christian influence all around her.

Beyond the veil I cannot see,
The future is a mystery;
I vainly would comprehend:
But God knows what is best for me,
In love, he will not let me see
What coming days and years will be,
Nor how life's course will end.

He knows that one day's weight of care
Is quite as much as I can bear;
“In this trial body pent;”

And with these words he comforts me:
“E'en as thy days thy strength shall be
Each moment, child, I care for thee,
Then be therewith content.”

METHOD IN WORK.

METHOD is the greatest of time-savers. A man or woman who applies intelligent system to work, can do much more than one who proceeds without method. Here is a bit of homely and useful advice, from a writer in the Christian Advance, which may be useful to some of our readers: “Mrs. Jones, who does her own work, was asked by one of her neighbors how she contrived to get so much done. ‘Contrive is the word,’ said she. ‘I cut all the corners, and I don't try in the least to do as Mrs. Any-body else does. I know it's the orthodox way to get all your morning's work done up and then sit down to sew. But when I have a difficult piece of sewing on hand, if I do my housework first, I'm too tired to do my sewing justice, so I let some of the housework go, all that can be let go, and do my sewing first. Then it is a relief, when that is done, to fly around and finish up my housework. I know it's nice to iron all one's plain clothes, but I don't iron mine. Towels, sheets, and many other articles I fold neatly when they are dry and put them away without ironing.’”

“When I get breakfast I plan my dinner and generally make the dessert, sometimes prepare the vegetables, and then it is an easy matter to get the dinner. Many a time I've rubbed out my clothes at night and scalded them, and then left them in the tubs till morning. This enables me to get them hung up early, and then by dividing the work I do not get so tired as if I did it all at once. I see to it that the wood and coal and kindling-box are kept full, so I can have a fire at short notice and without running round.”

Another point: there need be no humdrum about our everyday tasks if we only set about them in the right spirit. Everything in life, even the most prosaic, has a beautiful side, if we only look for it.

Place a spray in thy belt or a rose on thy stand,
When thou settlest thyself to a commonplace seam;

It's fragrance will sweeten the work in thy hand
It's beauty will sweeten each dream.

When the task thou performest is irksome and long,
Or thy brain is perplexed by a doubt and a fear;
Fling open the window and let in the song
God hath taught to the birds for thy cheer

Get the Ear of the Boys.

GET the ears of the young and you will have their hearts when they are older. How many golden opportunities for timely counsel to the young are missed! “If we could get the ear of that boy at school” says the Javelin, “or that young man in college, we would say most earnestly to him,—the time is coming, and perhaps not far distant, when you will be wanted. This is a broad country, and opportunities for eminent achievement and large usefulness are constantly occurring in religious work, in educational work, in business, in professional life, and the service of the country. You may be wanted never so much, but if you are not ready when wanted you will be passed by. Many an old man to-day is looking back to see another in just the one place which was designed for him, and in which he might have been perfectly content, happy and useful, in which he might have done a great and important life work, and achieved distinction, but when opportunity's hour struck, he was not ready.”

Courtesy to Servants.

“I CAN'T allow him to outdo me in courtesy,” explained an old gentleman, who had returned the salutation of his gardener. He was right. The servant's right to be politely treated is as absolute as that of the master. If we are bound to love our neighbors as ourselves, we are bound to treat them courteously. If you do not govern yourself in all your conversation with servants by the same laws of courtesy which you observe in your conversation with the callers in your parlors, you are making a mistake.

ally consumed and instrumental music and singing make the hours pass away gleefully.

“You must know,” explained the traveller, “that in the East young persons are betrothed very early, sometimes at twelve or thirteen years of age. The parents or guardian (who is sometimes an elder brother) arranges the matter and draws up the contract. But it may be years before the marriage takes place. It is very rare indeed to hear of these early engagements being broken, although they are repugnant to our western ideas.

“This photograph,” he added, “shows one of the young Hebrew fiancées in her beautiful betrothal dress, adorned with jewels and her arms and neck heavy with bracelets and neck-and genuinely useful. I am asking the Lord for several things which I think would make me a more useful woman. I am not an idler; never have been, yet my opportunities in some directions have been much more limited than some others have been. I am not impatient about it. Yet do long for a wider, brighter field. God promised Nathaniel to see greater things, and I hope for the same blessing, not only for myself, but for every one in the world.”

It seems to us that a woman so devoted cannot fail to make for herself a sphere of Christian activity wherever her lot may be cast. Perhaps the Lord may open up to her a wider field; but meanwhile, even in the performance

The Captain's Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

THE Captain looked perplexed when Robert spoke of the dreaded mortgage as an instrument that might be burned up. It had been the Captain's burden for years, his source of perpetual anxiety and worry.

Was Robert still raving? Captain Allen took the paper that Eliza held out to him. What was it? It was the mortgage, surely, if the endorsement on the fold said truly.

"Robert gives it to you as a token of his love and of his and my gratitude," said Mr. Murray. "Open it, Captain, and see if it is all right."

Captain Allen opened it. It was right and more than right. There, folded in it, was a check for two thousand dollars. The Captain gasped. Never before had he handled such a sum of money at one time.

"This—is this too much. I cannot—we should not—"

"Nonsense, Captain. Don't you remember once I offered you the mortgage and two thousand dollars for the boy? You gave him to me. I must keep my share of the bargain."

"I did not give him to you," faltered the Captain. "He was your own, and you took him; I had no right to him."

"We will share him hereafter; he belongs to us both," said Mr. Murray. "And this little matter of the mortgage and of the money for a home and repairs, is not a question of dollars between us, Allen. It is a token of my gratitude and of Robert's love. You gave him a home—he gives you a home. You shared all with him—it is his privilege to share his with you. You saved him from ruin—he tries to return the debt in some small measure. Whatever he does—whatever I do, we cannot show the measure of our gratitude."

Tears were in all their eyes. This was a beautiful occasion. Robert was almost well. The mill was safe!

"Haven't I got the best father in the world?" cried Robert. "Didn't I tell you how good he was to me? It seems as if I could say nothing but, 'The mortgage is paid! The mortgage is paid!' It goes just like a song."

"Come, you must stop saying that and everything else. Pink, where is the calves-foot jelly?" cried Eliza. "We shall have this boy worse again after so much excitement. 'Zekiel, you had better go and write a letter to Bob and Jerry. Mr. Murray, we should draw the curtains and make Robert go to sleep. Now, Robert, let us hear no more of you for the next two hours."

Robert did not wish to be heard from. It was enough—more than enough—to be able to lie there and think that his great burden had rolled away. The mill was safe; his mother should have a house—a white house with a veranda. His father was friends with his foster-parents, and he was to go back to Lal's Mountain. He lay quite still, thinking how that house should be built, until he fell asleep, wandering through rooms whose shadowy walls changed, enlarged, shrank, as his fancy varied.

Next day young Morgan was able to go downstairs. Soon his mother would take him home. And Robert was now much stronger, sitting pillowed up in his bed, and developing a marvellous appetite for chicken broth. Mrs. Morgan would be no longer needed to reinforce Eliza in the case. The temperance treatment had been a splendid success.

"What do you think of non-alcoholic treatment now, Claude?" Mrs. Morgan asked her nephew, as she pointed to Robert and Paul.

"Well, aunt, you have succeeded finely, but you are a wonderful nurse and a miracle in sickroom cookery, as I know to my advantage," said Dr. Lee.

"I should succeed every time where the disease was not beyond any human help. And is it not a satisfaction to feel that your recovered patient has not in him the seeds of your planting of future disease, or worse, of a dangerous appetite—a cause of future crime? Mr. Murray has said I might tell you all his story, and I will soon. He hopes that it may make you a temperance doctor. Young Galens such as you, should be abreast with the best of your age. The temperance doctor will be the doctor of the future. A young man should be glad to be a pioneer in all that is wise and good."

If the days of illness had been dark and terrible, the days of convalescence were most cheery and beautiful. Captain Ezekiel went home; Mr. Murray went with him, but came back in three days. Mother Eliza and Pink stayed to take care of Robert. Robert sat up in bed and listened to Pink's tales of all that had happened at Lal's Mountain since the autumn. Then Pink must unpack the trunk and see all the wonderful presents which Robert's father had heaped upon him. Then the pocket-book was taken out, and there were forty dollars, Robert's savings, and nothing would do but Eliza must go out with Pink and buy spring hats and jackets, gloves and boots, and handkerchiefs and collars for both.

"I want you to look nice when the boys come up to see me," pleaded Robert.

Then Robert could sit up in one of the great chairs. His father ordered the most gorgeous wrapper and slippers. And now his diet was liberally increased, and a table was set beside his chair, and Pink shared with him the most delicious feasts of chicken, mushrooms, fruit, jellies. What feasting, what joy!

Then the boys came up to call on the convalescent Robert. Boys are sympathetic creatures in the main, and, no matter how heavily they "are down on a fellow," let the fellow get into trouble, fall ill, be near to death,—they at once forgive all his iniquities. Robert had failed to be popular among his mates at boarding-school. He had been moody, studied out of hours, and seemed stingy.

North was the first boy admitted to the infirmary.

"Glad to see you up, Murray. I declare you look much brighter than you did before you fall sick. Brain-fever seems to have done you good, man. The fellows all sent their regards; they are dreadfully sorry for you."

"That's kind of them, but they needn't be sorry for me. I never was happier in my life. I didn't think the boys liked me very well, North," said Robert.

"Oh, well, now," said North, uneasily, under the straight look of Robert's brown eyes, "all fellows have their own ways, you know. For my part I don't think it is any of our business whether you or any one does like the rest of us or not. Of course," added North, floundering more and more, "we have no right to expect that a fellow should join the games if he don't feel like it, or give treats, or spend his money if he don't wish to."

"I know what you all mean," said Pink, who was standing by Robert's chair. "You thought Robert cross because he did not do as the rest did, and stingy because he saved up all his money. Robert, was not that forty dollars—"

"Hush, Pink; never mind. It's done."

"I won't hush," said Eliza's daughter. "Mr. Murray told me all about it. Robert would not take time for the games because he wanted to get the three prizes for the sixty dollars, and he was saving—"

"I say, Pink, hold up, will you?" cried Robert. "No, Robert, I won't. He was not saving the money for himself, or because he was greedy. It was for us. We were poor and had a mortgage on our house, and we were to lose the mill because we could not pay, and Robert was trying to get money to pay the mortgage for us. He tried to save every cent,—all for us. And now his father has paid it all off, and Robert gave mother and me the money that he had saved, and he made us buy things for ourselves. I bought these boots. I never had a pair so nice before. You see, Robert got lost when he was little, and my father found him and adopted him, and he thinks that is a reason for doing everything for us."

"I ought to think so," said Robert, who had vainly tried by nudges and pokes to stop Pink's eloquence. "North, they did everything for me. I shared all they had. They went without things to get me things. They worked for me. They sat up nights with me when I was sick. They loved me just like their own. It would be queer if I could not do a little thing like that for them."

"I say it was fine," cried North, charmed with this explanation and with Pink's fervid championship. "I say it was fine all round!"

The next day, when the matron came to pay her regular morning visit to the invalid, she brought a bouquet of hot-house flowers "Sent by the boys to Master Murray."

Not a word further was ever spoken about previous misunderstandings. The boys and Robert thought that the flowers had fully expressed all that was proper to be said on the occasion.

And now Pink and Robert spent hours, sheets of paper, red ink and black ink, and words innumerable, upon plans for the new house to be built on the long-selected site near the mill. Seven rooms, a veranda, an outside kitchen, this house must have. They drew plan after plan. One very choice plan, on being presented to "the woman-with-a-head-on-her-shoulders," was found, though containing only seven rooms, to be about as large as a hotel. Another chef d'œuvre unluckily omitted the staircase altogether, and gave no access to the cellar except by going entirely round the house outsider. Another was deemed perfect, until it was found that every room was hermetically sealed as to doorways, and there would be no way of entrance except by ladders and through the windows. Pink was therefore discarded as assistant architect, and Eliza and Robert going into partnership, produced a very nice plan, which Mr. Murray carried off to Lal's Mountain.

From Lal's Mountain came the most delightful news. The New York man, who had been disappointed about securing the mill, did not resign his notion of a summer hotel. He bought a spot half a mile higher up the creek and went to work in haste. The new building would furnish work for the Captain, Jerry, and Bop. Besides, they would work on their own new home, and on repairs on the mill, and the present living-rooms were to be turned into a good carpenter's shop. As for the barge, that was to be replaced by a smaller, handsomer, less cumbersome craft, with a little steam-engine using coal-oil for fuel, and this craft was to be used as a pleasure-boat for the boarders and tourists, and it was supposed that Jerry and Bop as captain and crew would harvest shekels.

Captain 'Zekiel wrote that the twins had turned over a new leaf and behaved beautifully in their joy of new fortunes. The girl cooked and kept house almost as well as Pink, and her twin-brother made fires, fed the fowls, cleaned the windows and garden, and kept Robert as a model before his eyes.

"Father will have to make us some new furniture," said Pink, "everybody has outgrown the old trundle-beds. But we have the two carpets that mother and Jerry made, and they will do for our best rooms, that's one comfort."

Whereupon Robert burst into hilarious laughter.

Finally, by the middle of April, Robert was pronounced quite well. Doctor Lee thought he should remain in the city until June, and do no more studying until fall.

"I've made poor work of school-life this year, father," said Robert, "but next fall I'll come back and get on all right. I like this school and the fellows first-rate now."

"The failure was all my fault," said his father, "and what do you want to do for a business, Robert?"

"I want to go into business," said Robert, "into the lumber business, if you don't mind. I've been among the mills and the lumber all my life. I can't tell you how I like a lumberyard. The smell of all the wood makes me think of the forests, and the logging-camps, and log-drives, and the mills, and the water-wheels. You won't mind, will you? I really feel sure I haven't the making of a President of any kind in me. I am a very common person."

Mr. Murray laughed.

"Be what you like, so that you do honestly and well, whatever work you undertake."

Then Eliza and Pink went back to Lal's Mountain, and left Robert to come with the June sunshine.

Mr. Murray's new house was finished and the furnishing began. A happy chance brought Mrs. Morgan to the city, and she became chief adviser and aid in that buying. But to Robert the most delightful part of it was that he was buying not only for his own room in the West Philadelphia house, but for that dear new seven-room house at Lal's Mountain. In the excess of his joy he would have bought plush chairs, or pictures nearly as large as the humble walls, and have left out simple kitchen appurtenances altogether. But Mrs. Morgan saved him from such indiscretions. She expounded that the house on Lal's Mountain should be furnished to suit Lal's Mountain, and that as Eliza did her own work, her furnishings should not make work burdensome. But the rag-carpets were relegated to the kitchen and the boys' bed-room, and the parlor had a Brussels carpet, a parlor organ, and a little book-case, filled with just the right books for every one. Never was human being happier than Robert over every separate set of cottage-furniture, over every chair and table, over the hogshead packed with crockery. Mr. Murray grew ten years younger in witnessing his son's ecstasies. Perhaps, also, his rejuvenation was partly due to the expansion of his own heart in deeds of just liberality, in expression of gratitude; for there is nothing does us so much good as the exercise of these virtues. "He who giveth, groweth like his God."

"You seemed to take comparatively little interest in our shopping last fall, Robert, but now you are mad with joy."

"Yes, but that was only for me; and I had never felt the need of the things I was getting. Besides, then I was so stunned at losing my old home and family I could only think of them. Now I am as happy as I can be."

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.

To Begin in No. 41 of "The Christian Herald."

IN number 41, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will begin the publication of a new Serial Story of great dramatic power and thrilling interest, entitled:

"ALEPH, THE CHALDEAN;
OR, THE MESSIAH AS SEEN FROM ALEXANDRIA."

The author is that distinguished writer on Biblical Times and Topics, the Rev. E. F. Burr, D.D., LL.D. The exclusive right of the serial publication of this remarkable story, which is declared by leading critics to be equal if not superior to "BEN HUR," has been secured by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The story deals with events in the time of Christ and is of transcendent interest and attractiveness to all Christian readers. Pictures of domestic and public life in the First Century of the Christian era, when all Palestine and a part of Egypt were under Roman rule, are given with rare vividness; the various types of races to be found in Alexandria, then the greatest city of the world, are set forth with a master pen, and the conflict of the adherents of rival deities and creeds then raging is graphically described.

Aleph, a young student, comes from Chaldea to Alexandria, where he is astounded at the shallow morality, superstition and idolatry that prevail. Here he first hears, from travellers returned from Palestine, of the Messiah born in Bethlehem. The gradual growth of the Christians throughout Egypt; their bitter opposition by the fanatical fire-worshippers and the Alexandrian Jews; their perils and privations, and their persecution by the Romans and by Simon Magus the magician, are all portrayed with the fidelity of a series of photographs from life.

Specially attractive and noble are the personalities of Seti, the priest, Rachel, the beautiful "Gem of Alexandria" and Cimon, the Greek, the friend of Aleph. The pageantry of Rome's armies, the excitements of the gladiatorial arena, the peril of Aleph in a dungeon, whence he is to be thrown to the lions, and the long line of afflictions to which God's people were subjected, finally ending in the abasement of their persecutors, together constitute the elements of a powerful narrative, which is historically and archaeologically a mine of valuable information.

But the great and surpassing spiritual interest in the story centres around the Saviour's life and ministry, as reflected from distant Palestine, their influence upon the Egyptian metropolis and the gradual spread of the belief in his doctrine. The subtle charm of the story, pervading it at every page like a delicate perfume, is a lofty spirituality which, no less than the high literary ability it displays, must make it exceedingly popular among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Our Saviour King.

"His mercy endureth forever."—Ps. 136: 1.

J. H. JOHNSTON.

JAMES McGRATHAN.

1. He lives and loves, our Saviour King; With joyful lips your tribute bring;
2. His Hand is strong, His word endures, His sac-ri-fice our peace secures;
3. Each day reveals His constant love, With "mercies new" from heav'n above;

Re-peat His praise, ex-alt His Name, Whose grace and truth are still the same.
From sin and death He doth re-deem, His changeless love be all our theme.
Thro' a-ges past His word has stood; Oh, taste and see that He is good.

CHORUS.

His mer-cy flows, an end-less stream, To all e-ter-ni-ty the same;

To all e-ter-ni-ty, to all e-ter-ni-ty, To all e-ter-ni-ty the same.

FROM GOSPEL HYMNS No. 6, BY PERMISSION OF THE PUBLISHER.

DAY BY DAY.

WITH staff and shoon I journey,
Uphill the way I take,
Past many a tangled thicket,
O'ergrown with briar and brake;
And oft my feet are weary,
And oft my steps are slow,
But day by day I'm nearer
The land to which I go.

The foes who hate my Master
Have spread the path with snares,
In hope to stay my progress
And catch me unawares.
But ever to my spirit
New light and strength are given,
For never hosts of evil
Shall bar my road to heaven.

Far worse than all temptations
That lure me from without
Are grewsome clouds and terrors
That compass me about,
Dear Lord, thine eye can measure
The strife of fears within,
And thou canst guide me safely,
Unscathed by shame or sin.

With staff and shoon I journey,
And still before mine eyes
The Lord who goes before me
Hold up a radiant prize.
And though I faint and falter,
I yet shall overcome,
And win with saints and angels
The endless rest at home.

And sweet it is, when tired,
Because the way is long,
To pause beside a mile-stone
And lift a pilgrim's song;
For who shall lose his courage,
However steep the way,
Who, with the Lord to help him,
Fares onward day by day.
—Margaret E. Sangster.

A TURBULENT SPHERE.

CHRISTIANS who love tranquil scenes and whose nerves are unstrung by noise and disturbance, would find the life of a missionary a very trying experience. The following letter from Mrs. McKittrick, of the Balolo mission in Congoland, who has been staying for a few weeks at Lulunga, gives some idea of the kind of life a missionary must lead:

"The people here are very noisy and quarrelsome. Every night since I came there has some palaver. One evening two boys were fighting like madmen, knocking and cuffing each other about. I hastily threw some water over them, which somewhat cooled their ardor. To-night we are disturbed by the shrieks of a woman, apparently in great pain. To interfere in this case would be unwise; I can but sit and pray. Every now and again a succession of agonizing screams comes to my ear, and I have to put down my pencil; it is almost impossible to write. A few hours ago a crowd of excited men rushed at our man, Bompole, spears in hand, ready for any mad deed; they were enraged because he had desired a woman to stand away from the door. The first intimation I had that anything was wrong was a glimpse of Bompole, running as if for his life, pursued by these wild folk. A day never seems to pass without some disturbance of this sort. But though it is a little trying to the nerves, the experience is a blessed one, and brings to my mind and heart the assurance, more precious because more real than ever before, 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.' Believing and realizing this, it is easy to add, 'therefore I will not fear.' These same people come often to the chapel and behave very quietly; they express interest in what they hear, but, alas! their hearts are so hardened in sin that it seems almost impossible to touch them. Thank God! they are not too bad for the Lord Jesus to save; 'his blood can make the foulest clean.'"

L. H. Mullineaux, Oxford, Md. All the information you ask in your letter may be found on consulting McClintock & Strong's Biblical Encyclopædia.

H. A. Richardson, Washington, La. Was John the Baptist baptized or not, and if so by whom?

There is no record in the Bible or elsewhere concerning it.

C. M. Ege, Altoona, Pa. Where can I purchase the Bible (original text) with literal translation. Revised Version and revised edition?

We cannot tell.

Inquirer, New York City. Who hid some earrings under the ark, in Genesis? Mention chapter and verse.

See Genesis 35: 4.

Adonijah King, Providence, R. I. Can a minister of the Gospel consistently become a member of a secret society?

See answer in No. 29, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

B. W. Lewis, Dayton, O. What evil power tempted the angels to rebel?

Your question is as to the origin of evil, a problem that has puzzled the minds of philosophers and Christians for ages.

Rev. N. Dederer, Berea, Cuyahoga Co., O. Is there any Evangelical M. E. or Presbyterian minister in the city of Marseilles, France?

Yes. Write to the McAll Mission, 1624 Locust St., Philadelphia, for full information.

A Christian Mother, Wells, S. D. Is it right for my neighbors and unconverted children to gather together and sing Gospel hymns? Because they cannot sing as Christians, will it be counted as blasphemy against God?

See answer to H. V. R., on this page.

P. W. Greathatch, Atlanta, Ga. Is it right and biblical to lay a corner-stone for a church with imposing ceremonies on Sunday?

We prefer not to judge other people, but certainly if we were to be consulted as to the arrangements, we would select another day. Nothing involving manual labor should be done on the Lord's day.

P. F., Shamokin, Pa. What is the longest bridge in the world?

Lion Bridge, near Sangang, China. It is five and a quarter miles long, extending over an arm of the Yellow Sea and is supported by over 300 stone arches. The roadway is seventy feet above water, and is enclosed in an iron framework. On every pillar is a marble lion. It was built in 1796.

Subscriber, Apex, N. C. 1. Are Christians justified in praying for rain? 2. If A steals money from B, and is fully able to make restitution but does not, will God ever forgive the sin?

1. Yes; Elijah prayed for rain. In times of severe drought there can be nothing wrong in petitioning the Lord to relieve the parched land. 2. It is certainly A's duty to make restitution, but the consequences of a duty unfulfilled must be left with God. It is not for man to say what God will or will not do.

J. L. R., Philadelphia, Pa. Is it right for one who is striving to lead a Christian life to attend social gatherings, such as surprise parties, birthday parties, weddings, etc., where games and jokes are going on that have untrue answers, or to deliver a declamation that is not based upon a true foundation?

A Christian is supposed to be a light in the world, and therefore he should not exclude himself from the world. He must make it a matter of conscience how far he can share in social amusements without violating his principles. There are many amusements that are innocent. Even Jesus attended a wedding feast.

H. V. R., Cortland, N. Y. 1. Does the Presbyterian Church approach the nearest to the Scriptural idea of an Evangelical Church? 2. Should an unconverted person be allowed to sing in the choir? 3. Does God approve of our converting Catholics to some other denomination?

1. A Presbyterian would tell you so. A Baptist or an Episcopalian would as conscientiously and as sincerely give you a different answer. Pray to God for enlightenment, read

Chicago is attracting thousands of people just now who have various enterprises on hand in connection with the World's Fair, to be held in 1893, and of course it is a good place for business, owing to the extensive building operations at Jackson Park in connection with the construction of buildings for the Fair. The Erie Railroad Company, in anticipation of the heavy travel, which has already commenced, are running superb trains to all points in the West. Having a through road to Chicago, they run complete trains without change of cars. The Vestibule Limited (without extra price) is the luxury of modern travel, with parlor, dining, sleeping, and passenger coaches, forming one complete train from New York to Chicago.*

your new Testament and make up your mind. The matter is not so important as that more personal question of your own living union with Christ. 2. As such persons may join in the singing from a pew and even in responsive services, it appears illogical to exclude them from the choir, if they conduct themselves with decorum. 3. Without dogmatizing as to what God approves or does not approve, we should say in general terms that if you know any one who is living in error and you convince him of his error, you are doing a good work. Read James 5: 19, 20.

Fritz Oelze, Denison, Tex. Why is Africa, the oldest continent known to men, the farthest from civilization?

It seems to be a law that all nations, after reaching the apex, should degenerate. Rome, Greece, Persia, Egypt, Babylon, Peru and many others might be instanced in proof of this rule. Wherever a nation's civilization drifts to idols, its decay is assured, while those that preserve the true principles of religion alone endure. This is the only explanation to be furnished concerning Africa, which was once the focus of all civilization.

Alex. Kennel, Trenton, O. Why did Jesus use discourse that was hard for his disciples to understand?

We must believe that he knew the best means of conveying the lessons he wished to impress upon them and those who would be converted by their preaching. The disciples asked him the question you are now putting to us and you remember his answer. (Matt. 13: 10-12.) There were many things of importance which they were not prepared to understand in concrete form. These were given to them in figurative words and Jesus told them that the Holy Spirit, after his ascension, would bring all these things to their remembrance and would teach them. (John 14: 26.)

B. B. S., Greenwich, R. I. How much wine did Jesus make at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee? What was the vessel in which it was borne to the governor of the feast?

The only source of information is the Gospel narrative. The Evangelist estimated the capacity of each of the six waterpots at "two or three firkins." The firkin according to Smith's Dictionary of Classical Antiquities was equal to eight gallons and seven-eighths of a gallon. Thus the Evangelist's estimate gives us as the capacity of each jar somewhere between seventeen and twenty-six gallons. Nothing is told us about the vessel in which it was borne to the governor of the feast. It was probably a pitcher. There is an ancient picture on ivory in existence which represents the miracle. It is believed to have been painted not later than the seventh century. In this the jars are represented as wide stone jars as high as the breast of the man who is drawing from them. He holds in his hand a drinking-cup which apparently would contain about a pint. This, however, is only the conception of the miracle formed by an artist who lived about six hundred years after the miracle was performed.

J. A. McNabb, Houston, Tex. Is it right for a Christian to make use of public conveyances on Sunday in pursuit of Christian work? For instance, if I teach or have work some two miles away from home, and to walk in the hot sun is dangerous, am I right in making use of a street car? Is it just as much of a violation of the Sabbath, where a Christian works or uses his horses on Sunday to attend public worship, as if he had worked himself?

Your question recalls the story of an eccentric minister, whose horse, as he used to say, always observed the Jewish Sabbath while he himself kept the Christian Sabbath. He never allowed it to go out on Saturday but always on Sunday. Thus he gave the animal one day's rest out of the seven. While Sunday travelling should be avoided, it is impossible to lay down any fixed rules on this point. There are many places in this country that would be without the Gospel, on account of the wide territory covered by the parishes, unless pastor or people, or sometimes both, used conveyances to reach the place of worship. Hundreds of churches all over the land recognize this, and supply sheds for the wagons and horses' accommodation, while their owners are listening to the service. It would unquestionably be a sin to use conveyances on the Sabbath, except in such cases, and in these they are used in the service and for the glory of God.

GOD IN BUSINESS.

A REMARKABLE RECORD OF DIVINE HELPS AND DELIVERANCES TO CHRISTIAN BUSINESS MEN.

This book is a record of God's dealings with His people in business. The author begins with personal testimony. Then follows the experience of more than 100 of God's people who desire to acknowledge that they were helped by Him in business. * * * The incidents here recorded are of such a wonderful character that it is not an easy matter to lay down the book until every page is perused. A short sketch of the life of John S. Creed, of Brooklyn, is a most wonderful record of divine guidance and help. Here then is testimony that there is a God-force waiting to be used in all prayer and faith for all our affairs. It is a truth that all God's people need more and more to study. —Presbyterian Messenger (London).

This is a well-intended book, and one moreover, that is built on such a foundation that it is impossible to shake it. * * * If young business men will read they may learn from it a lesson that may prove of great commercial value. —Methodist Times (London).

THE TREVES IDOLATRY.

The Worship of the Holy Coat by Crowds of Poor Ignorant, Deluded Catholics.

It is hardly possible that the civilized Christian world in this nineteenth century could conceive of a more absurd and shameless spectacle than that now to be witnessed in the superstitious adoration of the "Holy Coat" at Treves, in France. It is stated that when two or more pilgrims happened to meet in the latter days of the Roman Empire, they laughed in each others faces at the evident absurdity of the superstitions which were then called religion. Catholic priests are generally well educated and much jesuitical laughter is supposably indulged in each other's faces whenever this alleged sacred garment is mentioned.

August last will be a memorable month for those Roman Catholics who believe in the genuineness of this relic as being the seamless coat worn by our Lord at the time of the Crucifixion, and for which the Roman soldiers cast lots. The coat is only exhibited occasionally, the last time being in 1844, when it was exhibited from August 18 till October 6, during which time over 1,250,000 pilgrims passed it.

Unfortunately for relic-worshippers, there are fifteen other coats which claim to be the "seamless coat." The one at Argenteuil, a village near Paris, has just been referred to the Sacred Congregation of Rites for the settlement of the dispute between it and the one at Treves, and they have decided that Treves possesses the seamless coat, while the Argenteuil one is the coat Christ wore "as a boy!"

The Catholic authorities issued minute directions to be observed by the pilgrims. In this document it is stated that: "The Bishop has granted the inhabitants of Treves and its environs, and all strangers and pilgrims visiting the city, a dispensation from the command of abstinence, for the whole duration of the exhibition."

On Wednesday, August 19, the Holy Coat was taken from the treasury of the Cathedral, at Treves, and placed before the high altar under the purple velvet baldachin fringed with gold, the whole enclosed in a shrine surmounted by an immense cross, illuminated with gas. At eight o'clock on Thursday the Cathedral was crowded, and at nine the procession entered. During twelve hours 25,000 pilgrims passed before the relic, all inhabitants of the city. Strangers were first admitted on Friday, and on this first day the number of pilgrims was 41,000.

The whole town of Treves was converted into a gigantic fair. Pilgrims, on debarking from the train, were marshalled in processional order by the priests who had charge of them, and marched through the streets to the cathedral, attended by acolytes carrying banners and emblems, and chanting the Litany of the Holy Coat. This marching and chanting continued incessantly from three or four o'clock in the morning till midnight. The poorer pilgrims carried their own baggage. Luther in his "Warning to his dear Germans," edited by his friend, Ph. Melancthon, in 1546, says about the exhibitions of the Holy Coat in 1531 and 1545: "How they run to the pilgrimages! What fables have the Popes, bishops, and monks spread abroad or silently approved, causing deluded folk to lose their money! Think only of the trickery at Treves with Christ's Coat. What a fair has the evil one held there, and how many false miracles has he sold!"

In 1310 a solemn exhibition of the Holy Coat took place in Treves. Napoleon I. permitted it, but he expressly forbade miracles to be performed.

The next exposition of the Coat in 1844 aroused the opposition of many, among others a Roman Catholic priest named Johann Ronge, who started an animated controversy. Ronge published an essay, addressed to the Archbishop of Treves, ridiculing the forthcoming exhibition of the relic as pandering to the morbid susceptibilities of the ignorant people of Europe. The publication roused a perfect storm among the priesthood and was not without effect upon the better classes among the intending pilgrims. As a consequence, Ronge was excommunicated. The Coat has been repeatedly denounced since then, even by eminent Catholics, but the latest demonstration shows that superstition created by cunning is still strong in the church of Rome.

Of course the priests made a good harvest off this superstitious throng, which had come to gaze at a garment so battered that it had to be gummed together. Liberal offerings were made the bulk of which goes to the Pope. It was a grand spectacle for Treves, so grand that the other alleged Holy Coat at Argenteuil was dragged to light and put on exhibition with the purpose of attracting some of the spoil thither, but Argenteuil did not fare so sumptuously as Treves, where the pilgrims yielded up all their money and consented to sleep in barns, tanneries, sheds and stock-houses, herded like cattle.

The so-called attestations of the genuineness of the coat were not given until twelve hundred years after the Crucifixion, and the best antiquarians of all creeds laugh at the claim of genuineness, which is on a par with the other bogus relics palmed off on a credulous world by the Romish church for centuries. Professor Winschied of Leipsic, one of the leading German Catholics has announced his conversion to Protestantism. The Professor attributes the change in his religious views to his disbelief in the authenticity of the "Holy Coat" and to his conscientious scruples against supporting a church that would lend its sanction to such a shameless piece of charlatanism.

AN AVOWAL AT A MISSION.

FUNDS for the support of a certain mission well-known to the writer, were running very low. The Evangelist in charge was discouraged. Wealthy Christian people to whom he applied for help, did not seem to think much of his work. He wondered whether he ought not to accept the circumstances as an indication "Continual dropping wears away the stone."

The continual breaking of lamp-chimneys costs a good deal in the course of a year.

You can stop it. Get Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass." You will have no more trouble with breaking from heat. You will have clear glass instead of misty; fine instead of rough; right shape instead of wrong; and uniform, one the same as another.

You will pay a nickel a chimney more; and your dealer will gain in good-will what he loses in trade; he will widen his trade by better service.

that God's will was that the mission should be closed. That night he received a letter from a man who wrote: "I had made up a mad mind to put an end to my existence, as I felt despised by everyone, hungry and unsheltered. Thus I was for three days and nights without hope of work, and without a friend. Spiritually blind as I was, God directed my footsteps to you. You gave me hope, and spoke to me as a friend. You saved me from the fate of suicide. You gave me food and lodgings. You gave me clothes, for I was in rags, and by much exertion got me back my employment. In fact, you have raised me out of the gutter, and saved me from death here, and hell hereafter. My God will thank and repay you for saving a soul that he died to save, and who would have been lost but for you."

MY PRAYER.

(For The Christian Herald.)

ASK not, Father, that thro' life,
My path might e'er be bright;
I only ask that midst the strife,
Thou 'lt guide my steps aright.

I ask not that my life from care,
And sorrow, might be free;
I only ask for grace to bear,
Whate'er Thou sendest me.

I ask not that I may be crowned,
With joy, and length of days;
But that I may be ever found
In truth and wisdom's ways.

Nor crave I for some mission grand,
Nor nobler work I ask;
But strength to do, with helping hand,
Thine own appointed task. —A. C.

Breakfast Vanities

BY MRS. DEARBORN,

Principal Boston Cooking School.

Mix and sift together 1 pint pastry flour,  $\frac{1}{2}$  tea sp. salt and 1 heaping tea sp. Cleveland's Baking Powder. Mix to a stiff dough with milk, using only sufficient to make it stiff enough to roll.

Toss out on a slightly floured board, roll out very thin, cut into small squares with a sharp knife or pastry wheel and drop into boiling lard.

Shake the kettle gently to facilitate their rising, and when well puffed up turn them and brown the other side. Drain on paper. They should be cooked in fat hot enough to brown a piece of bread while counting sixty, and are quite hollow when cooked. Serve with maple syrup if liked.—(Copyright, 1891.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Pure crystal cream of tartar and soda make a perfectly wholesome leaven. There is no other leavening power in Cleveland's Baking Powder.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC R.R. runs through Car vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

THE OLDEST OF CITIES.

Damascus, the Beautiful, Called by Mohammed "the Paradise on Earth."

I WILL not enter thy gates," exclaimed Mohammed, as he stood at the head of his victorious followers before Damascus, and marvelled at its loveliness. "My paradise is reserved for the next world." And truly the traveler who sees Damascus for the first time is minded to agree with the Moslem prophet, for nowhere can a more beautiful scene be imagined. On either side of the city founded by Uz, the son of Aram, flow the rivers Abana and Pharpar, now known as the Barrada and Awaj, whose perpetual ripple, and rush, and generous irrigation of the valley in which the city lies explains the extraordinary fertility of this earthly Eden.

Travelers have called Damascus the "Gem of the Orient" because it is squarely set amid orchards whose green is in delightful contrast with the umber of the horizon that surrounds it. From its turrets there is a view on every hand of unapproachable grandeur. Huge walls of gray rock, half-hidden by wreathed clouds like pinnacles of mist, stand sentinel to guard its treasures, while Hermon, Lebanon, and other giants of the Syrian mountain range, sweep down to the valley, their summits crowned with snow, their sides with verdure and their feet hidden amid olive groves and orchards. Again, turning around to look over the city itself, one sees a strange sight shimmering in the sun: a wilderness of flat-roofed, whitish-brown houses, studded with mosques and minarets and towers, with here and there an arch or a monument.

There is much in and around Damascus to attract the Christian traveler in the East. Much besides mere physical loveliness, for no city in the world, saving only Jerusalem itself, has so varied and eventful a history. One wonders which side Mohammed viewed the city from when he caught his first glimpse of those walls that were thereafter to loat the Crescent through the long centuries till now. On the west are canals and rivers; on the south groves; northward are the mountains, while on the east the approach seems easier, or there are houses, white in the sun, even outside the walls. Besides, on the east is the Christian quarter, the famous Eastern Gate, and the cemeteries. Tradition says the prophet approached Damascus from the northeast, and if so he may have paused before this ancient gateway.

In the illustration on this page is seen the Eastern Gate, which the Damascenes call the Bab-Charka, and which opens into "the street called Straight," a thoroughfare that

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY: ALEPH, THE CHALDEAN;

OR, THE MESSIAH AS SEEN FROM ALEXANDRIA, WILL BEGIN NEXT WEEK IN

 Declared by leading critics to be equal to "Ben Hur."

once passed right through the heart of the city to the further side. One can readily see on the crumbling wall where time has effaced much of its architectural beauties. The closed portal was a gate of Roman construction, and was walled up eight hundred years ago, the entrance now used having then been merely one of the side arches of the older Roman gateway. From the top of the tower a picture custom for the Damascenes to sit in these mid-air perches and watch the street below. From the top of the Bab-Charka Gate can be seen the Christian quarter that was burned during the great persecution of 1860 when over 20,000 Christians were killed in the Syrian cities. Five thousand were butchered in Damascus alone, within a few days, and not a single Christian dwelling was left un-way of Damascus with hundreds of bazaars like those of Broussa and Constantinople, rich in offerings of pearls, turquoises, diamonds, silks, damask cloths and rare swords of marvellous temper and flexibility, wrought by the cunning process known only to the craftsmen of that city. Even now the bazaars are the handsomest in the East. The shops are very small and the proprietors are all eager to sell. Sometimes the seller is a veiled woman, but generally a bearded Mussulman. Entering one of these little places, you are invited to sit down and drink a cup of coffee and while you sip, the goods are shown. It may very likely happen that, just as you are closing the bargain, a voice will sing shrilly from a neighboring minaret and the merchant will drop his wares and respond to the call to prayer. His supplication ended, he resumes the dickering and feels himself warranted in driving a keener bargain than ever.

Many places of Biblical and historic interest are pointed out as we walk along the "Street called Straight," or diverge a little on either side of that thoroughfare. There is the window through which St. Paul escaped from the city, as described in II Cor. 11:33, ("and through a window was I let down by the wall and escaped.") There seems to be no question as to the actual identity of the spot. Several years ago the window was ordered by the Moslem owner of the house to be filled up with brick and closed. Other points of interest are the houses of Judas and Naaman, (the latter being now a leper hospital) and the tomb of George the porter, who assisted Paul in his escape, which lies not far from the Christian cemetery. If we look along the walls we find houses there just as they were in Bible days. The house of Ananias the high priest (not the man who was stricken for his falsehood) is also to be seen, with many other places connected with Paul's famous visit.

During his recent tour in the Holy Land, Rev. Dr. Talmage, editor of this journal, visited Damascus and he has described that city both in his sermons and writings. He has spoken of its groves, its mosques, its gates and the innumerable wars that have raged within and about its walls since its conquest by King David of Israel. Tradition, history and Biblical

THE GATE OF THE "STREET CALLED STRAIGHT," OR "BAB CHARKA" GATE, DAMASCUS.
 (From a photograph secured by Dr. Talmage in the Holy Land.)

turesque view is gained that amply rewards the climber. You may look thence along the "Street called Straight," by which St. Paul entered Damascus. In the Apostle's time the street was fully a hundred feet wide, and was divided by three rows of columns, corresponding to the triple row of arches at the Eastern Gate; but these arches have now been filled up and the side paths largely discontinued. The houses on either side are in some places so close that the inmates might almost shake hands across the narrow passageway. In some of the dwellings the windows jut outside from the walls, and it is injured. Many escaped to the mountains. A fate worse than death befell the women who were saved for a life of slavery. The story of this fateful massacre and of Abd-el-Kader's brave championship of the Christians, has already been fully told in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Since those days peace has reigned in Damascus, but it has been a forced peace; for the 25,000 Christians who now live there are only saved from the violence of Moslem malice by the wholesome fear of retaliation by the European Powers.

"The Street called Straight" has originally been a great commercial highway, the Broad-association are encountered everywhere, amid the tombs, wells and temples. One of the most interesting of the Moslem traditions is that which describes the creation of man. There is a hill beside one of the city gates—the nearest to Jerusalem—where, says the tradition, God consulted Mohammed concerning the expediency of making a mortal creature. Mohammed approving the plan, the creation of our first parents followed, both being made out of the red sand of which the hill in question is composed. This myth has survived the centuries, and is to-day told by Moslem parents to their children.

THE TABERNACLE PULPIT

WHAT WERE YOU MADE FOR?

Dr. Talmage's Latest Sunday Morning Sermon: "To this end was I born." John 18:37.

AFTER Pilate had suicided, tradition says that his body was thrown into the Tiber, and such storms ensued on and about that river that his body was taken out and thrown into the Rhone, and similar disturbances swept that river and its banks. Then the body was taken out and removed to Lausanne, and put in a deeper pool which immediately became the centre of similar atmospheric and aqueous disturbances. Though these are fanciful and false traditions they show the execration with which the world looked upon Pilate. It was before this man when he was in full life and power that Christ was arraigned as in a court of Oyer and Terminer. Pilate said to his prisoner: "art thou a King, then?" and Jesus answered: "to this end was I born." Sure enough, although all earth and hell arose to keep him down, he is to-day empalaced, enthroned and coroneted king of earth and king of heaven. "To this end was I born." That is what he came for, and that was what he accomplished.

By the time a child reaches ten years of age the parents begin to discover that child's destiny; but by the time he or she reaches fifteen years of age, the question is on the child's lips: "What am I to be? What am I going to do? What was I made for?" It is a sensible and righteous question, and the youth ought to keep on asking it until it is so fully answered that the young man, or the young woman can say with as much truth as its author, though on a less expansive scale: "to this end was I born."

There is too much divine skill shown in the physical, mental and moral constitution of the ordinary human being to suppose that he was constructed without any divine purpose. If you take me out on some vast plain and show me a pillared temple surmounted by a dome like St. Peter's, and having a floor of precious stones, and arches that must have taxed the brain of the greatest draughtsman to design, and walls scrolled and niched and paneled and wainscotted and painted, and I should ask you what this building was put up for, and you answered: "for nothing at all," how could I believe you? And it is impossible for me to believe that any ordinary human being who has in his muscular, nervous and cerebral organization more wonders than Christopher Wren lifted in St. Paul's, or Phidias ever chiseled on the Acropolis, and built in such a way that it shall last long after St. Paul's Cathedral is as much a ruin as the Parthenon—that such a being was constructed for no purpose, and to execute no mission, and without any divine intention toward some end. The object of this sermon is to help you to find out what you are made for, and help you find your sphere, and assist you in to that condition where you can say with certainty and emphasis and enthusiasm and triumph: "to this end was I born."

First, I discharge you from all responsibility for most of your environments. You are not responsible for your parentage, or grand-parentage. You are not responsible for any of the cranks that may have lived in your ancestral line, and who a hundred years before you were born may have lived a style of life that more or less affects you to-day. You are not responsible for the fact that your temperament is sanguine, or melancholic, or bilious, or lymphatic, or nervous. Neither are you responsible for the place of your nativity, whether among the granite hills of New England, or the cotton plantations of Louisiana, or on the banks of the Clyde, or the Dnieper, or the Shannon, or the Seine. Neither are you responsible for the religion taught in your father's house, or the irreligion. Do not bother yourself about what you cannot help, or about circumstances that you did not decree. Take things as they are, and decide the question so that you shall be able safely to say: "to this end was I born." How will you decide it? By direct application to the only Being in the universe who is competent to tell you—the Lord Almighty. Do you know the reason why he is the only one who can tell? Because he can see everything between your cradle and your grave, though the grave be eighty years off. And besides that, he is the only being who can see what has been happening for the last five hundred years in your ancestral line, and for thousands of years clear back to Adam, and there is not one person in all that ancestral line of six thousand years but has somehow affected your character, and even old Adam himself will sometimes turn up in your disposition. The only Being who can take all things that pertain to you into consideration is God, and he is the one you can ask. Life is so short we have no time to experiment with occupations and professions. The reason we have so many dead failures is that parents decide for children what they shall do, or children themselves, wrought on by some whim or fancy, decide for themselves without any imploration of divine guidance. So we have now in pulpits men making sermons who ought to be in blacksmith shops making ploughshares, and we have in the law those who instead of ruining the cases of their clients ought to be pounding shoe lasts, and doctors who are the worst hindrances to their patients' convalescence, and artists trying to paint landscapes who ought to be whitewashing board fences. While there are others making bricks who ought to be remodeling constitutions, or shoving planes who ought to be transforming literatures. Ask God about what worldly business you shall undertake until you are so positive you can in earnestness smite your hand on your plough handle, or your carpenter's bench, or your Blackstone's Commentaries, or your medical dictionary, or your Doctor Dick's Didactic Theology, saying: "for this end was I born." There are children who early develop natural affinities for certain styles of work. When the father of the astronomer Forbes was going to London, he asked his children what present he should bring each one of them. The boy who was to be an astronomer, cried out, "bring me a telescope!" And there are children whom you find all by themselves drawing on their slates, or on paper, ships or houses or birds, and you know they are to be draughtsmen or artists of some kind. And you find others ciphering out difficult problems with rare interest and success, and you know they are to be mathematicians. And others making wheels and strange contrivances, and you know they are going to be machinists. And others are found experimenting with hoe and plough and sickle, and you know they will be farmers. And others are always swapping jack-knives or balls or bats and making something by the bargain, and they are going to be merchants. When Abbe de Rance had so advanced in studying Greek that he could translate Anacreon at twelve years of age, there was no doubt left that he was intended for a scholar. But in almost every lad there comes a time when he does not know what he was made for, and his parents do not know, and it is a crisis that God only can decide. Then there are those born for some especial work, and their fitness does not develop until quite late. When Philip Doddridge, whose sermons and books have harvested uncounted souls for glory, began to study the ministry, Dr. Calamy, one of the wisest and best men, advised him to turn his thoughts to some other work. Isaac Barrow, the eminent clergyman and Christian scientist—his books standard now though he has been dead over two hundred years—was the disheartenment of his father who used to say that if it pleased God to take any of his children away he hoped it might be his son Isaac. So some of those who have been characterized for their stupidity in boyhood or girlhood, have turned out the mightiest benefactors or benefactresses of the human race. These things being so, am I not right in saying that in many cases God only knows what is the most appropriate thing for you to do, and he is the one to ask. And let all parents, and all schools, and all universities, and all colleges recognize this, and a large number of those who spent their best years in stumbling about among businesses and occupations, now trying this and now trying that, and failing in all, would be able to go ahead with a definite, decided and tremendous purpose, saying, "to this end was I born."

But my subject now mounts into the momentous. Let me say that you are made for usefulness and heaven. I judge this from the way you are built. You go into a shop where there is only one wheel turning and that by a workman's foot on a treadle, and you say to yourself: "here is something good being done, yet on a small scale;" but if you go into a factory covering many acres, and you find thousands of bands pulling on thousands of wheels, and shuttles flying, and the whole scene bewildering with activities, driven by water, or steam, or electric power, you conclude that the factory was put up to do great work and on a vast scale. Now, I look at you, and if I should find that you had only one faculty of body, only one muscle, only one nerve, if you could see but could not hear, or could hear and not see, if you had the use of only one foot or one hand, and, as to your higher nature, if you had only one mental faculty, and you had memory but no judgment, or judgment but no will, and if you had a soul with only one capacity, I would say not much is expected of you. But stand up, oh man, and let me look you squarely in the face. Eyes capable of seeing everything. Ears capable of hearing everything. Hands capable of grasping everything. Mind with more wheels than any factory ever turned, more power than Corliss engine ever moved. A soul that will outlive all the universe except heaven, and would outlive all heaven if the life of other immortals were a moment short of the eternal. Now, what has the world a right to expect of you? What has God a right to demand of you? God is the greatest of economists in the universe, and he makes nothing uselessly, and for what purpose did he build your body, mind and soul as they are built? There are only two beings in the universe who can answer that question. The angels do not know. The schools do not know. Your kindred cannot certainly know. God knows, and you ought to know. A factory running at an expense of $500,000 a year, and turning out goods worth seventy cents a year would not be such an incongruity as you, oh man, with such semi-infinite equipment doing nothing, or next to nothing, in the way of usefulness. "What shall I do?" you ask. My brethren, my sisters, do not ask me. Ask God. There's some path of Christian usefulness open. It may be a rough path, or it may be a smooth path, a long path or a short path. It may be on a mount of conspicuity, or in a valley unobserved, but it is a path on which you can start with such faith and such satisfaction and such certainty that you can cry out in the face of earth and hell and heaven: "to this end was I born." Do not wait for extraordinary qualifications. Philip the Conqueror gained his greatest victories seated on a mule, and if you wait for some caparisoned Bucephalus to ride into the conflict you will never get into the world-wide fight at all. Samson slew the Lord's enemies with the jawbone of the stupidest beast created. Shamgar slew six hundred of the Lord's enemies with an ox-goad. Under God, spittle cured the blind man's eyes in the New Testament story. Take all the faculty you have and say: "O Lord! Here is what I have, show me the field and back me up by omnipotent power. Anywhere, anyhow, any time for God." Two men riding on horseback came to a trough to water the horses. While the horses were drinking one of the men said to the other a few words about the value of the soul, and then they rode away, and in opposite directions. But the words uttered were the salvation of the one to whom they were uttered, and he became the Rev. Mr. Champion, one of the most distinguished missionaries in heathen lands; for years wondering who did for him the Christian kindness, and not finding out until in a bundle of books sent him to Africa he found the biography of Brainerd Taylor and a picture of him, and the missionary recognized the face in that book as the man who, at the watering trough for horses, had said the thing that saved his soul. What opportunities you have had in the past! What opportunities you have now! What opportunities you will have in the days to come! Put on your hat, oh woman, this afternoon, and go in and comfort that young mother who lost her babe last summer. Put on your hat, oh man, and go over and see that merchant who was compelled yesterday to make an assignment, and tell him of the everlasting riches remaining for all those who serve the Lord. Can you sing? Go and sing for that man who cannot get well, and you will help him into heaven. Let it be your brain, your tongue, your eyes, your ears, your heart, your lungs, your hands, your feet, your body, your mind, your soul, your life, your death, your time, your eternity for God, feeling in your soul: "to this end was I born." It may be helpful to some if I recite my own experience in this regard. I started for the law without asking any divine direction. I consulted my own tastes. I liked lawyers and court rooms and judges and juries, and I reveled in hearing the Frelinghuysens and the Bradleys of the New Jersey bar, and as assistant of the County Clerk, at sixteen years of age, I searched titles, naturalized foreigners, recorded deeds, received the confession of judgments, swore witnesses and juries and grand juries. But after a while I felt a call to the Gospel ministry and entered it, and I felt some satisfaction in the work. But one summer, when I was resting at Sharon Springs, and while seated in the park of that village, I said to myself, "if I have an especial work to do in the world I ought to find it out now," and with that determination I prayed as I had never before prayed, and got the divine direction, and wrote it down in my memorandum book, and I saw my life-work then as plainly as I see it now. Do not be satisfied with general directions. Get specific directions. Do not shoot at random. Take aim and fire. concentrate. Napoleon's success in battle came from his theory of breaking through the enemy's ranks at one point, not trying to meet the whole line of the enemy's force by a similar force. One reason why he lost Waterloo was because he did not work his usual theory, and spread his force out over a wide range. Oh Christian, man, oh Christian woman, break through somewhere. Not a general engagement for God but a particular engagement, and made in answer to prayer. If there are sixteen hundred million people in the world, then there are sixteen hundred million different missions to fulfil, different styles of work to do, different orbits in which to revolve, and if you do not get the divine direction there are at least fifteen hundred and ninety-nine million possibilities at you will make a mistake. On your knees before God get the matter settled so that you can firmly say: "to this end was I born."

And now I come to the climacteric consideration. As near as I can tell, you were built for a happy eternity, all the disasters which have happened to your nature to be overcome by the blood of the Lamb if you will heartily accept that Christly arrangement. We are all rejoiced at the increase in human longevity. People live, as near as I can observe, about ten years longer than they used to. The modern doctors do not bleed their patients on all occasions as did the former doctors. In those times if a man had fever, they bled him, if he had consumption they bled him, if he had rheumatism they bled him, and if they could not make out exactly what was the matter they bled him. Olden time phlebotomy was death's coadjutor. All this has changed. From the way I see people skipping about at eighty years of age, I conclude that life insurance companies will have to change their table of risks and charge a man no more premium at seventy than they used to do when he was sixty, and no more premium at fifty than when he was forty. By the advancement of medical science and the wider acquaintance with the laws of health, and the fact that people know better how to take care of themselves, human life is prolonged. But do you realize what, after all, is the brevity of our earthly state? In the times when people lived seven and eight hundred years, the patriarch Jacob said that his years were few. Looking at the life of the youngest person in this assembly and supposing he lived to be a nonagenarian, how short the time and soon gone, while banked up in front of us is an eternity so vast that arithmetic has not figures enough to express its length, or breadth, or depth, or height. For a happy eternity you were born unless you run yourself against the divine intentions. If standing in your presence, my eye should fall upon the feeblest soul here as that soul will appear when the world lets it up, and heaven entrances it, I suppose I would be so overpowered that I should drop down as one dead. You have examined the family Bible and explored the family records, and you may have daguerrotypes of some of the kindred of previous generations, you have had photographs taken of what you were in boyhood or girlhood, and what you were ten years later, and it is very interesting to any one to be able to look back upon pictures of what he was ten, or twenty or thirty years ago; but have you ever had a picture taken of what you may be and what you will be if you seek after God and feel the Spirit's regenerating power? Where shall I plant the camera to take the picture? I plant it on this platform. I direct it toward you. Sit still or stand still while I take the picture. It shall be an instantaneous picture. There! I have it. It is done. You can see the picture in its imperfect state, and get some idea of what it will be when thoroughly developed. There is your resurrected body, so brilliant that the noonday sun is a patch of midnight compared with it. There is your soul, so pure that all the forces of diabolism could not spot it with an imperfection. A brow that shall never throb with pain. You are young again, though you died of decrepitude. You are well again though you coughed or shivered yourself into the tomb. Your every-day associates are the apostles and prophets and martyrs, and most exalted souls, masculine and feminine, of all the centuries. The archangel to you no embarrassment. God himself your present and everlasting joy. That is an instantaneous picture of what you may be, and what I am sure some of you will be. If you realize that it is an imperfect picture, my apology is what the apostle John said: "it doth not yet appear what we shall be." "To this end was I born." If I did not think so I would be overwhelmed with melancholy. The world does very well for a little while, eighty, or a hundred or a hundred and fifty years, and I think that human longevity may yet be improved up to that prolongation, for now there is so little room between our cradle and our grave we cannot accomplish much, but who would want to dwell in this world for all eternity! Some think this earth will finally be turned into a heaven. Perhaps it may, but it would have to undergo radical repairs, and through eliminations and evolutions and revolutions and transformations infinite, to make it desirable for eternal residence. All the east winds would have to become west winds, and all the winters changed to spring-tides, and the volcanoes extinguished, and the epidemics forbidden entrance, and the world so fixed up that I think it would take more to repair this old world than to make an entirely new one. But I must say I do not care where heaven is if we can only get there, whether a gardenized America, or an emparadised Europe, or a world central to the whole universe. "To this end was I born."

In the 17th century, all Europe was threatened with a wave of Asiatic barbarism and Vienna was especially besieged. The king and his court had fled and nothing could save the city from being overwhelmed unless the king of Poland, John Sobieski, to whom they had sent for help, should with his army come down for the relief, and from every roof and tower the inhabitants of Vienna watched and waited and hoped until on the morning of September 11, the rising sun threw an unusual and unparalleled brilliancy. It was the reflection on the swords and shields and helmets of John Sobieski and his army coming down over the hills to the rescue, and that day, not only Vienna, but Europe, was saved. And see you not, Oh ye souls, besieged with sin and sorrow, that light breaks in, the swords and the shields and the helmets of divine rescue bathed in the rising sun of heavenly deliverance? Let everything else go rather than let heaven go. What a strange thing it must be to feel one's self born to an earthly crown, but you have been born for a throne on which you may reign after the last monarch of all the earth shall have gone to dust. I invite you to start now for your own coronation, to come in and take the title deeds to your everlasting inheritance. Through an impassioned prayer take heaven and all of its raptures. What a poor farthing is all that this world can offer you compared with pardon here and life immortal beyond the stars, unless this side of them, there be a place large enough and beautiful enough and grand enough for all the ransomed. Wherever it be, in what world, whether near by or far away, in this or some other constellation, hail home of light and love and blessedness! Through the atoning mercy of Christ, may we all get there!

A MISSIONARY HEALER.

The Career of Dr. W. J. Hall, who is Going to Corea as a Medical Missionary.

OUR readers will be glad to have the portrait and a few personal facts concerning the devoted man, whose love for the Saviour, yearning for the souls of the heathen, and pity for the sick and suffering among them is leading him to leave country and friends and go out to far distant Corea as a medical missionary.

W. J. Hall is a Canadian by birth. He first saw the light at Brockville, Ont., Jan. 16, 1860. He acquired the rudiments of education at the school of that town, assisting his father on his farm as he had opportunity. Subsequently he entered the High School at Athens where he first engaged in the glorious work of soul-winning. Two years before entering that institution he gave his heart to the Saviour and had joined the Methodist Church. God blessed the boy's testimony in the school to the conversion of several of the students, two of whom are now on their way to missionary labor in China.

After graduating, the young man taught school for a time and in the Fall of 1885, entered Queen's University at Kingston. Here it was that, while pursuing his studies, the needs of the heathen first presented themselves to his mind as a call to him for personal service.

REV. W. J. HALL, M.D.

He committed the matter in prayer to God and received the assurance in his heart that the offer of himself for the work was accepted. In 1887 he attended Mr. Moody's Conference for Bible Study. There he met Dr. George D. Dowkontt of New York, the eminent leader in medical mission work, whose self-sacrificing efforts have been so wonderfully blessed to the heathen both at home and abroad. Mr. Hall fell under the potent spell of Dr. Dowkontt's enthusiasm, and under his advice determined to extend his qualifications for usefulness by acquiring a medical education. He was received into the International Medical Institute in New York, of which Dr. Dowkontt is Director. He received his medical diploma from Bellevue Hospital in 1889, and since then he has been laboring among the poor in the tenement houses of New York.

In New York, too, Dr. Hall made the acquaintance of Dr. Stone the philanthropic pastor of Asbury Church, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on June 17. Dr. Stone's missionary experience in India qualified him to be a valuable counsellor to the young man and they became warm friends. Under Dr. Stone's influence the Methodist Episcopal Church appointed Dr. Hall its first Medical Missionary in New York and gave him control of three dispensaries in various parts of the city, where the poor to the number of thousands have during the past year received healing for their bodies and spiritual help for their souls. Though this work has been sufficient for Dr. Hall, he has added to it the charge of Madison Street Chapel, which is one of the circuits of missions under the pastorate of Rev. Stephen Merritt, and there Dr. Hall has been blessed in a remarkable degree. The church has now three times the number of members it had when he took charge of it.

Dr. Hall sails about the close of November for his sphere of labor in Corea, the peninsula stretching from the north-eastern borders of China in the direction of Japan. It contains about thirteen million people who until about ten years ago were ignorant of pure gospel truth. Letters for Dr. Hall will reach him if addressed to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD 92 and 96 Bible House, New York.

THE FOOT-WASHING.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 13: 1-17. Golden Text, Phil. 2: 5.

LET this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." It is the will of God that we should be conformed to the image of his Son. Is it our will also? Have we really counted the cost, and are we one with the will of God concerning us? If so we must have ceased to struggle against, or to murmur against, any of the means which he may use, in his wise providence, to bring about this purpose.

The whole tenor of the life of Jesus ran counter to the received ideas of man.

Man Prides Himself

on what he is, and what he has, his birth, his pedigree, his physical strength, his mental power, his high education, his broad estate, his successful business, his large fortune, his splendid house and grounds, or, it may be even on his power to sin! Jesus made no boast, he prided himself on nothing earthly, and attributed his divine power and wisdom invariably to his Father. "Let this mind be in you."

"What," says an ordinary average Christian of this day, "am I to take credit to myself for nothing? If I am born of an ancient and distinguished family, am I in no way to consider myself, superior to those who are low born?" What saith the Scripture? "Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted, but the rich in that he is made low, because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away." (James 1: 9, 10.) But how many rich men, who have lost the means to maintain their position do we find rejoicing that they are made low? Are there not many more who, with an obstinate tenacity hold on to their supposed position, and sacrifice everything to keep up appearances; and are not many of these claiming to be Christians? Alas this is not the mind which was in Christ Jesus! He being in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself taking the form of a servant. (Phil. 2: 6, R. V.) O how hard it is for human nature to die, for our natural man to surrender and own that even "its goodness is as the flower of the field" which withereth and fadeth because the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it! (Isa. 40: 6, 7.) But "it is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master and the servant as his Lord." If Jesus Christ could afford to empty himself and take on him the form of a servant, and be made in the likeness of men, it ill becomes us to complain if he calls upon us to empty ourselves that thereby we may be conformed to the likeness of Christ who is the Son of God.

It was before the feast of the Passover. "Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father," but neither the apprehension of his coming suffering and shame, nor yet the anticipation of his coming glory, distracted him from the work which lay nearest his heart,

The Education of his Disciples.

"Having loved his own which were in the world he loved them unto the end." This love was not reciprocated: an hour or two later "they all forsook him and fled." The Passover Supper was at an end, and what that feeding on the sacrificed Lamb must have been to him who was its Antitype, who can tell? Many things were astir. The powers of light and darkness were on the alert. Satan had succeeded in putting into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him, and the dark plot was being brewed in which men and devils took part against the Son of God. Meanwhile, "Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands," rose from supper to take the office of a slave! "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." There is no accident in the order in which words occur in the Holy Scriptures.

Just when Jesus knew that all power was given unto him both in heaven and in earth he performed the humblest office and took the lowest place! The disciples were still reclining at the supper table, and Jesus rose to minister to them! He "laid aside his garments," so soon to be parted among the soldiers who crucified him, and "took a towel and girded himself and poured water in a basin and began to wash his disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded." "The Son of man came, not to be ministered unto but to minister and to give his life a ransom for many."

There is nothing noble in self assertion; it is vulgar and offensive but there is in self abnegation a superiority which humbles those who see it. The mute action touched most the forward, self-assertive Peter, he must have felt, "In my Master's place I could not have done that, I have wanted to be the greatest, and he is acting as though he were the least." Again and again this lesson had been taught in the Word, now it was by

A Never-to-be-forgotten Example.

Peter could not endure it; when his turn came, and the lowly Master was about to minister thus to him, "Peter said unto him, thou shalt never wash my feet." "If I wash thee not, thou has no part with me." Peter little knew now much the very spirit in which he was then speaking needed cleansing, how much there was in it of the heroism of the flesh, and how little of the listening spirit which waits to know and to imbibe the thought of God! With the same impetuosity which refused that Jesus should wash his feet, Peter now says, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." Peter wanted to be the judge of his own need of Jesus, to determine himself what should be his relations with his Lord. O how many earnest, zealous disciples are like Peter! They love to feel the pulse of their own spiritual condition, and to claim the service of Jesus accordingly! Then again Peter sought to make it a personal matter, but Jesus showed him that he was dealing with them all. "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every-whit, and ye are clean (not thou), but not all. For he knew who should betray him."

It was done, Jesus had been the lowliest servant to each one of his disciples, and now he quietly proceeded to apply the lesson to them. What caused of the life of Jesus, the wonderful symmetry and proportion of all things? In the life of most men there is a disproportion; one thing will put out another, the pressure of one thing which deeply moves the heart or shakes the nerves, will unfit for another thing. Jesus was not impassive but he was disciplined: heart and will, and mind and word, were all subject to his Father. The secret of his life as man was, "I know that thou hearest me always." He had the most absolute confidence in his Father's presence, his Father's love, his Father's wisdom; and thus he could be as fully given to this moment's teaching of his disciples as though he were sitting on the mountain side in Galilee or in the ship on the lake of Gennesaret. The next moment was still in his Father's hand.

"He took his garments and sat down again, and said to them, 'Know ye what I have done unto you? Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well, for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you. Let this mind be in you.' This was the meaning, and it applies to the whole Church of Christ in every age. 'I am among you as he that serveth' (Luke 22: 27); what then? 'By love serve one another.' The last practical lesson of the Master was one of humility and unselfishness, yet, if we judge by the majority of the members of our several churches, we might say that the professing Church of Christ as a whole is remarkable for its pride and its selfishness. Generally every one wants to have the first place, the exact contrary to the mind which was in Christ Jesus. In how many missions, for instance, the most unfit persons want to do all the talking, they like to hear their own voices, quite regardless of whether others are drawn near to God by what they say. The thought is to do what they like and what pleases them, not that which serves God's purpose. A very indifferent speaker whose whole heart is in his message because he has received it straight from God, and who delivers it as being the servant of his message, will do far more good than a powerful preacher who speaks as the master of his message. If we speak let it be in the mind which was in Christ Jesus, as servants of God, servants of our message, servants of our song, servants of the church, servants of the congregation before us. 'I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done unto you. Verily, verily, I say unto you, the servant is not greater than his Lord; neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him.' If the Lord serves, shall not the servant serve. Whenever Jesus came, he came to serve all around him; free from himself, he entered into the needs and sorrows of men. He was at the beck and call of all men. This is true nobility, divine nobility. The flesh in us, the self-conscious, self-important, self-loving flesh cannot serve. Just as far as Jesus possesses us, just so far it becomes an instinct and a second nature to serve all with whom we come in contact; not to please ourselves, not to please them, but to please God. 'If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.'

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

WHAT I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter. If we could but look beyond the confines of the present and get a glimpse of the future, many things that now seem mysteries would then be very plain. From the cradle to the grave we are compelled to exercise faith, because our vision is so contracted. The child learns its lessons not because it delights in study, but because it is continually admonished that the future will reveal to it the advantages of diligence in that direction, and believing its parents and teachers, it perseveres. Could it but look ahead a dozen years or so it would find incentives far beyond the inducements and persuasions of others. How many eminent men and women are constrained, when advanced in years, to acknowledge their gratitude to those who, notwithstanding the numerous discouragements that often confronted them, persevered in training them for usefulness and for heaven. Sunday School teachers are not infrequently disheartened from continuing in their labor of love because their scholars do not manifest even the slightest appreciation, but let us not be easily discouraged nor weary in well-doing, for the time will come when they shall rise up and call us blessed.

Having crossed the ferry to Jersey City, travellers who have not before journeyed over the Erie road are surprised to find the headlights of the engines all ablaze and the cars brightly illuminated, while the light of the noon-day sun comes streaming into the windows. They wonder at the carelessness of the porter in having forgotten to extinguish the lights. But when the train, after the signal has been given, has travelled for about ten minutes and they hear the shrill shriek of the locomotive and immediately after find themselves surrounded by the darkness and gloom of the tunnel, they suddenly understand what before seemed to them so strange. And so our scholars, now so unappreciative, when the gloom gathers and darkness encircles them, will thank God that early in life some faithful Sunday School teacher as the instrument of the Holy Spirit kindled a light in their hearts which after lighting and cheering and guiding them through this life, shall safely light them even through the valley of the shadow of death, and unto the pearly gates of the Celestial city.

I have given you an example. And it is an example we are to pattern after. The one thing we should do at all times and under all circumstances is to try to be like Jesus. We must try to think, and feel, and speak and act, as we may suppose Jesus would do if he were in our place. He has gone before us in the way to heaven. The marks of his feet are on the road and we must try to tread in the blessed steps of his holy life.

A little girl went to writing school. When she saw the copy set before her, she said: "I can never write like that." But she took up her pen, and put it timidly on the paper. Her hand trembled; she stopped, studied the copy and began again. "I can but try," she said, "and I'll try to do the best I can."

She wrote half a page. The letters were crooked. What more could be expected from the first effort? "What scraggy things you make," said the scholar next to her. Tears filled the little girl's eyes. She feared to have the teacher come. "He will be angry and scold me," she said to herself.

The teacher came and looked and smiled. "I see you are trying hard my little girl and that is all I can expect." He said no more. The girl took courage. Again and again she studied the beautiful copy. Then she took up her pen, and began to write. She wrote very carefully, with the copy always before her, but she was not satisfied. The letters straggled and crowded and looked every which way. Again the girl trembled when she heard the teacher. "I'm afraid you will find fault with me," she said, "my letters are so unlike the copy."

"I do not find fault with you," said the teacher, kindly, "because you are only a beginner. Keep on trying. In this way, you will do better every day; and soon get to be a good writer." "Thank you, sir," said she and went on trying to imitate the copy.

And this is the way we are to be like Jesus. We must try to make our lives like his. But when we read about Jesus, and learn how holy, and good and perfect he was, we must not be discouraged, if we do not become like him at once. We cannot become like him in a day, a week, a month, or a year. But, if we keep on trying, and ask God to help us, we shall "learn of him to be meek and lowly in heart;" and we shall daily more and more follow the example he has given us.

A CURE FOR ENNUI.

A Story of the S. S. Text for Oct. 18. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Phil. 2: 5.

HOW to kill a morning was the problem that was perplexing a fashionable young lady who seemed to have around her all the appliances for making time pass pleasantly. The problem, however, would not be solved. A few minutes at the piano, a few stitches of fancy work, an attempt to write a letter, the perusal of a page or two of a popular magazine had used up less than an hour and there were yet several hours more to kill. Gertrude Elliott sighed with sheer weariness as she looked at her watch. A ring at the bell caught her ear and she brightened, for even the dullest visitor, would be welcome in her present mood. It was not a dull visitor, however, who entered. "Mr. Leigh," she said, as a clergyman greeted her, "I believe a merciful providence sent you here this morning to save me from dying of ennui. If you will only stay and talk to me for half an hour you will be doing an act of Christian charity."

"Ah!" said the visitor, "do you find the hours so hard to kill. I am afraid if you and I could have our way with time, we should be sadly at issue. I would lengthen every minute of every hour if I could. There is so much to do and the time is so short."

"Oh, I have plenty to do, but it is so difficult to find an agreeable occupation. I am like a child, I think, I must be amused."

"And you do not find a child's amusements amusing now, I suppose? A doll and a set of toy furniture do not give the delight, they did when you were five years old. Your lot is unfortunate; it is too bad to have a child's wants and not a child's means of gratifying them. Miss Elliott I pity you."

"I am inclined to think, Mr. Leigh that you are laughing at me rather than pitying me, but indeed I am miserable and discontented and I am ashamed of being so and would reform if I could."

"If you are in earnest" said the clergyman, "I could give you a prescription. I think you called your complaint ennui, a hateful word, I am glad there is no English equivalent for it. Now if you place yourself in my hands I can cure it providing you pledge yourself to obey."

"Indeed I will!" the lady replied, "and I will thank you with all my heart."

"Then I will set you to work. Here is an address, you will find it easily; go there and you will see that there is plenty of work to be done. The mother is sick. She is a widow. Her eldest daughter works in a factory, and there are two or three little children at home, who need looking after, and their neglected condition is making their mother worse."

"O Mr. Leigh, that is not fair. I do not know how to pray and read with sick people. Really you must excuse me."

"On the contrary, Miss Elliott, I intend holding you to your bargain. I do so on your account for I want to convince you of the best way of curing such weariness as yours. I do not ask you to read or pray with the sick woman; you can do so if you wish, but I think when you see the place your own discretion will guide you as to what it is best to do."

"Well, I will keep my promise, but I shall never ask you to prescribe for me again."

In a short time Gertrude was on her way to the place of her ministrations. She found the sick room very comfortless. The sufferer, a poor, patient woman, lay in agony, while the eldest daughter, who was about Gertrude's age, was making some clumsy attempts at laundry work, the results of which hung on a line strung across the room. One little boy of six years old sat on a high chair whining miserably, his cheeks flushed and his eyes glistening.

"Mr. Leigh told me you were ill," said Gertrude, going up to the side of the bed on which the sick woman lay. "He thought perhaps, I could do something for you."

"Bless you, young lady, for coming, and him for sending you. I am very ill, but I seem to suffer more from seeing everything neglected than from my pain. Mary does her best, but she hasn't been used to this work, and she does not know. If you could stay with me a few minutes while she goes to the drug store for medicine it would be very kind. It's a poor place for the likes of you, though."

Mary was dispatched to the drug-store, and Gertrude looked about the room. A little "tidying-up" was soon done, while the widow looked on with approving eyes. The poor pillows were smoothed and the bed clothes re-arranged. The little boy, who had ceased his whining, was taken to kiss his mother, and Gertrude had noticed how hot his little hands were. By that time Mary had returned with the medicine, which Gertrude carefully poured out and administered. Then she dispatched the girl on another errand for lemons and tea and a few other things, putting the money into her hand from her own pocket-book. She soon came back, and Gertrude having made some lemonade, took the child on her lap and watched him drink the cooling mixture with evident relish. He had just fallen back on her knee in sheer weakness, and was looking gratefully into Gertrude's eyes, when the door opened and Mr. Leigh entered. He noticed instantly the changes effected in the room, and saw from the bright look on Gertrude's face that his prescription had taken the desired effect. He remained but a few minutes, uttering a few words of consolation to the invalid, and then hurried away. But as he passed her chair he said, "It is five o'clock, Miss Elliott."

A quiet "Thank you" was the only answer, but Mr. Leigh understood that he was being thanked for something else.

The prescription had been successful. Gertrude had given away much money in charity in the past. She had the idea that she was a very charitable person, but this was her first experience of personal service. It opened a new field before her. She continued her visits and her heart rejoiced in the good she did.

"May God bless you," said the sick woman, one day, when for the first time she was able to leave her bed for the chair which Gertrude had given her; "you can never know how much you have done for me. I never thought elegant ladies like you could do such things. Here you've been nursing me and doing for me like my own sister. How is it?"

"I came first," said Gertrude, determined to take no honor that did not belong to her, "against my will and only to oblige Mr. Leigh, but since then because it made me happy and made you happy and"—lowering her voice—"because I wanted in a small way to follow Christ in personally ministering to one of his people. I ought to have done it long ago. I have learned a lesson I shall never forget."

EXPIRING POLYGAMY.

THE Mormon evil is unquestionably in its decline. A very interesting statement is made by Ex. U. S. Senator Saunders of Nebraska, who says, "The members of the National Utah Commission have just returned from a two months' investigation in Utah, and we shall report to the President that polygamy is gradually dying out in the Territory. I will not say that the law has been completely successful in stamping out polygamous practices, but it has done far more in that direction than any of us expected could be done when the law was enacted. The Mormons are beginning to recognize that instead of waging war with the Gentiles of Utah alone in support of their doubtful religious tenets, they have on their hands an unequal fight against the opinions of the 65,000,000 people in the United States."

GEORGE MULLER'S SUPPLIES.

HOW God honors the faith of those who trust in him has been manifested conspicuously in the life of George Muller, of whose orphanages, at Ashley Down, England, nearly every Christian has heard. Mr. Muller, whose portrait is here given, began the work fifty-seven years ago, and though he has never made any appeal to the public or to private individuals for funds, the institutions have been built at a cost of $575,000 and maintained to the present time. There have been many times when the food and money have been exhausted. Then Mr. Muller would call his large family together and pray to God for help and there never has been an emergency in which the help did not come in time.

Mr. Muller has just issued his fifty-second annual report. It states that there are now 2,050 orphans in the homes. The expenses of the past twelve months have amounted to $114,075. At the beginning of that period there was a balance of $23,245 in the treasury. Since that time the receipts have amounted to $89,280 leaving a balance in hand of $1,550. That is rather a small sum for a man to have who has above two thousand hungry children to feed every day, but Mr. Muller is in no way disconcerted. He believes that God, who has supplied all his needs in the past will do so in the future and that the children will still be clothed and fed. That he has good ground for this confidence will be acknowledged by everyone who read the story of the beginning and progress of the work, from his own pen, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in 1887.

Mr. Muller is careful to acknowledge in his annual reports every contribution received and to give a detailed statement of expenditures. Among his contributors last year, have been some who have sent the money under peculiar circumstances. Here are a few of the letters: A widow who sent a cheque for $100 says: "This sum I give in memory of my dear mother, whose life-long influence for good can never be forgotten by me, and whose prayers, I feel sure, still live for me. In this way I hope to honour her memory. It is now twenty-two years since I commenced business, and I then determined to set apart a certain proportion of my income for the Lord, and I am thankful to be able to bear witness, that during the whole of this time he has sustained and comforted me, and has truly been a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless. Trusting that you and yours may be spared, in health and strength, to carry on your noble and Christ-like work for many years to come,—I remain, yours truly, —"

February 4th. From Perthshire, the following letter in which was $50: "My dear Mr. Muller, I herewith enclose a cheque for £10, as help for the good work, in any of the Departments where it may be most required. It is a thank offering to my loving Heavenly Father, who after a severe illness, has restored me to health."

"June 4th. Legacy of the late Miss A. M. F., value $18,202 of which Mr. Muller says: "a remarkable legacy, indeed, for, although this donor lived in Bristol, I never received even the smallest gift from her in her lifetime, nor did I ever see her, that I know of, nor had I ever even heard her name. Yet the Lord constrained her to leave to me almost the whole of her property for the orphans."

In addition to cash there are the usual miscellaneous gifts, which this year include amongst others four haunches of venison, five casks of vinegar, 20 boxes of soap, besides other washing materials, quantities of paint, driers, ochre, etc., which came in very useful for the painting of the Homes.

PRISONERS IN HOSPITAL.

VISITORS to Bellevue Hospital, New York, are often surprised to notice that one of its wards has within it, two or three yards from the door, a barrier of heavy steel bars and that its windows are also protected by bars. This is the ward to which are brought men and women who have been arrested for crime who require hospital treatment. Previous to this ward being established, the prisoners were often in a dilemma. If a prisoner was seriously injured he might die if he remained in the prison and he might escape if sent to the hospital. When the case was so dangerous that it had to be sent to the hospital a policeman had to be detailed to watch the patient and his constant presence was a nuisance to the nurses as well as a disagreeable duty to him. The Police Commissioners and the Commissioners of Charities, therefore decided to construct a prison in the hospital. This was done and the patients now find egress from the ward stopped by the bars, between which and the door a policeman sits who admits the nurses through a wicket. There were 431 cases there during last year. Their state was typical of the spiritual condition of the sinner. Like them he needs a double blessing. He needs both pardon and healing. Both are offered him in Christ through whom he may be both justified and sanctified. (1 Cor. 1: 30.)

A NEW TEXTILE MATERIAL.

FIBRELIA is the name of a new material described by a dry-goods Journal. It predicts that it will be extensively used for mixing with wool, having properties superior to cotton for that purpose. Fibrelia is the product of common flax straw. The discoverer enthusiastically declares that "it is more impervious to water, is warmer, and, on account of its tenacity and flexibility, its cementing property and electrical adhesiveness, it imparts to the goods with which it is mixed a gloss and finish not otherwise attainable. Its coloring capacity being equal to wool, fibrelia goods take a better color, and hold it with more tenacity and brilliancy than cotton." The Jews were forbidden to wear garments made of such material (Levit. 19: 19), but the chief danger that threatens us in this day is not as to the mixture in our garments, but in our character. Efforts are being made to combine worldliness and spirituality and the results are deplorable. As in the case of fibrelia the combination is more flexible and has a more admired gloss and finish than rugged Christian principle possesses, but so made up, the character is neither strong nor useful. (Matt. 6: 24.)

ACROSS A CHASM.

EIGHT hours of agonizing suspense were passed on Sept. 26, by sixteen men in a mine at Shamokin, Pa. One of the chambers in the mine had been worked out and the foreman ordered the men to remove the pillars which divide it from the other levels. The work had only just begun when there was a loud report followed by others like the roar of artillery. There was a swaying sensation in the floor beneath the feet of the miners. They threw down their picks and ran for their lives, for they knew the meaning of those signs. They had just reached the closet chamber when there was a terrific crash. The floor of the chamber, where they had been working and of the gangway had fallen in, leaving a chasm ninety feet wide and a hundred feet deep. The men saw that the coal and rock were still falling all around them and they went as far as they could up the chamber and held a consultation. They realized with dismay that there was no exit from it but the one by which they had entered. They had no food with them and only the oil that was in their lamps. It seemed as if they would have to remain there until they starved to death. After about four hours of miserable foreboding, they heard a shout. A rescue party had found out where they were and were hauling them from the other side of the chasm. How to get the men across the abyss was the problem. A rope was procured and an effort made to throw it across. Time and again it failed. It would reach the ledge only to fall down into the darkness. Once it fell on a rock which seemed solid but as one of the imprisoned men ran forward to seize it, the rock and rope went down. The next attempt succeeded. The miners seized the end of the rope and fastened it securely to a wooden beam. They were to go over the frail bridge hand over hand. There were sixteen of them and they asked who would go first. The journey would be perilous for every man, but most of all to him who ventured first. One man volunteered; he bade his companions, "Good-bye," and clutched the rope. It cracked and swayed with his weight, but after a few anxious minutes a shout proclaimed that he was safe. Then, one by one, all crossed over. When the last came, the stalwart men wept for joy like children. The faith those men put in the strength of the rope is the faith sinners are invited to put in Christ, who is the only way by which they can pass safely over the chasm of the grave to heavenly bliss. (Acts 4: 12.)

AWAKENED IN THE RIVER.

A SINGULAR experience befell a policeman of the harbor squad in New York last week. He had a day off duty and went to Harlem to visit some friends. He remained with them until after midnight when he took an elevated train to South Ferry, which is near his station. In the car he fell fast asleep. He remembers nothing more until he was awakened by finding himself in the river. A log was floating near him and he clutched it and shouted for help. He was seen from a passing ferry-boat and a rope was thrown to him and he was hauled on board. He must have left the train and have walked several blocks before reaching the place where he fell into the water. All that time the brain must have been asleep while he "moved on" by some mechanical reflex action of the muscles, for he was conscious of no interval between boarding the train and clinging to the floating log. Such an experience is uncommon, but every minister and Christian worker has met many cases in which there is plenty of mental and physical activity while the soul is asleep. And sometimes it passes beyond sleep, for the Apostle speaks of those who live in pleasure being dead while they live. (1 Timothy 5: 6.)

IDENTIFIED BY A PICTURE.

SOME difficulty has been experienced in identifying a gentleman who died suddenly a few weeks ago in a hotel in Brooklyn, N.Y. There were no letters or papers among his effects from which a clue could be gained. There was, however, a photograph of a young man which bore on the back the name of a photographer in Pittsburg, Pa. It was sent to him but on looking over his stock he found that that particular negative had been destroyed, so he could not tell whose portrait it was. The photograph was displayed in his window with a request that anyone recognizing it would give the desired information. Many saw it and at last a man said it was the portrait of a gentleman at Wilmerding. A letter was sent to him detailing the circumstances under which the photograph was found. He went to Brooklyn at once and found that the dead man was his own father, from whom he had not heard since he set out on his journey. It would not always be possible to identify a man by the photographs he has in his possession. Sometimes they are pictures of great authors or statesmen whom he admires, but who do not know him. When there is a great difference of station between the admirer and the admired the great man is very apt to be oblivious of the humble one, however ardent may be the esteem of the latter. Happily for us, though the distance between our Lord and his people is infinite, we have the assurance, "The Lord knoweth them that are his." (II Tim. 2: 19.)

STOUT RELIGIOUS WORK.

MORBIDITY in religion might be partially cured by more out-door exercise. There are some duties we can perform better on our feet than on our knees. If we carry the grace of God with us down into every-day practical Christian work, we will get more spiritual strength in five minutes than by ten hours of kneeling. If Daniel had not served God save when three times a day he worshipped toward the temple, the lions would have surely eaten him up. The school of Christ is as much out-of-doors as in-doors. Hard, rough work for God will develop an athletic soul. Religion will not conquer either the admiration or the affections of men by effeminacy, but by strength. Because the heart is soft is no reason why the head should be soft. The spirit of genuine religion is a spirit of great power. When Christ rides in apocalyptic vision, it is not on a weak and stupid beast, but on a horse—emblem of majesty and strength: "And he went forth conquering and to conquer."

JUST THE DIFFERENCE.

THERE are two ways of reading the Bible. One is an intellectuality. The other is a heart experience. It is a beautiful poem, and you read it as you do Tennyson. It is a fine statement of principles of law, and you read it as you do Blackstone. It is a mental discipline, and you read it as you do Dugald Stewart, or Sir William Hamilton, or William Reed. But the Holy Spirit in some good hour comes to your heart. You open that Bible. How you read it then! All your soul goes out toward it. You feel: "If I don't find pardon and light through the instructions of this Book, I will never find them at all." With all the concentrated energy of your soul you read it. There is an old sea-captain who has not been on the water for twenty years. He is sitting in his home, and his grandchild is playing at his feet with the chart, and the sea-glass, and the compass—very beautiful playthings. The old captain has no use for them, so he lets his grandchild have them. But while the grandfather looks down and sees the compass, and the sea-glass, and the chart, his mind goes back to the time when he handled those things under very different circumstances. He thinks of the euroclydon that came down on the sea, and the time when he saw the froth of destruction on the mouth of the wave, and the heaven swinging back its mantle of darkness to strike with sword of fire, and it seemed as if they must all perish. Oh, then, how the captain examined the compass! Oh, then, how his finger trembled over the chart. In the one case it is a child's toy; in the other, it is shipwreck or rescue. So there are men who come to read the Bible, this glorious chart. It is very beautiful to look over, and they say: "There is a rock, and here is a rock, and there is a lighthouse, and here is the gulf-stream of God's mercy." But, after awhile, the Holy Spirit comes upon the soul. The man says: "It is high time now I found out my latitude and longitude. Where am I?" And the storm howls through the heart. The man says: "What is to become of me? Shall I go down, or shall I go up?" How he reads the Bible then! How he looks at the chart then—at this rock, at that rock, at that lighthouse, this gulf-stream, that promontory! Oh, it is a different chart then! In the one case, he ran his intellectual finger across the page and examined it as a curiosity. In the other case, he examined it with reference to his immortal rescue.

ANNOYANCES.

LET us remember that the spiked nettles of life are part of our discipline. Life would get nauseating if it were all honey. That table would be poorly set that had on it nothing but treacle. We need a little vinegar, mustard, pepper, and horse-radish that brings the tears even when we do not feel pathetic. If this world were all smoothness, we would never be ready for emigration to a higher and better. Blustering March and weeping April prepare us for shining May. This world is a poor hitching-post. Instead of tying fast on the cold mountains, we had better whip up and hasten on toward the warm inn where our good friends are looking out of the window, watching to see us come up.

BE IN TIME.

NEVER take the last train when you can help it. Much of the trouble in life is caused by the fact that people, in their engagements, wait till the last minute. The seven o'clock train will take them to the right place if everything goes straight, but in this world things are very apt to go crooked. So you had better take the train that starts an hour earlier. In everything we undertake let us leave a little margin. We tried, jokingly, to persuade Captain Berry, when off Cape Hatteras, to go down and get his breakfast, while we took his place and watched the course of the steamer. He intimated to us that we were running too near the bar to allow a greenhorn to manage matters just there. There is always danger sailing near a coast whether in ship or in plans and morals. Do not calculate too closely on possibilities. Better have room and time to spare. Not heeding this counsel makes bad work for this world and the next. There are many lines of communication between earth and heaven. Men say they can start at any time. After a while, in great excitement, they rush into the depot of mercy, and find that the final opportunity has left, and, behold! it is the last train!

MONDAYISH.

MANY ministers complain on rising the morning after a Sabbath of exhausting work of a feeling for the description of which they have coined a word. They feel Mondayish. They rise this morning with their mouth tasting badly, and go about stretching and yawning as though they were getting the chills and fever—the meanest thing a man ever gets. Saturday study makes this. One who has been two consecutive days on the strain must feel the bad reaction. He took all Saturday to load the gun, and all Sunday to shoot it off, and the gun has kicked. Saturday afternoon free from work is a cure for Mondayishness. If you want a Sunday to sail well, you ought to launch it Saturday afternoon. If a minister has to study exhaustingly the latter part of the week, it is generally because he has been lazy in the former part of the week. There is nothing that so hurts a sermon as to jam it between the wheels of Saturday night and Sunday morning. One of the ablest ministers of the Reformed Church used to say that he did all his hard mental work after ten o'clock Saturday night. At that late hour he would take to his study a tea-pot and pack of first-rate cigars and go at his two sermons. He quit life early and went away, compelled to leave behind him his tea-pot and box of cigars. I should rather go up in almost any other chariot than in a cloud of tobacco smoke. Not Saturday night, but Wednesday and Thursday are the best cradles in which to rock a sermon after it has been born. The Mondayish feeling sometimes comes to the ministry because that is the day the clerical profession do what they call "odds and ends," and visit the sick. Instead of taking it easy that morning, they are worried about the many errands they have to do. Monday is a poor day for visiting the sick. It is bad for the minister and the invalid to whom he goes. When I am sick save me from a minister who himself has "the dumps." We need to be strong when we go to help the weak. What the sick most need is a dose of sunshine; and how shall we pour it out for them unless we have a steady hand? There is no use of going in to sit on the bedside and help the invalid groan. Better take to him our tuning-fork and give him the pitch of "the new song." Do not spend Monday in rushing about; "odds and ends" have killed many a minister. Sunday is a trying day; let Saturday on one side of it, and Monday on the other side of it, take hold its arms and help it through. Do not spend Monday in going round to see "how the sermon took." If it was faithful, I warrant that in some quarters it did not take at all. Do not ask a child afterward whether he enjoys calomel and jalap; of course he does not. When I preach a sermon on Sunday that makes "the fur fly," I spend Monday at Coney Island. The Mondayish feeling often comes to the minister through worryment at the inefficiency of Sunday's work. But what is the use of fretting if we did as well as we could? We ought not to expect to make "a ten-strike" at every roll. What though the sermon was spoiled by the poor ventilation of the church, or by the titteration in the gallery, or the elder with creaky shoes who went out twice during the sermon to see what was the matter, or the old man's clearing his throat with a racket that seemed to imply that he had taken a contract for removing all the colds of a lifetime at one spit? Do not let us fret over the poor sermons of yesterday, for brooding over them will only hatch more of the same breed. Besides that, our most insignificant effort may be raised in greatest power.

COUNTERFEIT PROFESSORS.

WE admit some of the charges against those who profess religion. Some of the most gigantic swindles of the present day have been carried on by members of the Church. There are men standing in the front rank in the Churches who would not be trusted for five dollars without good collateral security. They leave their business dishonesties in the vestibule of the church as they go in and sit at the communion. Having concluded the sacrament, they get up, wipe the wine from their lips, go out, and take up their sins where they left off. To serve the devil is their regular work; to serve God a sort of play-spell. With a Sunday sponge they expect to wipe off from their business slate all the past week's inconsistencies. You have no more right to take such a man's life as a specimen of religion, than you have to take the twisted irons and split timbers that lie on the beach as a specimen of an American ship. It is time that we drew a line between religion and the frailties of those who profess it.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. A. S. and Mrs. Van Dyck sailed from New York on Sept. 30, to resume their missionary work in China.

The Trustees of the projected Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York have received contributions to the amount of $850,000 toward the building fund. All these gifts have been made spontaneously.

Rev. R. P. Aske, who recently went to Africa as a missionary of the Church Missionary Society, has found that a bicycle, he took out with him is admirably adapted for travelling on the paths of the African Continent.

Rev. C. W. Merrill of Minneapolis, who has been conducting Evangelistic services at Waterloo, Ia., has now gone for ten weeks to Denver, Colo., where he will hold union meetings in five or six different parts of the city.

At the recent meeting of the Managers of the American Bible Society, a grant of Bibles and portions was made to the Zulu Mission of the American Board of the value of $4,513. The issues from the Bible House during the previous month were 48,171 volumes.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, M. A., the distinguished English Methodist minister, preached last Sunday morning in New York in the Bedford Street M. E. Church to an overflowing audience. Mr. Hughes has crossed the Atlantic as a delegate to the approaching Ecumenical Council at Washington, D. C.

The Fulton Street M. E. Church of Elizabeth, N. J., has been enjoying a season of blessing under the labors of Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, who has been holding meetings there for two weeks past. This church is now, we are glad to learn, overcoming the obstacles which hindered its progress and is full of hope.

Gipsy Smith, the English evangelist, whose portrait appeared in this journal on September 23d, has been holding meetings for three weeks past in Jane Street M. E. Church, New York. More than 250 persons during that time have been led to inquire after Christ. On September 28th when the evangelist related the history of his life the church was crowded to the doors, and a large number who came, hoping to hear, were unable to gain admission. Gipsy Smith held every hearer spell-bound to the end of his story.

Rev. James A. O'Connor the converted Roman Catholic priest who has been conducting services for more than twelve years past in New York, has secured a mission building for the use of the congregation of converted Catholics he has gathered around him. It is situated on West Twenty-first St., near Sixth Avenue. The cost of the building is $27,000, of which Mr. O'Connor has paid $10,000. He has received a legacy of $3,000 which will be applied toward meeting the next installment of $5,000. Contributions toward the purchase fund may be sent to Rev. James O'Connor, 142 West Twenty-first Street, N.Y.

The monthly meetings of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, were resumed on October 6th., at Hamilton Hall, Columbia College, with a paper by Thomas E. Fleming, Ph.D., of Davenport, Iowa, on "Ethical Data." A successful Summer School was held in August at Avon-by-the-Sea, in which President, Dr. Charles F. Deems, and other scholars took part. Since the June meeting there have been a number of well-known people added to the membership, including Mr. Gladstone, Hamilton Fish, Dr. Charles H. Corey, President of the Richmond Theological Seminary, President Butterfield of Olivet College, Rev. Dr. Greer, St. Bartholomew's Church, Oswald Ottendorfer of the Staats Zeitung, and many other eminent men.

From March 1st to Sept. 1st, the missionaries of the American Sunday School Union in the Northwestern District, established 450 Sunday Schools, into which were gathered 13,876 scholars and 1,630 teachers. They also aided old schools in 2,047 cases, where 10,104 teachers are giving Bible instruction to 104,037 scholars. They held 2,941 meetings, made 18,127 visits to families, distributed 3,093 Bibles and Testaments, put into circulation $3,296 worth of religious reading and traveled 128,844 miles. F. G. Ensign, Chicago, Ill., superintends this work. A report of the work in the south-west has been received from Rev. Geo. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary of the American Sunday School Union. It is full of interesting details and will be published in an early number of this journal.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Trouble With Chili — Boulanger's Suicide — Prominent Deaths During the Week — King Charles of Roumania to Abdicate — Canadian Cabinet Changes — General Notes.

It is an open secret at Washington that trouble has arisen between the Chilean government and our State Department, in consequence of the arrest of three American citizens at Santiago and Valparaiso. These arrests, it is believed, were made by the new Chilean government on the supposition that the Americans had to some extent sympathized with the Balmaceda regime, although it is not shown that such sympathy took any active form that could have been regarded as hostile to the Congress Party. A police cordon was established at the official residence of the United States Legation and all access to Minister Egan denied. News of the arrests was received from Capt. Schley commanding the U. S. S. Baltimore now in Chilean waters. It is understood that an explanation will be demanded from Chili by our government.

Disasters of the Week.

Prairie fires in North Dakota have done heavy damage during the week. In some places men and cattle have perished while seeking to escape the flames. George W. Johnson and son were burned to death near Beaver Creek, Emmons County, and five others are known to have perished elsewhere in the State. — The southern portion of Minnesota was swept by a gale on September 28th, which felled an immense quantity of pine lumber and caused some loss of life. No particulars have yet been obtained owing to the remoteness of the district. — During a fire in the large furniture establishment of Phillips & Cunningham, Philadelphia, on September 28th, the entire fire department of the city was on the ground. A number of men were at work in the second and third stories, pouring streams of water on the blaze when a sheet of fire drove them to the ladders, down which they tumbled in confusion. Eight firemen were seriously injured, but all will recover.

Dr. Burchard Dead.

A DISPATCH from Saratoga, N. Y., on September 25, announced the death of the Rev. Samuel D. Burchard, D. D., whose famous alliterative utterance during the Presidential campaign of 1884 brought upon him national notoriety. He was seventy-nine years of age and had been in the ministry fifty-three years. Dr. Burchard was a native of Steuben county, N. Y., but in 1830 the family removed to Kentucky and the future minister was sent to Centre College, Danville, where he graduated in 1836. He became prominent in the State as a lecturer on temperance, slavery, and religious subjects and won golden opinions by his devotion as a volunteer nurse in the cholera epidemic in 1837. Two years later he came north and settled in New York as pastor of the Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church. He remained in the city doing valuable and unobtrusive work in the pastorate until 1884 when a momentous remark in the course of a speech made his name famous throughout the land. On Wednesday, October 29, he was one of a party of ministers who called on Mr. Blaine at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York. Dr. Burchard addressed the candidate, expressing his own belief that he would be elected to the Presidency on the following Tuesday. He added that he rejoiced in the prospect because Mr. Blaine represented the forces opposed to "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion." Mr. Blaine, in replying, omitted to disclaim that championship and his opponents published the report everywhere, contending that his silence indicated approval of Dr. Burchard's remark. It has always been alleged that if the republican candidate had received the votes of the thousands of Roman Catholics who were deterred from voting for him by the remark, he would have been elected President. From the date of the election until his death, Dr. Burchard's life was embittered by the reproaches of people in all parts of the country who never ceased to blame him for aiding in bringing about a result which he as much as they must have deplored.

A Statesman and Soldier Gone.

By the death of Washington Curran Whitthorne, Tennessee loses one of the brightest of her sons, distinguished alike in the forum and on the field of battle. For thirty years, Mr. Whitthorne has been in public life. He was born in Lincoln, Tenn. in 1825, and studied law in the East Tennessee University. Entering politics in 1843, he was for three years State Senator. When the war broke out, he became Assistant Adj. General to Gen. Anderson's Tennessee Brigade in the Confederate Army, and went through the West Virginia Campaign. He afterwards served on the staffs of Gen's. Wright, Carter and Hardee. In 1870 he was elected to Congress and reelected continuously ill 1883, when he was made United States Senator, taking his seat in 1886. He was one of the most industrious and ablest of the entire Southern delegation and took prominent part in many leading debates during the reconstruction period. A portrait of Senator Whitthorne is given above.

Canadian Cabinet Changes.

LACK of stability has characterized the Canadian Cabinet ever since the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, and rumors of approaching changes are again rife. It is said on what seems to be good authority that a reorganization has been decided upon, and that Speaker White, of the House of Commons, will be made Minister of Public Works, Wood of Brockville succeeding him as Speaker. Hugh John Macdonald, son of the late Premier, will become Minister of Agriculture. Postmaster-General Haggart will remain. A reconstruction of the Cabinet will take place within two weeks. It is believed that Sir Adolph Caron will retire and that in place of Sir Hector and Sir Adolph, Lieut.-Gov. Angers and ex-Speaker Ouimet will enter the Cabinet as representing the French Canadian element in Parliament. Senator Smith, acting Minister of Public Works will not remain as an active member. Ex-Speaker Kilpatrick, a brilliant lawyer, will enter the Cabinet as Minister of Militia. Derodney, Minister of the Interior, is endeavoring to get the Lieutenant-Governorship of British Columbia. If he succeeds, Daley of Manitoba will succeed him on the Treasury bench. Hon. John Carling, Minister of Agriculture, is to succeed Sir Alexander Campbell as Lieut.-Governor of Ontario, and in the Cabinet he will be succeeded by Mr. Meredith, an equal-righter and leader of the opposition in the Ontario Legislature. It is hinted that after the session Premier Abbott will retire, and that a combination of Thompson and Meredith will form an administration.

The Death of Boulanger.

EUROPE was struck with surprise when on the 30th of September intelligence was telegraphed from Brussels that Boulanger, the exiled idol of the disaffected faction in France, had shot himself through the head and expired upon the grave of Mme. Bonnemain, his former enthusiastic worshiper, in the cemetery of Ixelles. Ever since her death he had been gloomy. He paid daily visits to the cemetery and at each visit laid some flower upon the tomb. On Wednesday, with his secretary and his niece, he set out earlier than usual. On reaching the cemetery he requested to be left alone and fifteen minutes later was dead with a pistol bullet in his brain. Boulanger was the son of a lawyer in moderate circumstances, and was born at Rennes, France, in 1837. He was educated in the famous French Military Academy at St. Cyr, and served in the army, making a most brilliant record in several campaigns. The poor military student rose to the highest posts of distinction. On retiring from service in the field he was Minister of War in two Cabinets, and his administration was such as to lead to apprehensions of renewed trouble with Germany. With the advent of the Rouvier Ministry, Boulanger was assigned to a humbler role at a military post and at once began to conspire for his own advancement. For this and for his subsequent insubordination he was stricken off the active army list. Smarting under this discipline, he began a series of attacks on the administration and insulted M. Floquet the President of the Legislative Council. This resulted in a duel in which Boulanger was severely wounded. All these setbacks, however, seemed to act as fuel to his wild, fiery ambition. He adopted a course of agitation that made him the idol of the Parisian boulevards, and the disaffected throughout France, as well as the admiration of the monarchists who saw in him an element that threatened the disintegration of the Republic. "Le brave, General" was the popular hero of the hour. Plots and counterplots were openly talked of and there were even intimations of an approaching coup d'etat in the interest of Prince Victor and the Bonapartists. The government recognized the crisis and took prompt measures to check the tide of revolution. Boulanger was indicted for sedition and also for embezzlement while War Minister. He fled to avoid arrest, and in the proceedings that followed the whole rottenness of his schemes was disclosed. He had used immense sums of the public monies to further his personal schemes and political plots. The existence of a Boulangist Revolutionary League with over 100,000 members was discovered, and it was broken up. Many army officers who had been tempted to join the plotters were detected and punished and the hollow and corrupt fabric of Boulangism fell shattered. For a time, even in exile, Boulanger posed as a great political possibility, but for over a year past his influence has been almost obliterated in France. His suicidal end marks a most characteristic conclusion to a disappointed life that was full of vanity, deception and intrigue. A portrait of "Le brave, General" is given above.

GEN. BOULANGER.

Tired of His Throne.

THERE are indications that King Charles of Roumania will shortly abdicate in favor of his nephew, Crown Prince Ferdinand. Ever since Roumania was created a kingdom by the Powers, it has been a bone of European contention, and in the event of war it would be a centre of disturbance if not the scene of actual hostilities. So delicate is the present condition of European diplomacy, that it is not to be wondered at that the king, who ascended the new-made throne in 1884, prefers to retire rather than become the instrument of involving his country in a conflict he is powerless to avert or control. King Carlos I. was born in 1837 and entered the Prussian army at an early age, when Roumania was a mere principality. In 1869 he espoused Princess Elizabeth of Wied, the renowned Carmen Sylva, whose portrait was recently published in these columns. Their only child, a daughter, died in infancy. During the Russo-Turkish war, Charles showed himself a brave commander and his queen distinguished herself by organizing a system of ambulances, that was of the greatest service to the wounded. She directed the Ambulance Corps in person, wearing the robe of a Sister of Charity. Crown Prince Ferdinand, the probable successor to the throne, is now 26 years of age, and is said to be a young man of more than ordinary abilities and great decision of character.

Six States Shaken.

AN earthquake, of less intensity but far wider in extent than that recorded in these columns last week, was felt on the evening of September 27th in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Kentucky and Tennessee. At St. Louis the shock was very general, and people were awakened from sleep, and ran to the street in their night clothes. Among those who did so were Governor Johnson and his family, who live at the west end of the city. Considerable crockery and glassware was demolished. In one of the newspaper offices the compositors rushed out to the sidewalk panic-stricken. At Louisville, Decatur, Jacksonville, Peoria, Springfield, Keokuk, Terre Haute and Memphis the vibrations were felt with more or less intensity.

Imprisoned in a Mine.

Sixteen miners employed in the Hickory Ridge coal mine at Shamokin, Pa., had a remarkably narrow escape from death last week. Four Americans and twelve Italians and Hungarians were busy removing the pillars from one of the shafts, when the chain pillar dividing the levels gave way, and the men felt the floor sinking beneath them. They ran to an adjoining chamber, and were horrorstruck to see behind them a gap one hundred feet deep and ninety feet wide. On all sides they were surrounded by falling coal. For eight hours they remained in this perilous situation, when help arrived, and a rope was flung across to them by a rescue party after many failures. They clambered across the chasm on the rope, hand over hand, and when hoisted to the surface, where two hundred persons had gathered, they were dazed with joy and thankfulness at their escape from what seemed likely to prove a second Jeansville horror.

THE VALE OF SHADOW.

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me: thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."—Psalm 23: 4.

DO you know I had laid this text by? I meant that this choice promise should be kept in store and stock till I came near the river of Jordan, and I hoped that then, in my last hours, I might be privileged to enjoy its sweetness. The other day I found that I needed to eat this heavenly loaf at once, and I did so. Fathers tell their children, "You cannot eat your cake and have it too"; but this rule does not hold good of the consolations of God. You can enjoy a promise and have it still. Would to God that every believer who is burdened and cast down might find it as precious to his own heart as I have found it to mine.

Valleys of Trial.

This verse is no doubt very applicable to the experience of a believer when he comes to die; but, for certain, that is not its only intent. It has an inexpressibly delightful application to the dying; but it is for the living, too; and at this time if, through any peculiar trials, your soul is cast down within you, and you are walking through the valley of death-shade, I pray you to repeat the words of the text, and may the Lord help you to feel that they are true,—"Yea, though (even now) I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." The words are not in the future tense, and therefore are not reserved for a distant moment. Do not postpone to the future that which you so greatly need in the present. Though I walk, even at this hour, through the dark valley, thou, O Lord, art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. David was not dying; the psalm is full of happy, peaceful life. He is lying down in green pastures, and following his Lord by still waters; and if a cloud has descended upon him and he feels himself like one threatened with death, he nevertheless expects goodness and mercy to follow him through all his days.

I. I call your attention, first, to The Pass and its Terrors. "the valley of the shadow of death." Get the idea of a narrow ravine, something like the Gorge of Gondo or some other stern pass upon the higher Alps where the rocks seem piled to heaven, and the sunlight is seen above as through a narrow rift. Troubles are sometimes heaped on one another, pile on pile, and the road is a dreary defile through which the pilgrim on his journey to heaven has to wend his way. Set before your mind's eye a valley shut in with stupendous rocks that seem to meet overhead, a narrowing defile, dark as midnight itself. Through this valley, or rocky ravine, the heavenly footman has to follow the path appointed for him. Through such a dreary rift many a child of God is making his way at this moment, and to him I speak.

Our first observation about it is that it is exceedingly gloomy. This is its chief characteristic. It is the valley of the shadow—the shadow of death. Death is terrible, and the very shadow of it is cold and chill, and freezes to the marrow. I have stood under rocks which have not merely cooled me, but have cast around a horribly damp chill, as though the embrace of death had been about me, and its cold within me. One hastens to escape from such a deadly shade, which has tended to strike you with fever. And such it seems to me is the shade cast by the wing of death when the man feels that he is under such trouble of soul that he cannot live, and would not even wish to do so if he could. The joy of life has been like the sun under an eclipse; and in the chill, dark, damp shade of a terrible sorrow the man has cowered down, and beneath

The Icy Touch of Doubt has shivered, felt fevered and frightened, and has been as one out of his mind.

I speak to some young hearts here who, I hope, know nothing about this gloom. Do not want to know it. Keep bright while you can. Sing while you may. Belarks and mount aloft, and sing as you mount; but there are some of God's people who are not much in the lark line, they are a great deal more like owls. They sit alone and keep silence; or if they do open their mouths it is to give forth a discontented hoot. Companions of dragons, and very suitable companions, too, such mournful ones need all the gentle sympathy we can afford them. Even those who are bright and cheerful do, many of them, occasionally pass through the dreary glen where everything is doleful; and their spirits sink below zero. I know that wise brethren say, "You should not give way to feelings of depression." Quite right, no more we should. But we do; and perchance when your brain is as weary as ours you will not bear yourselves more bravely than we do. "But are surely very much to be blamed," I know they are, but they are also very much to be pitied; and perhaps, if those who blame quite so furiously could once know what depression is, they would think it cruel to scatter blame where comfort is needed. There are experiences of the children of God which are full of spiritual darkness; and I am almost persuaded that those of God's servants who have been most highly favored, have, nevertheless, suffered more times of darkness than others.

Moreover, there are parts of human life which are dangerous as well as gloomy. In journeying through the passes of the East an escort is usually needed, for the robber lurks among the rocks, and shoots down upon the traveler, or blocks up his way with sword and spear. The name of the Khyber Pass is still terrible in our memories, and there are Khybers in most men's lives. There are points in human history that are specially dangerous. Oh, you that are beginners, I do not wish to frighten you; I do not want to tell you that the ways of wisdom are terrible, for they are not. No, "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." But, for all that, there are enemies on the road to heaven: and there are where, when the enemy finds your spirits cast down, he pounces on you unawares with temptation, and before you know it you may be wounded and sore grieved. If you have not yet come to that part of your pilgrimage I am glad of it, and I hope that you may be spared it, in answer to that needful prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." But if you are called to walk through this dangerous ravine, what will you do? Why, say this—Yea, though I walk through that dangerous pass of which I have heard, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

Recollect that a Christian man is never so much in danger from abundance of temptation as from the carnal security of his own heart. We are often most in jeopardy when we are not tempted; and the worst devil in the world may be no devil at all. "Deliver me," said a man of great experience, "from for if he roars at me he keeps me awake; but when he lets me alone my heart presumes that all is safe, and I am betrayed." You young people, or old people either, who are placed in the course of providence in positions of great trial and temptation, need not wish for an easier pathway, for it may be that you are safer now, being on your guard, than those who are not fiercely tried, but sit at ease, and are in great peril from sloth and spiritual indifference. Better consume with fire than perish of dry rot. The cold mountains of trial are far safer than the sultry plains of pleasure. I am not, therefore, alarmed at manifest danger, neither would I have you greatly dismayed because there is a gloomy gorge between you and heaven.

One of the chief reasons of the gloom is the fact that this terrible pass is shrouded in mystery. You do not know what the sorrow is. The shadow—the shadow of death: what meaneth it? You cannot discern the form which broods over you. You cannot grasp the foe. It is of no use drawing

A Sword Against a Shadow.

Bunyan paints the pilgrim as putting up his sword when he came into the valley of the shadow of death. He had fought Apollyon with it, but when he came into the midnight of that horrible defile it was of no use to him. Everything was so veiled, magnified, and blackened in the dark. Hobgoblins, as he called them, hovered around, strange shapes and singular forms of doubts, which he could not meet with reasoning, or overcome with argument. A man can pluck up courage against a thing he knows; but an evil which he does not know unmans him. Such things happen to God's people now and then. And what are they to do when they get into these perplexities, these mysterious troubles, that they cannot at all describe? They must do— and God help them to do—as this blessed man did, who in the peace and confidence of faith went on his way singing, Yea, though I walk through the valley shaded by the mysterious wings of death, and though I know nothing of my way, and cannot understand it, yet will I fear no evil, for thou art with me.

Let me remark, further, that, though this valley is thus gloomy, dangerous, mysterious, and solitary, yet it is #### Often Traversed.

Many more Christians go by this road than some people dream. Among those who wear a cheerful countenance in public there are many who are well acquainted with this dreary glen; they have passed through it often, and may be in it now. When I wear the sackcloth of sorrow, I try to bind it about my loins under my outer garments, and not where all shall see it. It is surely true that a great number of God's best servants have trodden the deeps of the valley of the shadow; and this ought to comfort some of you. The footsteps of the holy are in the valley of weeping. Saints have marched through the Via Dolorosa; see you not their footprints? Above all others, mark one footprint! Do you not see it? Stoop down and fix your gaze upon it! Get on your knees and view it! If you watch it well, you will observe the print of a nail-wound. As surely as this word of God is true, your Lord has felt the chill of the death-shade. There is no gloom of spirit, apart from the sin of it, into which Jesus has not fallen; there is no trouble of soul, or turmoil of heart, which is free from sin, which the Lord has not known. Shall we not cheerfully advance to the cross when Jesus goes before?

A Hallowed Pathway.

I shall close my remarks upon this Via Mala of terrors by showing that, dark and gloomy as it is, it is not an unhallowed pathway. No sin is necessarily connected with sorrow of heart, for Jesus Christ our Lord once said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death." There was no sin in him, and consequently none in his deep depression. We have never known a joy or a sorrow altogether untainted with evil; but in grief itself there is no necessary cause of sin. A man may be as happy as all the birds in the air, and there may be no sin in his happiness; and a man may be exceeding heavy, and yet there may be no sin in his heaviness. I would, therefore, try to cheer any brother who is sad, for his sadness is not necessarily blameworthy. If his downcast spirit arises from unbelief, let him flog himself, and cry to God to be delivered from it; but if the soul is sighing, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," its being slain is not a fault.

II. Our second head, upon which we shall speak for a little while, is

The Pilgrim and his Progress.

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death." The pilgrim, you observe, first, is calm in the prospect of his dreary passage. I do not think that it is one half so hard to bear a trouble as it is to think of it beforehand. The poet well said that many of us "Feel a thousand deaths in fearing one."

The outriders of trouble are often of a fiercer countenance than the trouble itself. We suffer more in the dread of trial than in the endurance of the stroke. Here we have a man of faith who is calm in expectancy of ill: "I shall walk," says he, "through the valley of the shadow of death. I expect to do so, but I will fear no evil." Have you, my friend, a trouble evidently drawing near to you? Are there tokens of a storm all around you? Then look bravely at the future. Let not your heart fail you while waiting for the thunder and the hurricane. Pray to be calm in the prospect of trial; it is half the battle. Is it not written of the believer, "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord?"

Furthermore, the pilgrim is steady in his progress. "Yea, though I walk through the valley," says he. He does not run in haste: he #### Walks Quietly Along.

We are generally in a hurry to get our trouble over, like those who say, "If physic must be taken, let it be taken as soon as possible." There is a season for all things. Let us wait till the trouble comes from the hand of the Lord, for he will time it to the second. "There! I must know the worst of it," cries one, "I feel in such a horrible state of suspense that I must end it one way or another." But, my dear friend, faith is not in such a frightful bustle,—"He that believeth shall not make haste." Faith is quick when it has to serve God, but it is patient when it has to wait for him. There is no flurry about the Psalmist, "Yea, though I walk," says he—quietly, calmly, steadily. The pace of the experienced man of God is a walk. So David in effect declares,—I shall walk through the valley of the shadow of death as quietly as I walk my garden in the evening, or go down the street about my business. My affliction does not unfit me for the duty, I am not flurried and

Worried About It.

May God give you, my dear brothers and sisters, this calm faith. I pray that he may give it to me, for I greatly need it. I have often confessed my want of it, and confessed it with shame and confusion of face, for I serve a blessed Master, and I ought never to fear, nor allow pain of body to produce trembling of heart.

The next point about the pilgrim's progress is that he is secure in his expectancy. "Yea, though I walk through the valley." There is a bright side to that word "through." He expects to come out of the dreary pass to a brighter country. Just as the train of his life enters into the dark tunnel of tribulation, he says within himself,

"I Shall Come Out on the other side. It may be very dark, and I may go through the very bowels of the earth, but I am bound to come out on the other side." So is it with every child of God. If his way to heaven should lie over the bottom of the sea, hard by the roots of the mountains where the earth with her bars is about him, he will traverse the road in perfect safety. Oh, if we had more faith! Oh, if we had more faith! Life would be happy, trial would be light.

This pilgrim, while he is free from fear, is not at all fanatical or ignorant, since he gives a good reason for his freedom from alarm. "I will fear no evil," says he, "for thou art with me." Was there ever a better reason given under heaven for being fearless than this—that God is with us? He is on our side; he is pledged to help us;

He Has Never Failed Us; he must cease to be what he is before he can cast away one soul that trusts him. Where, then, is there room for terror? The child is confident because his mother is with him; much more should we be serene in heart since the omniscient, the omnipotent, the immutable God is on our side.

"I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." There is something more here than freedom from fear and a substantial reason for it, for the true believer rejoices in exalted companionship. "Thou art with me." Thou—thou—thou—the King of kings, before whom every seraph veils his face, abashed before the awful majesty of his Maker. "Thou art with me"—thou before whom the greatest of the great sink into utter insignificance—thou art with me. God is

With Every One of his children. We dwell in him, and he dwells in us. "I in them and they in me," says Christ. A vital, everlasting union exists between every believing soul and God, and what cause can there be for fear? "Thou art with me." Oh for grace to be brave pilgrims, and to make steady progress with heavenly company as our glory and defence.

Oh, may God give to everyone here present the faith which I have been talking about. Perhaps some of you have never trusted your souls with Christ. You know that faith is the way of salvation, why do you not follow it? Simply trust him; simply trust him; simply trust him now. It is wonderful the power of faith to change the heart. When you trust a man you love him. You cannot be an enemy to a man in whom you trust. The effect of faith upon the affections is marvellous; it changes their whole nature and bent. God give you to know Christ, for they that know his name will put their trust in him; and when you know him and trust him then shall you confess with us unto the Lord, "Blessed is the man that trusteth in thee." God bless you, dear friends, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The largest is 28 by 38 inches in size, and gives both ancient and modern names of places, with Scripture references, etc. Other maps show the journeys of the Apostle Paul, the wanderings of the Israelites between Egypt and Canaan, etc. Lists of prices and other details may be obtained by writing the firm at the address above given.

BUILDING FOR THE FAIR.

More Beautiful Structures Designed for the Exposition of 1893.

SOME of the designs thus far submitted to and approved by the World's Fair Commission for the buildings proposed to be erected at Jackson Park, Chicago, for the great fair of 1893, are of great beauty. All the architectural talent of the country has been stirred up to an effort to make the Exposition a splendid success. Today we present illustrations of three of these noble structures, taken from the designers' own drawings.

The Manufactures and Liberal Arts Building was designed by Mr. George P. Post of York City. It will be one of the largest build-with sculptured figures in bas-relief. The long facades of the great hall surrounding the building are composed of a series of arches, filled with immense glass windows. The lower portion of these arches, up to the level of the gallery floor and twenty-five feet in depth, is open to the outside, thus forming a covered loggia, which forms an open promenade for the public, and will provide a very interesting feature, particularly on the east side where it faces the lake. It is intended to locate here a number of cafes, where the great crowds can linger at their ease and enjoy the breezes and cool shadows of the afternoon. The spandrels of these arches are decorated with great shields, which contain the coat of arms of the states of the union.

ings in the Exposition in extent and area—800 feet wide and 1,700 long. In form it is rectangular, with an exhibition hall extending about a great interior court. This exhibition hall receives light from both sides and from the top, and each section is composed of a great central arch 200 feet wide, open to the roof, and 80 feet high, with galleries 50 feet wide on north and south of the great dome, are to be placed annexes, which can be used for the music hall and for the shoe and leather exhibit. Each of these annexes covers about 100,000 square feet in area, and taken in conjunction with the great area of the dome in the centre, will form an unrivaled suite of great halls. work, each manufacturer will have an opportunity to display his works in a separate window.

There are four great entrances, one in the centre of each facade. These are designed in the manner of triumphal arches, the central archway of each being forty feet wide and eighty feet high. Surmounting these portals is the great attic story, ornamented with immense sculptured eagles, eighteen feet high, and on each side above the side arches are great panels with inscriptions, and the spandrels are filled structure, notwithstanding its vast proportions. The style is Moorish. The Woman's Palace, wherein all the art and skill of American women are to be displayed to the world, is a handsome and commodious structure and will be sure to excite much attention from admiring visitors.

The three buildings presented above are yet in embryo, but it is expected that they will be pushed forward rapidly and finished sometime early in 1892, in ample time for the opening in 1893.

THE TWO WITNESSES.

The Later Events of the Last Seven Years After the Rapture.

BY H. W. FRY.

WHILE the portentous events already described [See Christian Herald of Sept. 30, page 611] are taking place on earth, while the people of God are being persecuted, and the name of God is being blasphemed by the great Antichrist (who is himself fully energized by the spirit of the dethroned Satan, just as Christ was fully energized by the Spirit of the true God) there are two mighty witnesses testifying in the midst of all this wickedness for the Lord Jesus Christ, thus warning the worldly and encouraging the persecuted saints. Now of Rev. 11: 3, 12? It is very evident they are persons of great authority and sanctity. Their history is not narrated by John as having been seen in vision by him, but it is dictated to him and he writes it, and the speaker is Jesus Christ himself, in the character of an angel. This gives special solemnity to the words he utters and the events he describes.

Previous to this period saints have been removed from the earth. But these are two very eminent saints, and it seems probable that they are specially sent from heaven by God to be his witnesses at this juncture. They can hardly be other than human beings, because they have to die (Rev. 11: 7.) Moreover, they can hardly be people who have already passed through the grave, as it is only "appointed unto men once to die," and if these had already died and were resurrected for the purpose of thus witnessing they would have to die twice.

The question arises, are there two eminent saints who have never died, and who would assume these honorable but onerous positions? We immediately think of who were translated to heaven without dying very probably for the special purpose of being reserved for this service. We have a further indication in the fact that Malachi prophesies that Elijah will be sent back about this time, and also in the fact that Christ says that before the resurrection Elias (or Elijah) must first come (Mark 9: 12) to do the work at the end that John the Baptist did at the beginning of the present dispensation. Christ's allusion in the verse following probably meant to convey that God, knowing that Christ's person and mission would be rejected by the Jews, instead of sending Elias on that occasion to do the work reserved for him, sent another, namely, John the Baptist, in his place, Elias himself being further reserved until the Time of the End really came, and he could be the means of restoring all things. No doubt these two witnesses will be mightily successful in restoring many Jews to faith in Christ, although they will be rejected and killed by the followers of Antichrist.

The marvellous lives and deaths and subsequent resurrection of these two celebrated men being accomplished,

The Rest of the Saints are, about this time, also taken up, they stand before his judgment seat, and receive their reward and the position which will be allotted to them in the Heavenly Kingdom; and we see them in heaven on the sea of glass in Rev. 14: 1-4, at which period will, no doubt, take place the glorious Marriage Supper of the Lamb. (Rev. 19: 9.)

Antichrist, for the first half of the great period of seven years, will probably act as though he respected, or at all events tolerated religion. He will certainly pander to the Roman Catholic Church during the earlier parts of his career, because we are told in Rev. 17 the false woman (the symbol of a system or church), rides upon the beast, "the beast" represented Antichrist or the head of a king of the then ruling temporal power. This shows at that period the Papacy will rather patronise Antichrist than Antichrist patronise the Papacy.

The fact also of his making a treaty with the Jews for seven years further indicates that he will consider them sufficiently important to be worth conciliating, and no doubt in some way, perhaps financially, they will be in a position to render him important service. But though it seems evident that he will partly build up his power and influence with the help of both yet it is equally evident that later on he will consider himself sufficiently strong and popular to do away with all religion, true and false, and appoint himself the sole object of veneration and worship. In proof of this, we see he destroys the Papacy (see Rev 17: 15-18); he breaks his treaty with the Jews (Daniel 9: 27); and then causes the daily sacrifices, which had been resumed, to cease, and the "abomination of desolation" to "stand in the holy place." We understand this to mean that instead of the "Holy of Holies" in the Jewish Temple at Jerusalem, which must previous to that time have been restored, being most holy to Jehovah, he will cause his own image, of which we read in Rev 13: 14-15, to be placed in the Temple, and worshipped in place of Jehovah!

In all this awful blasphemy he is, with the help of his great assistant the "false prophet" (Rev. 13: 11) fulfilling prophecy! (See Rev. 13: 5-6.) They will cause mankind actually to worship Satan or the dragon, as well as the Antichrist, or the beast. These three, the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, constituting the evil trinity as opposed to the Holy Trinity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

This attempt to force the worse kind of idolatry upon them will doubtless be steadfastly resisted by the Jews, not perhaps so much as an insult to God as to themselves, and the consequences of this and other disagreements will be that Antichrist and his people will hate the Jews and turn all their power against them with a view of wiping them entirely off the face of the earth, as he will have, previously to this time, already destroyed the Papacy. Although he will wield gigantic power, he will not have everything his own way. He will gather together from numerous nations a vast force, apparently irresistible, to crush Jerusalem; but the very fact that to carry out his object he will need so gigantic a host, seems to indicate that even he realizes that the foe he desires to crush will be powerful.

The force he collects together will probably occupy a line of country between Bozrah and Megiddo, a distance of exactly 1,600 Roman stadia or furlongs (Rev. 14: 20), and gigantic will be the host there concentrated. The Jews, with their allies, will doubtless have their headquarters in the neighborhood of Jerusalem for the defence of the capital, but they will be in sore straits. The majority will still be unconverted, although there will, of course, be a portion truly trusting in the Lord. The prospects, so far as they can see, are wholly against them, and there seems to be no way of escape!

But they offer up the prayer of Psalm 55: 1-9, as it is written in the 107th Psalm, "Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distress!" How does he do it? By sending Christ with his saints to reap the vintage of the earth as mentioned in Rev. 14: 14-20 and as the Great Conqueror of Rev. 19: 11-21. This results in the great and dreadful day of the Lord of Joel 2: 31 and other places. It is the period mentioned in Joel 3: 9-14, Zech 14: 1-5, Matt. 14: 30. It is the same time when the Stone of Daniel 2: 34-35 shall smite the image which represents the Gentile empires, and grind it to powder at the battle of Armageddon, and the "Stone" itself shall continue to increase, until it fills the whole earth.

But not only are the nations of the earth destroyed with terrific destruction and slaughter, other great events happen on this day. First, the Beast and false prophet are taken and cast down into Gehenna (Rev. 19: 20), thus ending their disastrous reign; and, second, the Dragon or Satan, is bound for a thousand years, thus suspending his vicious supremacy for a season; and, third, it ushers in the Millennium, the glorious period of one thousand years, during which time Jesus Christ will reign over the earth, and the knowledge of the Lord will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

SOUTHERN INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.

A REVIEW of the industrial development of the South is published which shows most gratifying progress. The number of new industries established during the last three months is 1,006, against 1,070 for the corresponding quarter of 1890 and 825 in the same quarter of 1889. During the quarter ending on Oct. 1, there were established in the Southern States 3 boot and shoe factories, 5 breweries, 36 brick and tile works, 2 car works, 14 canning factories, 8 compresses, and 49 cotton and woollen mills; 60 development and improvement companies have been organized in the South in the last three months, 33 electric light companies have been established in the last quarter, 24 flour and grist mills, 59 foundries and machine shops, 9 furnaces, 58 mining and quarrying companies and 23 oil mills; 126 railroad companies have been organized, and 39 steel and electric railways. This showing gives evidence of genuine prosperity.

THE RULE OF SERVICE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 18. Matt. 20: 26-28; Rom. 12: 10.

HERE is a law for the subjects of the King: "It shall not be so among you." Jesus is organizing a kingdom and he speaks with regal authority. There are to be no rulers in this kingdom. "All ye are brethren. It is an act of legislation.

The lawgiver, who alone has the right to legislate for the kingdom he founded, says, "It shall not be so among you." In other kingdoms there are rulers and men who exercise authority and dominion, but this kingdom which is to differ from all others, in all respects, is to be different from them in this. It is to be a Theocracy and there are to be no vice-gerents. Strange that a law promulgated so solemnly and emphatically should have been so often disobeyed! The fires of martyrdom, the bulls of excommunication, the fierce persecutions of past ages, have all been founded on violations of this law.

Yet the existence of ambition is recognized. There is a sphere assigned for "whosoever will be great among you." He is to serve. It is not a punishment for him, though it sounds like that. It seems like degrading a general to the ranks. But it is not so. Jesus appoints him a place in which his ambition can be gratified. He can become great by service. There is sound philosophy in that order. The highest of all honors, that which is spontaneous, that which is given to the man, not the office he holds, is given to the man who serves the community best. Saul was conscious of it when the people shouted, "Saul hath slain his thousands and David his tens of thousands." The world to-day honors its servants, though it does not always know who has done it real and lasting service. It finds out sometimes long after its servant is dead and it builds a monument or erects a statue over the grave of the man whom it scorned in life. He becomes great in history like Oliver Cromwell, Milton, Bunyan, and the Pilgrim Fathers. The man who serves, even by amusing and entertaining the world, is honored, and men would rather that a dozen nobles and potentates should die than that he should pass away. There is no way to genuine greatness, to true honor among men, but by service of some kind. Pioneers, statesmen, poets, inventors, philosophers, preachers, legislators, physicians—all these are servants and their place in the world's roll of honor is fixed by the value of the services they have rendered. Carlyle says that when the French people heard that Louis XV. lay sick and nigh to death they cynically remarked, "So much the worse for him." But if King Louis had served his people instead of manifesting indifference to their misery, there would have been sorrow and concern throughout France. The high place, the real place of honor is attained only by becoming a servant.

But Jesus was presenting no philosophical theory. He points to his own example. His life throughout was one of service. The outward act of washing his disciples' feet was a mere symbol of what his whole life had been. It was a life of toil, of poverty, of humiliation, of helpfulness and it was to be consummated by a supreme act of self-sacrifice. "I lay down my life," he said, "no man taketh it from me." He could do nothing greater on earth, than to give his life for the rescue of a world. He spared nothing. Everything was given up during his ministry and then last of all he gave his life. And his own words have come true. There is no name among men which is so loved and honored as his. The philosopher bowed before it and the humble follower would die rather than disown it. The story of that life holds men spell-bound still. It is told in the prisons, in the homes of the lawless and the ignorant, among the heathen of savage lands as well as in the palaces of the rich and the halls of learning, and its majestic beauty thrills the hearers and captivates all hearts. The Man of Sorrows, he who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, has legions of willing servants now, who give their lives to him and look for no other reward than that of his approval. Thousands are toiling in hardship, having turned their backs on all the world's honors, on home and friends and comfort, whose one hope is to hear the words from his lips which will repay them for all they have given up: "Well done good and faithful servant."

A FAMOUS Y. M. C. A. WORKER.

THE name of Mr. L. D. Wishard, whose portrait is here given, is a familiar one to our readers. He has become famous by his valuable services to the Young Men's Christian Associations in this and other lands. It is mainly due to his efforts, says a writer in the Young Men's Era, that the College Associations have been brought into union and closer intercourse. Mr. Wishard was strongly drawn to the Foreign Mission field and after leaving Hanover College, Indiana, he went to Princeton to prepare himself for that work. During all his college life he had been deeply interested in Y. M. C. A. work especially in colleges. He was a delegate to the national conference of college societies in Louisville, Ky., in 1877, which, indeed, he had actively labored to pro-note. That conference invited him to become General College Secretary and to give all his time to the work. This he was not able to do as he was still a student at Princeton and was intending to take a post-graduate course before going out as a missionary. He consented, however, to give a portion of his time to the work and he did so for two years. At the close of that period he had become so deeply interested in the work and saw in it so enormous a possibility of usefulness that he relinquished for a time his intention of becoming a missionary and determined to continue his labors among colleges. The results justified the decision. At the close of his tenth year of service 258 College Associations had been organized with an aggregate membership of 12,750. He has recently been on an extended Oriental tour with the object of organizing Y. M. C. Associations in the colleges of India, China, Japan and other lands. An account of his effort to form an Association in Jerusalem was recently published in these columns.

NOT UNDERSTOOD.

EXCELLENT advice to those King's Daughters, who feel that those about them do not understand them, is given by Mrs. Margaret Bostome in an article in the Ladies' Home Journal. She says: So many of you have written to me of the trial you have in not being understood, I think I must give you an experience of mine. Almost the last words I said on leaving Paris last summer, were: "I am glad I am going where I shall be understood." I had been so annoyed because, at the last moment, I went out intending to buy some candy for some little children, and when I reached the shop I could not get them to understand what candy was. I did not know French, and when I showed them what I wanted, they did not know what I said when I asked the price. I certainly did have a very awkward time, and I was glad I was going to London where I could use my native tongue. But when I said to my friend on my return to the hotel, "I am glad I am going where I shall be understood," it immediately rushed into my mind how much annoyance there comes in life, to say nothing of suffering, from not being understood. But there are two sides: I was annoyed because I was not understood in the candy shop; but the shopkeepers had their trouble too—they could not understand me. And I think in life one is too apt to say, "I am misunderstood."

I have heard a girl say of her own mother: "My mother does not understand me." It may be so; but would it not be better to say "I must try to understand mother better." must occasion her suffering to feel we do not understand each other." But after we make the best of everything, the fact remains that we are in a world of misunderstandings. We have not reached the country where we "know even as we are known." And I warn you, dear "Daughters" to take the comfort have often taken from the thought that there is just One who always understands you—the One who made you.

VARIED FIELDS OF LABOR.

In some of the reports of Circles of King's Daughters which have been sent to the Silence Cross are records of methods of usefulness which may be useful as suggestions to other circles. Thus, The King's Workers' Circle of New Rochelle, N. Y., has been engaged in making "Comfort bags," which are distributed among sailors. These bags furnished with needles, thread, a personal letter on religion and a New Testament, are very welcome to a sailor on a voyage. The Odds and Ends Circle of Morristown, N. J., sent a box to home missionary in Kansas, in which were useful articles of clothing and house linen purchased and made up by the members of the Circle. In addition they sent bags for the lumbermen containing linen bandages, scissors, buttons, thread, etc., a new Testament, and a copy of Moody and Sankey's Hymns. The Helping Circle, of Sturgeon Bay, Wis., has found homes for three orphan children and is helping them in various ways. The Golden Rule Circle of Cincinnati, O., has been making fancy articles which when sold realized a sum, a part of which was sent to the Home for Aged and Infirm at Lawrenceville, W. Va. Another part was sent to Mt. Adams to help furnish a room in the Women's and Children's hospital there. Besides this work, the Circle has been making rag carpets for the homes of the poor in the vicinity. The First Circle of Fargo, North Dakota, has opened an evening school for Scandinavian and German girls in a room granted free by the Board of Education and is teaching them to read and write English. All these things are done in His Name.

Y. P. S. C. E. COUNTY CONVENTION.

THE Annual Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of Suffolk County, N. Y., was held at Huntington, L. I., on Sept. 25. Delegates were in attendance from no less than twenty-five towns besides representatives of Societies in several towns of Queen's County. The morning session was held in the Second Presbyterian church and opened with devotional exercises conducted by the pastor of the church, Rev. B. V. Putnam. The Rev. S. T. Carter of the First Presbyterian church of Huntington extended a greeting to the delegates. The Rev. C. E. Hixox of Greenpoint, spoke on Christian service as promoted by the society's pledge. The best way to manage social gatherings was discussed by the Rev. C. A. Stonelake of Aquebogue. Officers were elected for the ensuing year as follows: Rev. A. E. Colton, Patchogue, president; Herman Hallock, Bellport, vice-president; Miss Sarah Maybee, Huntington, recording secretary; Miss Grace Edwards, Sayville, corresponding secretary.

The evening session was held in the First Presbyterian Church, and was largely attended. The Rev. William Kincaid, D.D., of New York, spoke earnestly upon the good work being accomplished by Christian Endeavor Societies throughout the country. An address was made by Rev. F. E. Clark, D.D., the parent of the organization. He was greeted with hearty enthusiasm. Dr. Clark described to the convention the progress of the Society in England. He was gratified to note the interest manifested in the movement there. It did not seem to be confined to any particular denomination, even the Church of England entering into the work.

GOD'S KINGDOM.

IN the freshness of the morning, in the glory of our youth,
With our hearts alert for service and our souls on fire for truth,
We are coming, we are coming, with this song in every mouth, God's kingdom marches on.

A highway we are building for the ransomed of the Lord,
With the Cross for its foundation and its arches of the Word:
It shall bridge the widest chasm with the promises of God,
Whose kingdom marches on.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells of a Visit to the Famous Mosque of St. Sophia in Constantinople.

LITTLE minds often dwell on big things. The children had been reading about the three famous churches of the world—St. Peter's in Rome, St. Paul's in London, and St. Sophia in Constantinople—and had been struck with the descriptions of their wondrous size and beauty and the marvellous richness of the interior decorations. It was with eager desire for more information concerning these noble edifices that they turned to Uncle John, with the usual juvenile confidence in his ability to enlighten them.

"So you are tired running around the globe with me, and you want to go to church this evening?" said the traveller, good-naturedly. "Well, where shall we have the sermon? In Italy, England, or beside the Golden Horn, in the land of the Turk?"

"Suppose we take St. Sophia, and, by the way, let me begin by telling you that you needn't look in your calendars for the name of such a saint, because you won't find it."

"How did they give it that name, then?" asked one of the little group, with a puzzled expression.

"The true name of the church is the Hagia Sophia, meaning the Church of the Sacred Wisdom. It stands near the government buildings and was erected in early apostolic days by Christian worshippers. In the year 531, the Emperor Justinian rebuilt it, employing 10,000 workmen during a period of seven years.

Some years later the dome fell in, but it was restored in even greater splendor than before. The decorations were the finest ever known: marbles, granite and porphyry of every hue, so beautiful was it that it was said an angel had inspired the architect and given the model for the structure. Tradition says that in it were venerated planks from Noah's ark. At all vents, it was surpassingly beautiful, with vaults, vestibules, belfries, galleries, minarets and altars, tiers of pillars and thousands of ornaments that hung from the lofty ceiling, and from which depended countless lamps, ornaments, ostrich eggs, and globes of polished metal or glass. Of the pillars, eight were from the Temple of the Sun in ancient Baalbec, and eight from the temple of Diana of the Phesians. It was even said that the four trumpets surmounting the doors were among those blown by the Levites when Jericho fell. Amid all its changes, St. Sophia still retains much of its beauty. It is in the form of a Greek cross, surmounted by a vast dome."

"I would like to see it," murmured Ted. "From the outside you could do that without trouble, but getting inside is quite another matter. I went one day with some friends, and though we had passes and a smart dragon-man, our party had a good deal of trouble. We had hardly been in ten minutes, when we were told to leave and roundly denounced by some of the Moslems as 'gildour infidels' and in other terms not quite complimentary. We had happened to choose for our visit a day during the Ramazan, when the Moslems were fasting.

"But what we saw convinced us that the splendors of the interior had not been overrated. To be sure, great paintings had been either gilded over or replaced by seraphim representing Israfel, Raphael, Michael and Gabriel, who, Moslems are taught to believe, were the companions of Mohammed. Each had six wings. Now, the pictures of the early Greek church, the mosaics and the crosses were grandly beautiful. They were made in the golden age of Greek art. There is a mosque called Chora outside the city, more ancient even than St. Sophia, and strangely enough, the Turks have been so filled with admiration for some of the pictures of those old Christian days in Chora, that they have allowed them to remain, instead of covering them with paint, gilt and whitewash."

half-gloom and listens to the responses made by the devout followers of the Prophet, who are all formed in lines facing toward the East and kneeling upon matting, with their shoes placed in wooden troughs in front of the lines. Their faces all look toward the Kaaba or holy house at Mecca. Visitors, too, are compelled to take off their shoes while service is in progress, and slippers are handed to them. There are no chairs or benches, such as we use in our churches.

"The Greeks look forward to the day," continued Uncle John, "when they will again possess St. Sophia. When Mohammed II. rode into this church on horseback, over the bodies of the Greeks who had fallen in its defence, and who lay there by hundreds, he strode up to one of the pillars and struck it with his sword, making a mark which is still shown. Then he reached across and placed his bloody hand on the wall where he left its impress. These were acts typical of the character of the Turk: impious, murderous and destructive. Turkey's power is gradually dying out and the whole world will be better when it is gone altogether."

A Child's Pertinent Query.

A LITTLE boy on his father's knee, says a writer in the St. Louis Observer, asked:

"Papa, is your soul insured?"

"Why do you ask, my son?"

"Because I heard Uncle George say that you had your house insured, and your life insured, but he did not believe you had thought of your soul, and he was afraid you would lose it. Can't you get it insured right away?"

It was all too true; and the father was led to seek the divine guarantee of his soul's well-being.

Value of Family Discipline.

WHAT greater or more convincing testimony of the value of training and family discipline could be found than the following from Mr.

"This cannot be better illustrated than by the growth of fruit and other trees. If they are allowed in the first years of their growth to become crooked, distorted and out of shape, it is found nearly or quite impossible, in later years, to bring them into symmetry and to make perfect trees of them.

"So with the child. Its early training lasts for a lifetime, and unless there are elements in its character, and will-power to correct its evil bringing up, it naturally grows worse and worse as it grows older."

WHERE THE NAME WAS GIVEN.

IT was at the ancient city of Antioch that the name "Christians" was first given to the followers of the Saviour. Rev. Theo. W. Harris, of Topeka, Kans., writing in the Mid-Continent on the subject, says: "If Paul ever took summer vacations, and he must have needed them, I imagine he would have rested himself about nine miles east of this Antioch Church. Where this valley widens out into more of a plain, you see before you on a hill a gateway in a ruined city wall. The remains of the wall run north and south for a considerable distance. Passing the gate, you ride for a quarter hour before seeing many people. Then Antakiyeh, a dilapidated mud village of 6,000 inhabitants on the south bank of the river. Everywhere are ruins of houses thrown down by earthquake, and in all directions, mounds that may cover important ruins. Crooked streets. A little local trade. No hotel. Follow the old city wall, which describes an ellipse whose major axis is four miles. Thick walls they were—four-horse chariots used to be driven on their top. Start at the west end of Antakiyeh, follow the line of the wall to the south up a hill, where it turns to the east. Further on is a background of two mountain peaks and the river valley.

"But in reverie I see more—Antioch as it has been. Grand stone temples, basilicas, theatres, baths, and palaces seem to rise out of the dust. Yon island in the river holds a palace, to which my eye is conducted by a magnificent colonnade. Two great avenues, intersecting, divide the rest of the city into quarters. Each avenue is quadruple-columned and roofed with Egyptian granite. Costly statues in every colonnade, paved streets, lined with marble residences, flashing chariots, richly costumed Romans, busy Jewish merchants hurrying between the bazaars,—a right royal city of 300,000 people, third in the Roman Empire. Going north to the gate by which I entered, Bab Bulus, I stand where I surmise there entered Antioch, in 34 A. D., some refugees from Jerusalem. They were Christians, driven from the Holy City by the murderers of Stephen (Acts 8: 1.) Probably within 2,000 yards of here, in the north-east quarter of Antioch, Nicolas, a Christian convert of the city, received them tenderly. A nucleus of believers thus formed, and grew rapidly. Barnabas was sent from Jerusalem as Synodical Missionary. He found so good a field that he immediately sent for Paul. Under the inspiration of two such men, no wonder the Antioch church attracted the gaze of the worldly Antiochians, who dubbed them "Christians."

Influencing the Little Ones.

THE most effective religious influence you exert upon your sons and daughters, says the Lutheran Observer, does not come from the books you teach them, but from the example you set before them. Your character streams into your children; it enters through their eyes and through their ears every hour. How quick they are to imitate! No photographic plate is more sensitive to the images which lodge there. Your irritation irritates them; your dissimulations make them tricky and deceitful; your malicious gossip sets "their teeth on edge." If you talk "money, money," they will conclude that the chief end of life is to get rich. If you prefer the playhouse to prayer-meetings, they will become lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God.

THE GREAT CHURCH OF ST. SOPHIA, CONSTANTINOPLE.

"Why did they destroy these pictures in St. Sophia?"

"Because the Moslem is by nature a vandal. There is an Eastern proverb to the effect that grass grows no more where the Turk plants his foot,—meaning that all beauty and usefulness perish when he invades. This is almost literally true. When Mohammed II. captured Constantinople in 1453, churches, libraries, paintings, sculptures fell before his ignorant and bigoted followers. For three days the city was given over to fire and sword. All the churches were changed into mosques. It was the same in Alexandria, Cairo, Jerusalem, and wherever the Turk rules. His idea of beauty is gilt and tawdry tinsel. In Sophia, between great pillars, are hung upon green canvass, glaring letters of gold, each letter of huge proportions, giving some Moslem proverb. But spite of all these defacements, I have never witnessed a finer sight than the interior, when it is illuminated with the six thousand lamps, by which one sees the priests kneeling in the

A. A. Brush, the ex-Warden of Sing Sing Prison, New York?

"Often when I have been asked what are the causes of crime, or what is the particular cause, that sends most of our men to prison," says Mr. Brush, "I have of late years invariably answered: the want of family discipline.

"The indulgence of the father and mother, who allow the child to grow up without any discipline to form character, leads almost inevitably to evil ways and consequently to prison."

"The child, even of tender years, who is indulged in its natural waywardness, and who is allowed to say to its father or its mother, 'I will' or 'I won't,' is in a fair way to become an inmate of our penal institutions.

"Parents are also responsible for the waywardness of their children which leads them into crime, from a practice of deceiving them.

"The intelligent child, when deceived by its parents in small things, is likely to form evil habits, which in its future life will not be easily eradicated."

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA MCNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

INDEED, Mr. Murray did not find that he himself was loved any the less, because other love was not repressed. Robert thought there never was such a good father as his. And now the buying was complete, and it was time to set out for Lal's Mountain. Mr. Murray and Robert were to live at the chalet, and the deaf-mute had put the little place in order, and was waiting to receive him. But the last exploit before leaving Philadelphia rendered Robert jubilant beyond description; he laughed until he cried, he laughed until he lay back on the sofa, and made their rooms at the hotel ring with his glee. What was he laughing at? At Jerry.

One of the wildest dreams of Robert's life became a reality. He sent for Jerry to come to the city, and he sent him back a new Jerry, whom scarcely any one recognized. He bought for Jerry a patent leg, with springs so artfully constructed that Jerry was more content than ever with his condition, only this "new leg needed a boot like a Christian," as Jerry put it. Also, Jerry got a glass eye, "a glass eye that looked just like a real one, so that Jerry himself could hardly tell which was real." When Jerry, with a booted patent leg, a glass eye, a new tweed suit, and a head for the first and last time manipulated by a city barber, appeared before Robert, Robert executed a war dance, shouted and shrieked with fun, until his father remonstrated in favor of order; and then the boy rolled on the sofa and laughed until he stopped from sheer exhaustion.

"I never had such fun as in rebuilding Jerry," he declared. "When we went to supper no one stared at Jerry; he looked just like other people. No one would guess that we'd bought nearly half of him at a shop."

"Well, it's time," said Jerry, surveying himself in the cheval-glass. "I'm nearly as good as new. No one would think that me and whiskey had had such troubles. I've got the better of the work of that old black bottle now."

"You should have a coat of arms, Jerry," said Robert. "I will illuminate an original one for you, in red and gilt, if you like, and a little black and blue. I should suggest a bottle, noir, prostrate, a Temperance Badge, d'or rampant, a pledge, gules volant, a few other things, and the motto, 'Rejoice not over me, oh! mine enemy.'"

"Robert, Robert, I fear you are going out of your head again!" said his father.

"There's just one thing more I want," said Robert, "and that I can't have. I would like to see Bop and the twins when Jerry goes into the mill to-morrow morning."

Robert found that there had been another thing which he wanted. At least he wanted it when it was offered to him—and that was a horse. A pair of saddle-horses came round one morning to the hotel for Mr. Murray and Robert. They went to ride them in Fairmount Park.

"How do you like that horse?" asked Mr. Murray.

"He is splendid!" cried Robert.

"I am glad you think so. He is yours. This one is mine. We are going to ride all the way from the city to the cottage at Lal's Mountain. How will you like that?"

"I couldn't like anything better."

"And I am negotiating for the purchase of an interest in a lumber-yard, so that I shall have an opening for you. After another year in school, or two perhaps, you must go into the business and learn it thoroughly from the beginning. No half-way doings for me."

That was a beautiful journey to Lal's Mountain. The world was in all the glory, the sunny warmth, the delicious perfumed air of June. Each mile of the way the scenery seemed to grow lovelier and lovelier. Robert told his father tales of his journeys down the Schuylkill in the barge Fair-Weather. Mr. Murray did not now resent these tales. He saw that his son had had a safe and happy childhood, which had moulded him in upright and generous feelings.

Stopping as they chose, to rest and view the scenery, it was the third day when the ride was ended by their reaching the mill. What a change was there. Beyond the mill, on the level, shaded by the big chestnut-tree, rose the new house. On the ridge of the roof sat Captain 'Zekiel, shingling away gayly.

On a scaffolding, at one corner, stood Bop, nailing on clap-boards, with the skill of an experienced carpenter. On the ground stood the reconstructed Jerry, also nailing on clap-boards. Up and down ran the youngest boy, carrying clap-boards to the workers. In the garden, near the beehives, singing to the bees, sat Pink in a white apron, her knitting in her hand as usual. The youngest sister saw them coming, and down the road she dashed, waving her hands, her hair floating out on the breeze. Pink heard the note of joy, and dropped her knitting. Eliza hurried from the kitchen, where she was cooking supper. She came waving a meat-fork, just as when Robert had first seen her, but not now to order off Robert. She would as soon have thought of ordering off Pink or Bop or the twins, as her dear Robert. The cries of welcome echoed up to the new house, and Captain 'Zekiel scrambled from the roof, Bop came nearly headlong from the scaffolding, Jerry dropped his hammer, and the whole family clustered about Robert as bees about a new queen.

They all had supper in the mill-kitchen, and Eliza brought out her best preserves and the fruit-cake which she had kept in readiness. It was nine o'clock before Robert and the Superintendent set off for their cottage, where the deaf-mute was waiting for them, the rooms decked with flowers in festive array.

Then began a joyous summer. Robert helped work on the new house. He nailed on clap-boards, and watched the hanging of doors, and he and Pink did nearly all the inside painting, and under his direction, as he said "it was all the fashion," they stained and varnished a walnut border a foot wide around each floor "to go around the carpets."

"Only, you know, Robert, it will look rather funny before we get any carpets," said Pink.

"Until then," said Robert, gravely, "we will pretend that the white wood part is matting." And they both laughed with delight at this conceit.

As to all that furniture which he had bought, Robert said never one word. He overheard the family planning where they should place their few small possessions in the new house, and he laughed in his sleeve.

At last the house was finished and cleaned. Then Robert announced that the next day would be his birthday, and they must all drop work, and spend it with him at the chalet.

"But, Robert, we meant to move to-morrow," said Eliza.

"Oh, put off moving for a day, can't you, mother? I shall take it very hard of you if you do not spend with me the first birthday I have ever kept."

"I knew that remark would fetch 'em," he said, in gleeful confidence to his father.

It fetched them. They all came up the hill and spent the day, and had a very merry time.

During the day several loaded wagons stopped at the new house, and the Britt family went there in a very free and easy fashion. They set the new furniture in place, and brought in and distributed all the things from the living-rooms at the mill. Curtains were put at all the windows and carpets were laid.

When the Allens at nightfall came home, they went into the new house to take a look, and could hardly believe their eyes. It was furnished throughout. In the parlor was the organ, a music-rack, music, a little book-case, some books, pictures on the walls, a black sofa, and some cane-seat chairs around a nice table. Eliza's kitchen-ware was in the new kitchen. At the back door waited a hogshhead of new crockery.

"It looked," said Captain 'Zekiel, "just as if some other people had moved in while they were gone and meant to live there."

"It looked," said Bop, "just as if they owned Aladdin's lamp. Was there anything else they could wish for?"

No. Bop did not think there was.

"They were so rich, they felt like kings and queens!"

They slept in the new house that night; that is, they sat up and walked around and talked and looked, and Captain 'Zekiel rubbed his hands and said over and over again:

"Oh, what bad bargains I make; don't I, 'Liza? There was Jerry, and there was Robert. But Robert—I should have carried off to the poorhouse, shouldn't I 'Liza? Oh, a Bad Bargain was Robert!"

"The Bargain you made about Robert was the best bargain you ever made in your life, 'Zekiel."

"So it was," said Captain 'Zekiel, seriously. "If it had not been for that bargain I made about him, by now I should be in a drunkard's grave, and you and the children would be scattered 'most anywhere, having hard lines, all of you. I did not see my danger then. I felt that there was no danger, but now I see where I stood. I was loving the drinking more and more each day, and was going down-hill just as fast as I could."

"Why, father," said the twin-boy, "you don't mean to say you could ever have been a drunkard, do you?"

"Yes, I do. Take warning! Any man may become a drunkard who begins to drink at all. True, he may not, but the chances are very heavily against him. There is one safe way—the way of total abstinence."

"Hold on there, Captain," cried Jerry, "even that is not always a safe way. I didn't find it so. I never drank a drop, but I lost a leg and an eye along of drink, though to look at me now you might not think it."

"Come right in and go to bed," said Eliza. "It is nearly two o'clock in the morning. The idea of you boys turning somersaults over a brand-new carpet!"

"It's the carpet and the house and all the other things which make us so happy," cried Bop, and he and his brother, followed by Jerry, marched up to bed singing uproariously.

"They'll have the roof down with their noise," laughed Eliza.

"It is a strong roof, and the song is a good song," said Captain 'Zekiel; "but, 'Liza, you and I are older, and the song we feel to sing is a different song, 'The lines have fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage,' and 'What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?'"

"And there is another, Ezekiel," said Eliza, laying her hand on his arm; "a song which belongs to you, for you always had a generous heart, doing good as you had opportunity—'Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days'; 'Blessed are they that sow beside all waters.'"

And, at last, silence and sleep fell over the new home.

All the neighborhood rejoiced in the improved fortunes of the Allens, and in the happiness and restored health of the Superintendent.

The history of Robert was a beautiful little romance let into the commonplaces of Lal's Mountain.

It seemed that now all things would prosper with Captain 'Zekiel. He found business improving. The summer hotel with its guests promised to be a source of revenue.

The first trip of the new Fair-Weather was an event. All the people from the tourists' camp went. For some days the boat was crowded every trip. Men, women, and children—all wanted to go to Lacy in the steam-barge. Also, it was chartered by the artists for longer excursions.

In the new, white house, which had been the ideal of her days, Mrs. 'Liza lost her careworn look and took a fresh lease of life. She woke in the morning, she slept at night, without being burdened with that terrible mortgage.

Captain Allen had now his laugh and joke for everybody. He had always been cheery, now he was simply hilarious.

"There is one thing more I am thinking of, Mrs. Allen," said the Superintendent. "I want to send Pink to a good school for two or three years. Yes, yes, it is altogether better that Pink should have advantages that she cannot get here. We will find her a school near Philadelphia. I have given you half of Robert, I think you must give me half of Pink."

"It seems only fair play," said Mrs. Allen with a laugh.

"I shall have a fine time next winter," said Mr. Murray. "Once a month, Robert, you will come home from Friday afternoon till Monday and once a month Pink will come in the same way. I shall give one of my rooms to Pink and call it by her name. But I shall not have you both home the same week, mind you. That would be a feast one week and a famine the next. I shall have my company by installments, so I will not be too lonesome."

"All right," laughed Robert and Pink.

It was through "The Captain's Bargain" that fairer fortunes came to all the Captain's family. "There is that giveth and yet increaseth."

And three or four years later, when Robert was a diligent young man of business in the city, his father said to him, one day, of some new venture:

"I made a deal of money by that, Robert. You will be a rich man. What will you do with your fortune?"

"Father," said Robert, "you remember how you used to pass the old mill and lean down from your horse, and hand me toys or boxes of candy and say, 'What will you do with them?' What did I use to say?"

"You used to say, 'Half for Pink,'" said his father.

"Well, I haven't changed my views yet," said Robert.

"All right," said his father; "only remember that we are all only stewards and leaseholders of God, and we should say of what we have, 'All for Heaven and for Humanity.'"

THE END.

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.

To Begin in No. 41 of "The Christian Herald."

IN number 41, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will begin the publication of a new Serial Story of great dramatic power and thrilling interest, entitled:

"ALEPH, THE CHALDEAN;
OR, THE MESSIAH AS SEEN FROM ALEXANDRIA."

The author is that distinguished writer on Biblical Times and Topics, the Rev. E. F. Burr, D.D., LL.D. The exclusive right of the serial publication of this remarkable story, which is declared by leading critics to be equal if not superior to "Ben Hur," has been secured by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The story deals with events in the time of Christ and is of transcendent interest and attractiveness to all Christian readers. Pictures of domestic and public life in the First Century of the Christian era, when all Palestine and a part of Egypt were under Roman rule, are given with rare vividness; the various types of races to be found in Alexandria, then the greatest city of the world, are set forth with a master pen, and the conflict of the adherents of rival deities and creeds then raging is graphically described.

Aleph, a young student, comes from Chaldea to Alexandria, where he is astounded at the shallow morality, superstition and idolatry that prevail. Here he first hears, from travellers returned from Palestine, of the Messiah born in Bethlehem. The gradual growth of the Christians throughout Egypt; their bitter opposition by the fanatical fire-worshippers and the Alexandrian Jews; their perils and privations, and their persecution by the Romans and by Simon Magus the magician, are all portrayed with the fidelity of a series of photographs from life.

Specially attractive and noble are the personalities of Seti, the priest, Rachel, the beautiful "Gem of Alexandria" and Cimon, the Greek, the friend of Aleph. The pageantry of Rome's armies, the excitements of the gladiatorial arena, the peril of Aleph in a dungeon, whence he is to be thrown to the lions, and the long line of afflictions to which God's people were subjected, finally ending in the abasement of their persecutors, together constitute the elements of a powerful narrative, which is historically and archæologically a mine of valuable information.

But the great and surpassing spiritual interest in the story centres around the Saviour's life and ministry, as reflected from distant Palestine, their influence upon the Egyptian metropolis and the gradual spread of the belief in his doctrine. The subtle charm of the story, pervading it at every page like a delicate perfume, is a lofty spirituality which, no less than the high literary ability it displays, must make it exceedingly popular among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

MAN'S HISTORY.*

Women as Early Christians.

AMONG the western tribes, when they advanced on the south of Europe in their hostile excursions, and at last effected settlements in Gaul and Italy, and took the place of the old inhabitants, the women continued still to prevail in the council and in war, and to sway the minds of their countrymen to newer views and enterprises. And it was this same deep-laid sentiment which in after ages—a thousand years from the period I have been particularly describing—gave birth to knight-errantry and all those extravagances of romantic exploit which have taken the name of chivalry. This is regarded as a very curious exhibition of manners, and the true source of that high estimation of the female sex which is claimed for modern times; but I believe this to be a mistake, and that these were but the extravagances, or rather the affectations and absurdities, which sprung out of a just and natural sentiment which had prevailed for ages among this race of men, and had exhibited some of its most beautiful and interesting features before either knights or troubadours were heard of: the tribes (these were chiefly German) which in the fifth century of the Christian era overran Gaul and Italy, and at last sacked Rome itself, were distinguished by this noble characteristic. And it has justly been regarded as the main cause which led them to embrace so readily, as they are known to have done, the Christian religion. We know not exactly how far women here led the way; but certainly it could be considered no way discreditable, either to the faith or the understandings of those rude converts from the wilds of Germany, if those same women whom they so highly venerated, and to whose admonitions they often lent a willing ear in the affair of battles and sieges, were now also the first often to incline them to embrace that mode of faith and worship.

The Phœnicians.

The Phœnician race, with which to some extent I class the modern Spaniard, was at one time not destitute of vigor. Herodotus informs us that at an early period they circumnavigated Africa; and there are traditions of their having visited the Madeira Islands, perhaps the Azores: conjecture only can affirm that they touched, in their navigations, this continent. They had the instinct of trading deeply laid in them, a fine propensity when regulated by moral principle, but infinitely more degraded than the military genius when it is not. It has been observed that, wherever a people has been corrupted by sheer traffic, when they fall they fall forever; they are incapable of redemption: fraud is a cancer which is incurable in individuals or nations. The Phœnician race became proverbial for this trait, as everyone knows, among their neighbors: punica fides meant the absence of good faith, downright treachery. I am sorry to be obliged to trace a considerable portion of the American lineage to this stock, but the fact cannot be concealed.

THE ROCK OF GIBRALTAR.†

"The Rock is divided from the mainland by that low spit of sand. It is only a few hundred yards wide, and the sea goes round at the back of it and along the other side of the spit, so anything coming to attack it must advance along the spit under the fire of the guns. That building standing upon the hill above the town is the old Moorish castle, and there are plenty of modern batteries scattered near it, though you can't see them. You see, the Rock rises sheer up from the spit, and it is only on this side, close to the water's edge, that the place can be entered. The weak side of the place is along the sea face. On the other side the Rock rises right out of the water; but on this side it slopes gradually down. There are batteries all along the water's edge, but if the place were attacked by a fleet strong enough to knock these batteries to pieces, and silence their guns, a landing could be effected. At the southern end the rocks are bolder, and there is no landing there. That is called 'Europa Point' and there is a battery there, although you cannot make it out from here."

Bombarding a Man-of-War.

By this time the drum was beating to arms in the vessel below, the shots fired having given the alarm, and lights were seen to flash along the decks. In two minutes the great guns were loaded and these opened with a fire of grape upon the deck of the vessel, which was near enough to be distinctly seen by the glare of the blue lights. As the first gun was fired, an answering flash came from the sea as the frigate also opened fire. For five minutes the guns were worked fast; then two lights burst out in close succession ahead and astern of the barque.

"Cease firing grape; load with round shot!" the lieutenant shouted; but a moment later a loud cheer broke from the English sailors as, by the lights of the boat, the Spanish ensign was seen to run up to the peak of the barque, and then at once to fall to the deck again. The barque had surrendered.

"Now, gunner, spike the guns!" the lieutenant ordered, "and then tumble them off the carriages."

The sailors fell in and marched back to the huts. . . . In a short time the defeated Spanish prize was alongside the frigate, and Mr. Rawdon came aboard to report.

"The ship is the San Joaquin, sir, mounting twenty-four guns with a crew of 220 men. Her casualties are heavy. The men had just poured up on deck it seems when the battery opened fire. The captain, first-lieutenant and fifty-six men are killed, and there are forty-three are wounded. We have no casualties."

A GRATEFUL SHEIK'S OFFER.‡

"Muley," said the sheik (to his European captive), "you have done us a great service. I acted upon your advice and it has turned out well. You have shown that you are a brave fighter as well as one strong in counsel. I have no son, and if you are willing to accept the true faith, I will adopt you as my son and you will no longer be a slave but one of the tribe."

Edgar was silent for a moment, thinking how he had best couch his refusal in terms that would not anger the sheik.

"I am grateful for your offer, sheik," he said, "which does me great honor, but were I to accept it I know that even in your eyes I should be viewed with contempt. Honorable men do not change their religion for profit, sheik; you were born a follower of the prophet; I was born a Christian. We both believe what we were taught as children; it is in our blood and cannot be changed. Were I to say the words that would make me a Mohammedan, you know well that I should say them with my lips and not with my heart; that I would be a false Mohammedan as well as a false Christian. I could as easily change the color of my skin as my religion and you in your heart would be the first to condemn and despise me, did I do so."

The sheik sat for some time in silence.

"You are right, Muley," he said at last. "A man cannot change his religion as he can his coat. I did not think of it when I made the offer. But, as you say, I would rather die a thousand deaths than abjure Mohammed; and though I now think you worthy to be my son, and to become a sheik after me, I might not think you worthy did you become a renegade."

THE CHRISTIAN'S ROSARY.

A Prayer For Each Day in the Week.
SABBATH.

SABBATH, rest-day, crown of all the seven,
Give me, Lord, to-day, a glimpse of heaven:
Feed me with the food that angels taste,
Earnest of the everlasting feast.

MONDAY

On the threshold of a busy week,
Lord, Thy guidance and Thy grace I seek:
Use me at Thy pleasure, here or there:
Serving, waiting, I have not a care.

TUESDAY.

Through the tangled business of the day,
Keep me, blessed Saviour, lest I stray;
Lest I lose the golden thread of love
Holding me secure to things above.

WEDNESDAY.

Lord, be pleased to let Thy Love-light shine
With full glory, through this heart of mine
Into some poor, suffering life to-day,
Which would else in doubt and darkness stray.

THURSDAY.

What shall come to-day? O, let me rest
Every care with Jesus and be blest;
Joy or sorrow, all shall work in me,
Be Thy Spirit that which pleaseth Thee.

FRIDAY.

May my conversation be with grace:
Cheerfulness irradiate my face;
Hands be strong for all that should be done
Feet, on Thy sweet errands quick to run.

SATURDAY.

Cumbered with much serving, still I'd be Mindful of Thy tender care for me;
All I do, done for my Saviour's sake,
Please to accept, my heart's glad offering take.

Days and weeks and years are gliding on:
Soon life's narrow hand-breadth will be run.
May each hour I spend in service here,
In Thy Book, approved, at last appear.

CHANGED INTO THE SAME IMAGE.

(II. Cor. 3: 18; Rom. 8: 28-39.)

FAR off, in a distant quarry,
Lay a block of marble rare,
Rough hewn, and by man unnoticed,
It had lain neglected there.

At length came the great, good Master,
He knew its intrinsic worth;
"This marble," He murmured, gently,
"Shall witness for Me on earth."

Then day after day unheeded,
For none understood His skill,
He worked on that shapeless marble
The plan of his wondrous will.

With instrument keen and varied,
He sculptured it hour by hour,
Till slowly its pure white lustre
Began to attest his power.

It grew into human likeness,
A man in his best estate;
Then all, as they saw it, marvelled
And owned that the work was "great."

But time passed on, and the Sculptor
Continued his work so fair;
Then men saw, with speechless wonder,
The Master's own image there!

And like it grew, and liker,
As stroke after stroke was given,
Till earth whispered, grave and awe-struck,
"Made meet for the courts of heaven!"

"I see they have put Ivory Soap all over the house. I thought Ivory was a laundry soap only."

"Oh, no. Certainly not. You're behind the times. Why, there's no toilet soap, American or foreign, that can be compared with it. It really deserves to be called a complexion soap; and you'll say so after a month's use of it."

(In general, the non-users of Ivory Soap know nothing about it. After a first trial very few persons fail to use it regularly.)

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

G. W. Snell, Chicago, Ill. See answer about Thomas a-Kempis in No. 37 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Elizabethville, Pa. Where can I get information regarding Keeley's cure for alcoholism?

Write to Dr. Keeley, at Dwight, Ills.

S. S. Clare, Clement's Vale, N. J. What are your views in reference to dancing?

See answer to question in No. 31 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

John R. Ferguson, Fredonia, Kan. Infidels say the New Testament was compiled at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325. Were the copies of the New Testament lately discovered in Egypt as mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of an earlier date?

We do not know that any copies of the New Testament Books were discovered in Egypt.

W. Young, New York City. Where can I obtain a copy of the U. S. Census Report?

Write to the Superintendent of Census at Washington, D. C.

M. S. Damascus, Ohio. Authorities which I have consulted, say that the body of Columbus was taken from Havana to Genoa, his birth-place, on July 2, 1887, and there buried. Is this correct? 2. Is the Holy Coat now exhibited at Treves, the coat worn by the Saviour?

1. We have no authentic record of the record of the transfer at hand. 2. An article in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD sufficiently answers that question.

Mr. H. P. Rundell, Plattsville, Wis. Is the World's Fair to take place in 1892 or 1893?

It certainly will not take place in 1892, but may reasonably be expected to occur in 1893. It was originally intended to hold the Fair in 1892, but the time was found to be too short or the necessary preparation.

W. A. Shermansdale, Pa. Can a member or an elder of the Presbyterian Church, be read out of the Church without a trial, before the Sessions, even if the whole congregation believe him guilty?

We refer you to the Book of Discipline which any Presbyterian minister or clerk of Sessions will show you, for instruction in this matter.

D. Leonard, Burlington, Lycoming Co., Pa. If God did not forbid polygamy in the time of David, what Scriptural authority have we for believing that he has forbidden it since?

Paul laid down the rule that a bishop should be the husband of one wife. In all the apostolic teachings, the marriage relationship is spoken of as between one man and one woman. Adam received Eve from the Lord as his wife, not as one of his wives. (See Gen. 2:24.) the fifth chapter of Ephesians, the Church compared to a wife, the single number being used throughout the simile, implying that a Christian is expected to have but one wife. Polygamy and polyandry were conditions peculiar to barbarism. As nations emerged from barbarism, and as woman rose to her proper place in the social and religious life, these conditions disappeared. (See also Eph. 5:31-33.)

S. S. Wisman, Brooklyn, N. Y. Explain in a simple way how shells are made and give any information concerning the chambered nautilus, and the oyster.

Shells are a calcareous or limy exudation, which begins very early in the life of the fish, insect, and grows with its growth. It is apparent reversion of the usual order of animal life, most animals having the limy or bony skeleton within the body as a support or framework, while mollusks use it exteriorly. The chambered nautilus has a spiral symmetry.

rical shell divided into partitions. The thin plates or layers called laminae cross each other abruptly and the siphon or tube occupies the centre of each partition. For full technical description consult a volume on natural history.

Wm. P. Squires, Puyallup, Washington. In what language were the Gospels originally written?

2. How do we know that Christ was crucified, or whether he met his death by strangulation, or was beaten to death?

1. Papias of Hierapolis, a distinguished commentator, who wrote five books between 130 and 140 A. D., says: "Matthew wrote his logia in Hebrew and each man interpreted them as best he could." Mark probably wrote in Greek, as he gives in three places the exact words of Christ and then translates them into Greek. (See Mark 5:41, 7:34, and 15:34.) The words used by the Saviour were in Aramaic, a corruption of Hebrew. There are now no manuscripts of the Gospels in existence except those in Greek. 2. History, both sacred and secular, declares that he was crucified, and there can be no question whatever on this point. Death may have resulted either from exposure or heartbreak, certainly not from beating, for not a bone of the Saviour was broken. Nor from strangulation, for at the last he "cried with a loud voice," from the cross. See answer to W. W. in No. 36 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Some merchants get the best they can; some get the meanest they can.

Your dealer in lamp-chimneys--what does he get for you?

There are common glass and tough glass, tough against heat. There are foggy and clear. There are rough and fine. There are carefully made and hap-hazard.

You can't be an expert in chimneys; but this you can do. Insist on Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass" which-ever shape you require. They are right in all those ways; and they do not break from heat, not one in a hundred.

Be willing to pay a nickel more for them.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC R. R. runs through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

CHAPTER I.

DOWN THE NILE.

FROM Coptus downward on the dreamy Nile—past innumerable canals with their primitive water-wheels; past populous villages and lordly villas embowered in sycamores and palms; past still more lordly ruins, silent now for many a century; past caravans and pleasure-parties and bodies of Roman soldiery, foot and horse, coming and going on the thoroughfares that closely skirt the river on either hand; past water-craft of all sorts, from skin-buoyed rafts carrying sandstone from Chennu to the Delta up to gay barges carrying travellers to Thebes and the dead Egypt of the Pharaohs; past crocodiles and hippopotami and pelicans sporting in the water, or basking along the muddy shore as so many logs or stones.

Who are moving downward on the dreamy Nile to Alexandria—in a large merchant vessel, whose lateen sail swells gently to the south wind? A large number of persons with whom we have no special concern. Two persons with whom we have great concern, and whose appearance is striking enough to draw much attention from their fellow-travellers, as they stand together watching the ever-changing scene.

Both wear the classic Greek dress, of plain material. The older, a man of some sixty years, so Greek in feature that no dress is needed to proclaim his nationality. The other, a young man of perhaps twenty years, as a face of a different type.

And what a face! Is it Egyptian? No. Is it Roman? No. Is it Hebrew? No. As we take our privilege of drawing very near, and of looking carefully at those features on all sides, and even of lifting the abundant brown hair from the broad white forehead that swells so fully over the steady and somewhat austere gray eyes, we would rather say that we are looking on the original type from which all other racial faces have varied, so readily does it express the better elements of this mountaineer here among the lowlands of the Nile?

Yes, the young man must

He is evidently looking at the country for the first time. Everything seems to interest him much. His companion, as plainly, is by no means an entire stranger to the scene, and yet shows the degree of interest natural to one who is revisiting a country after long absence. The Greek language flows easily between the two; as the elder from time to time points this way and that, and seems to be recalling and introducing old acquaintances, as the vessel slowly glides by object after object.

"It is now more than thirty years," said the Greek, whom we will call Cimon, "since I left Egypt; but I notice very few changes—here and there a new quay or villa, or an old palace decorated with new gardens and trees. I once knew who lived in some of the finer dwellings; for example, yonder low castellated building that covers so much ground on the eastern bank. It is very ancient, and the gradual rise of the land from the annual deposits by the river, long since converted the lower story into a dungeon. The Roman proprætor lived here a part of the year. It once belonged to Cleopatra; was given by her to a favorite noble and relative, from whom the Romans took it, as being heirs to all the Pharaohs."

The vessel, from some cause, now approached the palace they were observing, and the two men walked to the right side of the boat for a closer view. While standing here and noticing various points of a structure that was now seen to be a fortress as well as a palace, they became aware of a man standing by their side.

"You seem interested in this place," he said in a grave but courteous tone; "can I give you any information about it? I happen to be particularly well acquainted in this neighborhood."

They had turned to see a man of majestic stature and mien, far advanced in life, but still erect as a palm and keen-eyed—as thoroughly Egyptian in his look and dress as Rameses the Great.

"I see that you are strangers, and not Romans," he added apologetically, "and old age likes to speak of the past when it can do so safely." And he looked around as if to assure himself that they were alone.

Cimon politely thanked the Egyptian, and said that he had just been telling his young

THE CITY OF ALEXANDRIA IN THE TIME OF CHRIST.

A STOUT GRASP.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon from the text: "And his hand clave unto the sword." II. Samuel 23: 10.

A GREAT general of King David was Eleazar, the hero of the text. The Philistines opened battle against him, and his troops retreated. The cowards fled. Eleazar and three of his comrades went into the battle and swept the field, for four men with God on their side are stronger than a whole battalion with God against them. "Fall back!" shouted the commander of the Philistine army. The cry ran along the host: "Fall back!" Eleazar having swept the field throws himself on the ground to rest, but the muscles and sinews of his hand had been so long bent around the hilt of the sword that the hilt was imbedded in the flesh, and the gold wire of the hilt had broken through the skin of the palm of the hand, and he could not drop this sword which he had so gallantly wielded. "His hand clave unto the sword." That is what I call magnificent fighting for the Lord God of Israel. And we want more of it. I propose to show you this morning how Eleazar took hold of the sword and how the sword took hold of Eleazar.

O my friends, in this Christian conflict we want a tighter grip of the Gospel weapons, a tighter grasp of the two-edged sword of the truth. It makes me sad to see these Christian people who hold only a part of the truth, and let the rest of the truth go, so that the Philistines, seeing the loosened grasp, wrench the whole sword away from them. The only safe thing for us to do is to put our thumb on the Book of Genesis and sweep our hand around the Book until the New Testament comes into the palm, and keep on sweeping our hand around the Book until the tips of the fingers clutch at the words: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." I like an infidel a great deal better than I do one of these namby-pamby Christians who hold a part of the truth and let the rest go. By miracle God preserved this Bible just as it is, and it is a Damascus blade. The severest test to which a sword can be put in a sword factory is to wind the blade around a gun barrel like a ribbon, and then when the sword is let loose it flies back to its own shape. So the sword of God's truth has been fully tested, and it is bent this way and that way, and wound this way and that way, but it always comes back to its own shape. Think of it! A Book written eighteen centuries ago, and some of it thousands of years ago, and yet in our time the average sale of this Book is more than twenty thousand copies every week, and more than a million copies a year. I say now that a book which is divinely inspired and divinely kept and divinely scattered is a weapon worth holding a tight grip of.

I see hundreds, perhaps thousands, of young men in this audience. Do not be ashamed, young man, to have the world know that you are a friend of the Bible. This Book is the friend of all that is good, and it is the sworn enemy of all that is bad. An eloquent writer recently gives an incident of a very bad man who stood in the cell of a Western prison. This criminal had gone through all styles of crime, and he was there waiting for the gallows. The convict standing there at the window of the cell, this writer says, "looked out and declared, 'I am an infidel.' He said 'I am an infidel,'" and the eloquent writer says, "every man and woman there believed him." And the writer goes on to say, "If he had stood there saying, 'I am a Christian,' every man and woman would have said, 'He is a liar!'" This Bible is the sworn enemy of all this wrong, and it is the friend of all that is good. Oh, hold on it. Do not take part of it and throw the rest away. Hold on to all of it. There are so many people now who do not know. You ask them if the soul is immortal, and they say, "I guess it is, I don't know; perhaps it is, perhaps it isn't." Is the Bible true? "Well, perhaps it is, and perhaps it isn't; perhaps it may be figuratively, and perhaps it may be partly, and perhaps it may not be at all." They despise what they call the Apostolic creed; but if their own creed were written out it would read like this: "I believe in nothing, the maker of heaven and earth, and in nothing which it hath sent, which nothing was born of nothing, and which nothing was dead and buried and descended into nothing, and arose from nothing, and ascended to nothing, and now sitteth at the right hand of nothing; from which it will come to judge nothing. I believe in the holy agnostic church and in the communion of nothingarians, and in the forgiveness of nothing, and the resurrection of nothing, and in the life that never shall be. Amen!" That is the creed of tens of thousands of people in this day. If you have a mind to adopt such a theory I will not. "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, and in the holy catholic church, and in the communion of saints, and in the life everlasting. Amen."

As I look at Eleazar's hand I also notice his spirit of self-forgetfulness. He did not notice that the hilt of the sword was eating through the palm of his hand. He did not know it hurt him. As he went out into the conflict he was so anxious for the victory he forgot himself, and that hilt might go never so deeply into the palm of his hand, it could not disturb him. "His hand clave unto the sword." O my brothers and sisters, let us go into Christian conflict with the spirit of self-abnegation. Who cares whether the world praises us or denounces us? What do we care for misrepresentation, or abuse, or persecution in a conflict like this? Let us forget ourselves. That man who is afraid of getting his hand hurt will never kill a Philistine.

We see how men forget themselves in worldly achievement. We have often seen men who in order to achieve worldly success will forget all physical fatigue and all annoyance and all obstacle. Just after the battle of Yorktown, in the American Revolution, a musician, wounded, was told he must have his limbs amputated, and they were about to fasten him to the surgeon's table—for it was long before the merciful discovery of anæsthetics. He said, "No, don't fasten me to that table; get me a violin." A violin was brought to him, and he said: "Now go to work as I begin to play," and for forty minutes, during the awful pangs of amputation, he moved not a muscle nor dropped a note, while he played some sweet tune. Oh, is it not strange that with the music of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and with this grand march of the church militant on the way to become the church triumphant, we cannot forget ourselves and forget all pang and all sorrow and all persecution and all perturbation.

We know what men accomplish under worldly opposition. Men do not shrink back for antagonism, or for hardship. You have admired Prescott's "Conquest of Mexico," as brilliant and beautiful a history as was ever written; but some of you may not know under what disadvantages it was written—that Conquest of Mexico—for Prescott was totally blind, and he had two pieces of wood parallel to each other fastened, and totally blind, with his pen between those pieces of wood he wrote, the stroke against one piece of wood telling how far the pen must go in one way, the stroke against the other piece of wood telling how far the pen must go in the other way. Oh, how much men will endure for worldly knowledge and for worldly success, and yet how little we endure for Jesus Christ. How many Christians there are that go around saying, "O my hand, my hand, my hurt hand; don't you see there is blood on the hand, and there is blood on the sword?" while Eleazar, with the hilt imbedded in the flesh of his right hand, does not know it.

What have we suffered in comparison with those who expired with suffocation, or were burned, or were chopped to pieces for the truth's sake? We talk of the persecution of olden times. There is just as much persecution going on now in various ways. In 1849, in Madagascar, eighteen men were put to death for Christ's sake. They were to be hurled over the rocks, and before they were hurled over the rocks, in order to make their death the more dreadful in anticipation, they were put in baskets and swung to and fro over the precipice that they might see how many hundred feet they would have to be dashed down, and while they were swinging in these baskets over the rocks they sang:

Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the billows near me roll,
While the tempest still is high.

Then they were dashed down to death. Oh, how much others have endured for Christ, and how little we endure for Christ. We want to ride to heaven in a Pullman sleeping-car, our feet on soft plush, the bed made up early so we can sleep all the way, the black porter of death to wake us up only in time to enter the golden city. We want all the surgeons to fix our hand up. Let them bring on all the lint and all the bandages and all the salve, for our hand is hurt, while Eleazar does not know his hand is hurt. "His hand clave unto the sword."

As I look at Eleazar's hand, I come to the conclusion that he has done a great deal of hard hitting. I am not surprised when I see that these four men—Eleazar and his three companions—drove back the army of Philistines, that Eleazar's sword clave to his hand, for every time he struck an enemy with one end of the sword, the other end of the sword wounded him. When he took hold of the sword, the sword took hold of him. Oh, we have found an enemy who cannot be conquered by rose-water and soft speeches. It must be sharp stroke and straight thrust. There is intemperance, and there is fraud, and there is gambling and there is lust, and there are ten thousand battalions of iniquity, armed Philistine iniquity. How are they to be captured and overthrown? Soft sermons in morocco cases laid down in front of an exquisite audience will not do it. You have got to call things by their right name.

We have got to expel from our churches Christians who eat the sacrament on Sunday and devour widows' houses all the week. We have got to stop our indignation against the Hittites and the Jebusites and the Gergishites, and let those poor wretches go, and apply our indignation to the modern transgressions which need to be dragged out and slain. Ahabs here. Herods here. Jezebels here. The massacre of the infants here. We want a few John Knoxes and John Wesleys in the Christian Church to-day. The whole tendency is to refine on Christian work. We keep on refining on it, until we send apologetic word to iniquity we are about to capture it. And we must go with sword silver-chased and presented by the ladies, and we must ride on white palfrey under embroidered housing, putting the spurs in only just enough to make the charger dance gracefully, and then we must send a missive, delicate as a wedding card, to ask the old black giant of sin if he will not surrender.

But I see in the next place what a hard thing it was for Eleazar to get his hand and his sword parted. The muscles and the sinews had been so long grasped around the sword he could not drop it when he proposed to drop it, and his three comrades, I suppose, came up and tried to help him, and they bathed the back part of the hand, hoping the sinews and muscles would relax. But no. "His hand clave to the sword." But after a while they were successful, and then they noticed that the curve in the palm of the hand corresponded exactly with the curve of the hilt. "His hand clave unto the sword."

You and I have seen it many a time. There are in the United States to-day many aged ministers of the Gospel. They are too feeble now to preach. In the church records the word opposite their name is "emeritus," or the words are, "a minister without charge." They were a heroic race. They had small salaries, and but few books, and they swam spring freshets to meet their appointments. But they did in their day a mighty work for God. They took off more of the heads of Philistine iniquity than you could count from noon to sundown. You put that old minister of the Gospel now into a prayer-meeting, or occasional pulpit, or a sick-room where there is someone to be comforted, and it is the same old ring to his voice and the same old story of pardon and peace and Christ and heaven. His hand has so long clutched the sword in Christian conflict he cannot drop it. "His hand clave unto the sword."

I had in my parish in Philadelphia a very aged man who in his early life had been the companion and adviser of the early presidents, Madison and Monroe. He had wielded vast influence, but I only knew him as a very aged man. The most remarkable thing about him was his ardor for Christ. When he could not stand up in the meetings without propping, he would throw his arm around a pillar of the church, and though his mind was partially gone, his love for Christ was so great that all were in deep respect and profound admiration, and were moved when he spoke. I was called to see him die. I entered the room, and he said: "Mr. Talmage, I cannot speak to you now." He was in a very pleasant delirium, as he imagined he had an audience before him. He said: "I must tell these people to come to Christ and prepare for heaven." And then in this pleasant delirium, both arms lifted, this octogenarian preached Christ and told of the glories of the world to come. There, lying on his dying pillow, his dying hand clave to his sword.

There is the headless body of Paul on the road to Oseia. His great brain and his great heart have been severed. The elmwood rods had stung him fearfully. When the corn ship broke up he swam ashore, coming up drenched with the brine. Every day since that day when the horse reared under him in the suburbs of Damascus, as the supernatural light fell, down to this day when he is sixty-eight years of age and old and decrepit from the prison cell of the Mamertine, he has been outrageously treated, and he is waiting to die. How does he spend his last hours? Telling the world how badly he feels, and describing the rheumatism that he got in prison, the rheumatism afflicting his limbs, or the neuralgia piercing his temples, or the thirst that fevers his tongue? Oh, no. His last words are the battle-shout for Christendom: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought the good fight." And so his dying hand clave unto the sword.

It was in the front room on the second floor that my father lay a-dying. It was Saturday morning, four o'clock. Just three years before that day, my mother had left him for the skies, and he had been home-sick to join her company. He was eighty-three years of age. Ministers of the Gospel came in to comfort him, but he comforted them. How wonderfully the words sounded out from his dying pillow: "I have been young and now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread." They bathed his brow, and they bathed his hands, and they bathed his feet, and they succeeded in straightening out the feet; but they did not succeed in bathing open the hand so it would stay open. They bathed the hand open, but it came shut. They bathed it open again, but it came shut. Ah! it had so long clutched the sword of Christian conflict that "his hand clave unto the sword."

I preach this sermon as a tonic. I want you to hold the truth with inradicable grip, and I want you to strike so hard for God that it will react, and while you take the sword, the sword will take you.

You noticed that the officers of the Northern army a few years ago assembled at Denver, and you noticed that the officers of the Southern army assembled at Lexington. Soldiers coming together are very apt to recount their experiences and to show their scars. Here is a soldier who pulls up his sleeve, and says, "There, I was wounded; I have had no use of that limb since the gunshot fracture." O my friends, when the battle of life is over, and the resurrection has come, and our bodies rise from the dead, will we have on us any scars of bravery for God? Christ will be there all covered with scars. Scars on the brow, scars on the hand, scars on the feet, scars all over the heart won in the battle of redemption. And all heaven will sob aloud with emotion as they look at those scars. Ignatius will be there, and he will point out the place where the tooth and the paw of the lion seized him in the Coliseum, and John Huss will be there, and he will show where the coal first scorched the foot on that day when his spirit took wing of flame from Constance. M'Millan, and Campbell, and Freeman, American missionaries in India, will be there—the men who with their wives and children went down in the awful massacre at Cawnpore, and they will show where the daggers of the Sepoys struck them. The Waldenses will be there, and they will show where their bones were broken on that day when the Piedmontese soldiery pitched them over the rocks. And there will be those there who took care of the sick and who looked after the poor, and they will have evidences of earthly exhaustion. And Christ, with his scarred hand waving over the scarred multitude, will say, "You suffered with me on earth; now be glorified with me in heaven." And then the great organs of eternity will take up the chant, and St. John will play: "These are they who came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

But what will your chagrin and mine be if it shall be told that day on the streets of heaven that on earth we shrank back from all toil and sacrifice and hardship. No scars to show the heavenly soldiery. Not so much as one ridge on the palm of the hand to show that just once in the battle for God and the truth, we just once grasped the sword so firmly, and struck so hard that the sword and the hand stuck together, and the hand clave to the sword. O my Lord Jesus, rouse us to thy service.

Thy saints in all this glorious war
Shall conquer though they die;
They see the triumph from afar,
And seize it with the eye.

When that illustrious day shall rise,
And all thy armies shine
In robes of victory through the skies,
The glory shall be thine.

ALEPH, THE CHALDEAN.

friend Aleph that the structure before them was once a royal residence.

"That is so," said the old man; "not only a residence of the Ptolemies, but also of our native kings. You see that the material is stone from Syene, and that the style of building is old Egyptian. It passed to the Ptolemies with the crown of the Pharaohs, but was restored to a direct descendant of the old owners as an act of justice by Cleopatra. For a generation it continued in his family; but at last the Roman governor took a liking to the place and took it. The Romans are apt to take what they like."

"Not a very uncommon thing for conquerors anywhere to do," said Cimon. "Perhaps the site of this very palace was taken without purchase or leave by the Pharaoh who built it, from a weak subject or from another defeated Pharaoh."

"I think not," decidedly said the Egyptian. "I could show you papyri and parchments in the Serapeum proving that the property has been in the possession of the same priestly family to which it now belongs almost as long as we have been historically a people; and that, you know, is a great while, and nearly connects us with the time when vacant Misraim was divided among our fathers."

"Certainly," said the young man whom we have heard his companion call Aleph, "no people between this and the Pillars of Hercules holds its land by so ancient and original a tenure as does the people of Misraim. The Egyptian is older than the Roman, older than the Greek; indeed, was wise and powerful ages before Rome or Greece was born. And, if I mistake not, there is no tradition, nor other reason for thinking that your fathers dispossessed any other people. They must stand as original proprietors. If immemorial possession, without hint of wrong, does not give a just title, the world knows of no such title, whether the party be a nation or individual."

"That seems to me well said," came slowly from the old man, as his eye rested on the ingenuous face of the youth. "We came to the valley of the Nile so early that we did not have to inhabit at the expense or any other nation. We may be said to hold our country directly from the immortal gods."

"You say we came," said Cimon. "So, in your opinion, this was not the original site of the Egyptians. From whence do you suppose them to have come, and at how early a period? For my part, I have no doubt that you were here, and were here as a great and accomplished people, long before the Greeks, or even the Phœnicians, had any political existence."

"Your question would be variously answered among us," returned the Egyptian. "Some would claim for our past hundreds of thousands, and even millions of years; would say that such a civilization as ours was at the date of our oldest monuments could not have ripened from that savagery and even brutality which they fancy to have been the primitive human condition in anything short of such immense periods. But such is not my view. I see that you are surprised at this!"

"Not surprised that you reject the brute-origin of mankind," returned the Greek; "for that seems to be contrary to the feeling and faith of all nations; but rather surprised that you do not share what I have supposed to be the fashionable opinion among Egyptians as to their immense antiquity, and what would naturally be to you a very pleasant opinion."

"No opinion is pleasant to me," replied the old man, slowly shaking his head, "for which I can see no reasonable foundation. Manetho, our only extant historian, was an ancestor of mine. I have his original manuscripts, entire, and am satisfied by the careful study of them and of the palace register of Thebes that his earlier dynasties were largely contemporaneous. No; from two thousand to three thousand years are enough to account for our whole history, monuments and all, if we suppose the nation to have been originally gifted and far advanced in civilization on their coming into the land."

"May I ask from whence you suppose them to have come?" inquired Aleph.

"That is a very broad question at its broadest; and the broadest is what I see in the depths of your eyes. There has been but one tradition among us on the subject, and it is like the tradition of all these western peoples. They look toward the sun-rising. Our fathers entered the land from the north, after journeying from the east. From what part of the great east, do you say? My answer is that Seti the aged is the son of the youth who now stands before me. His is the primitive stock. Caucasian Chaldea is the cradle of the nations. And if you go on to ask whence that cradle and primitive stock, I have to tell you what primitive Egypt thought and said—that Amun Re, the eternal, almighty, and all-wise Spirit, made the stars and the world, and the first parents of us all. That your Democritus and Epicurus," added the Egyptian, looking archly at Cimon, "should have taught differently! They should have visited us three thousand years ago and taken lessons. They would have steered their way more successfully among the snags and breakers of thought. For the stream of history is like the Nile—broad with us, and not without its monsters as well as fertilities, but beginning small and beginning very high among mysterious mountains. I speak with confidence; for I feel that, owing to certain circumstances, I stand on higher ground than most observers do, and can see farther across the centuries. The horizon is distant, but I can see that there is a horizon, and that it sweeps high among the clouds."

At this moment a Roman officer, who had been lying intoxicated behind some boxes, but was now sufficiently recovered to be miserable and quarrelsome, came somewhat unsteadily toward them. They were standing with their backs toward him; and, noticing their plain garbs, he was, perhaps, encouraged in his thought of mischief. Coming up to the Egyptian he struck him a smart blow on the back with the flat of his sheathed sword sword which he carried in his hand.

"Ha, old mummy, did you never see a Roman before?" as Seti turned suddenly toward him. "Improve your opportunity. But you will have an opportunity to feel a Roman as well as to see him if you do not at once find the skipper for me. Come, hurry off, old fellow!" and he raised his sword as if for another blow.

Aleph stepped between. "It is more fitting that I should do your errand, if it must be done. You see that I am a young man," said he, fixing a steady eye on the haughty and inflamed face before him.

"Who are you who dare to stand between a Roman and his will?" cried the officer furiously, his hand still uplifted.

"Let it suffice you that we are peaceable people, moving quietly about on our own private affairs, as Roman law and custom entitle us to do. Do you understand?"

"I understand that if you do not stand away from between Rome and Egypt, the Caucasus will suffer," and the madman began to draw his sword.

"Listen," said Aleph with composure and emphasis. "You had better not. You have a superior officer, and we are going to Alexandria. I call all these people to witness (by this time many had gathered about) that this quarrel is not of our seeking."

"Dare you threaten a Roman commander, you beardless cub! By the immortals, you shall see what I dare," shouted the man, as he plucked his sword from the scabbard.

"You shall not," said Aleph; and, snatching a large bundle from a by-stander, he thrust it into the face of the Roman. It burst and enveloped the man in a cloud of pelican feathers, which a Jew had been collecting for the rag-market of Alexandria. Before his assailant could recover himself and sight, Aleph had thrown his arms about him, secured his sword, and, despite his struggles, laid him supine on the floor. Then, without much difficulty, he managed to swathe and bind his arms to his body with his long sword-sash. Looking about, his eye caught a small coil of rope near him; this he drew to himself, and with it fastened the man in a sitting posture to one of the posts that supported the awning. All this was not done without much struggling and cursing on the part of the Roman; but Aleph was perfectly silent till his prisoner was well secured. Then, turning to the spectators, he said:

"In behalf of the general safety, let this man remain as you see him till we reach Alexandria. Wine has made him dangerous; you notice that what has been done, I only have done, and that reluctantly, to prevent something worse."

A cheer flashed out from the faces huddled about, and almost shaped itself on their parted lips, but was suddenly suppressed before anything more than an indistinct murmur had escaped; for their eyes fell on the watchful and infuriated face of the officer. They were prudent people, those passengers. They admired courage; they were glad to see a Roman put down; but they were not ready to sacrifice safety to sentiment. So, instead of cheering, they compromised and fell to laughing at the Jew, who, exclaiming,

"O, my feathers, my poor feathers! Ah, father Abraham, I am a ruined man this day; what will become of me!" crept about on his hands and knees, trying to collect as much of his volatile property as possible.

CHRIST'S COMFORT.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 14:1-3; 15-27. Golden Text, John 14:16

EARTHLy comfort and heavenly comfort; how different they are! An earthly comforter can only go over and over again the circumstances of trial, speak words of sympathy truly, and do what is in the limited power of man to do by way of help. But this kind of comfort revolves around the person of the tried one, keeping him in his own atmosphere, reminding him of himself, and arousing and maintaining the self-pity which drags down and keeps down to earth. Thus the Jews sought to comfort Martha and Mary concerning the death of their brother, Lazarus. It was kindly meant; but they could neither bring back Lazarus from the dead nor fill his place in the family, nor yet explain to the sisters the dealings of the Lord Jesus, which so perplexed them. This earthly sympathy left them where they were. Heavenly comfort springs from him who was divinely anointed "to comfort all that mourn," and who never deputed this office to another until he promised, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever, even the Spirit of truth."

With all the authority of his vocation as Comforter, our Lord and Master says, "Let not your heart be troubled." Before he had finished his discourse he said plainly; "In the world ye shall have tribulation." The ground for an untroubled heart is not the absence of sorrow or of trial, but

The Presence of Jesus in It;

"Ye believe in God, believe also in me." "Ye shall weep and lament;" "Ye shall be sorrowful" (John 16:20); "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." "Nevertheless, let not your heart be troubled, believe in me, trust me, my hand is in the mainspring of all that happens, and I am making all things work together for good to them that love God." Trusting him your heart will be unruffled in all circumstances. You will know that the real end which the Master has in view could be attained in no other way.

The world's comfort to the sinner is "You are not worse than others, not half so bad as many, and there are many excuses to be made for you, you have been placed in very disadvantageous circumstances, etc." But all this leaves the heart still troubled. God's comforter is "the Spirit of truth," who convinces of sin instead of excusing it, and then takes of Christ and shows the sinner how, by believing in Jesus, his sin, which God can never excuse, can be forgiven cleansed and put away.

Man's Comfort

to a believer under the power of temptation consists in reminding him that he is not alone in his fall, many fail in a similar way, he must not put the standard too high. But this kind of comfort leaves the conscience, if tender, as ill at ease as before; and if it is not tender, then this earthly comfort hardens the conscience, and interferes with the truest relation with God which must always be on a basis of the strictest truth. "If God's standard is too high, then God is a tyrant to expect impossibilities; the failing believer is more righteous than he."

God's comfort to his fallen child is on quite another line, "Only acknowledge thine iniquity" (Jer. 3:13); "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to deliver us from all unrighteousness" (1. John 1:9). Man's comfort leads the fallen to compare himself with others to his own advantage, so that self-complacency stretches like a plaster over the sore without healing it, and the heart is not at rest, but is more estranged from God than before. But the fallen believer who lets God humble him, and make him see sin as it is in God's sight, finds himself even in his very brokenness, nearer to God than ever before. He may have lost his confidence in himself, and be grievously disappointed in himself, but he understands the grace of his God in Christ "to the unthankful and the evil," and he knows the power of the blood of Christ to cleanse him in such a way that an unruffled peace takes possession of him, and his heart is no longer troubled. A child of God may be visited with some

Sore Bereavement.

Man's comfort is simply to condole with him, to speak of how hard it is to bear. As it could not have happened without God's permission this implies that God is cruel, although few go so far as to say so. God's comfort to his children in bereavement is always the resurrection and the coming of the Lord. Our loved ones are coming again with him (1. Thes. 4:13-18). Then also their death is both a sleep, and a sowing for the resurrection. In spirit they have died with Christ and are risen with him (Col. 3:13), and now in body they must be sown in death that God may give them "a body as it shall please him," a glorious body. And moreover the Lord himself fills the void which is made by the loss of the loved one who is gone before. Is it a husband whom he has taken, then he is the God of the widow. Is it a brother, then he is not ashamed to call us brethren. Are both parents gone? Then "I will not leave you orphans, I will come to you." God's comfort attracts the mourner from himself, and in the solid good which must come of the seeming evil, the knowledge that for the one fallen asleep it is "far better" to depart and be with Christ the trouble goes, and the heart rests in God.

A loss in business, a calumny, trial in the family, when seen in an earthly light according to man's way of comforting, trouble the heart and wear the nerves; but the child of God who believes in the Shepherd-care of Jesus, who owns no property but for him, who holds reputation, family, all for him, can rest untroubled in the conviction, "What God wills is right; I will with God, and therefore what is right for him is right for me."

The obedient heart rests untroubled. "If ye love me, keep my commandments, and I will pray the Father and he shall send you another Comforter that he may abide with you forever." The Holy Spirit cannot comfort us in disobedience. The very essence of his comfort consists in making known to us the will of God, showing us that it is "good and acceptable and perfect," (Rom. 12:2), and manifesting Christ in us to do his will. The Holy Spirit cannot be in us without working in us the indwelling of Christ. "The Spirit of truth dwelleth with you and shall be in you," Jesus said, and added, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." What comfort can be greater than the assurance of the Holy Ghost that Jesus in very deed dwells in us by his Spirit? We may be painfully conscious of our shortcomings, of our want of love, of our powerlessness, but the indwelling Spirit brings to our remembrance that Jesus the faithful one, Jesus who is love dwells in us and makes his home in us. "Hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us."

Not because I may have spiritual privileges, does my spirit live, not because I am in fresh air, not because I get the food and exercise I need does my body live. Behind all these secondary causes there lives the true source of life in all my being: because Jesus lives, I live. "At that day," the day of his indwelling, "ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you." Impossible to know in mere doctrine or in theory, the indwelling of our God. We know the Holy Ghost

By His Presence.

"Ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." We know also the indwelling of Jesus by experiencing it. When, contrary to our own selfish nature, only love wells up to those who injure us, we know it is not our own spirit, but the spirit of Christ. When the old tendency to assert ourselves, to be something and somebody, most strangely ceases, and we find a spirit of nothingness in its place, a shrinking from anything like prominence, or importance, we know that this latter is not us but Christ that dwelleth in us. Yes; "we know that he abideth in us by the Spirit which he hath given us." (1. John 3:24.) And most surely, "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." (Rom. 8:9.) There may be others besides Judas or Jude who are ready to ask, "Lord how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?" Many want to know

How it Works.

Jesus honored his word. "If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him."

No one ever kept the words of Jesus as he kept his Father's words. He was so one with him that one of the very names he bears is, "The Word of God." (John 1:1, Rev. 19:13.) He could no more live without his Father's word than we can breathe without the atmosphere. "But I have such a bad memory," some will say. For this very reason Jesus says, "The Comforter which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you." Whatever is specially meant for each individual, just that will be recalled by the Holy Ghost; therefore "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

IN my Father's house are many mansions. Strive on Christian warrior. Do not be discouraged. Yet a few years, perhaps, and a mansion bright and fair will be yours. Your lot may be a hard one; it may be a difficult matter month after month to meet the rent you must pay for the humble apartments that now shelter you, but soon your spirit will wing its flight heavenward and you will then stand among the ransomed throng of whom the angel shall say, "These are they who have come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes with the blood of the Lamb."

A gentleman inhabiting a beautiful villa on the Hudson invited a friend to visit him. After resting awhile he took him out and showed him about. Beautiful walks, beautiful gardens, beautiful lawns. Barns commodious and convenient. Apple orchard burdened with luscious fruit. Vines weighted. An artificial lake delightful to look upon. His friend was amazed at the luxury and refinement everywhere apparent. They returned to the house and inspected its compartments. The furnishings on the ground floor were fine beyond compare, and repeatedly called for expressions of surprise and congratulation. "Oh that's nothing," replied the host, "wait until you get up stairs." He took him up to the second floor and a scene of bewildering beauty broke upon his gaze. Furniture and curtains the costliest and rarest. Carpets and rugs oriental in richness of texture and design. Frescoings and paintings most precious. A bed soft as down with a canopy representing a starlit sky. With every expression of surprise that fell from the lips of his friend the eyes of the host brightened and kindled and when the inspection was over he said, "That room is for my daughter; she is now in France finishing her education. She knows nothing about this. In fact she does not know that I purchased this property. Next week she starts for home. I shall meet her at the landing, take her up here and install her in her new home. And do you know," he concluded, "I can hardly wait for the time, so anxious am I to see how surprised she will be." Fortunate child! And yet but a faint type of every true child of God. When we have finished our studies here below, and have done the will of our heavenly Father and he sends us word to come up higher, who will be able to describe the beauty, the grandeur, the glory of the heavenly mansion there awaiting us and which Jesus has gone to prepare? For "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

Even the spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive because it seeth him not. And there are many professed Christians who have not yet received the Holy Spirit. They cannot understand why they do not enjoy religion, why they are troubled with doubts, why they accomplish so little and are so weak. The solution lies in the fact that they lack the power of the Holy Ghost. They are like watches without a mainspring. Like machinery without motive power. "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?" They do not even know that there is a Holy Ghost.

The other day there was an inspection of one of those monster factories which are the wonders of civilization. It covers acres of ground, seven stories high, with hundreds of windows to let in the light upon the army of industrious workmen employed inside. As we walked in and through the rooms, and went from one story to another, and saw the rolling of pinions, and heard the rattling of the wheels, and felt the vibration of the floor beneath our feet, while the raw material at one end was being, as if by magic, brought out at the other end ready to be worked into a robe for farmer or merchant, peasant or prince, we inquired of the foreman, "Where in the world do you get all the motive power to set this vast machinery into operation." He took us down and out of the building, into a smaller one, where there was but one door and one window to the whole room, but through the open door we saw the great engine moving in silent and majestic power, as it was doing this wondrous work. "There," said he, "is the mighty force that sets the work in motion."

When Hell Gate was to be blown up in order to clear the way to the entrance of the East River, fortunes were expended by order of Congress in preparing for that important event. But all these expenditures and all these preparations effected nothing until Gen. Newton's little daughter pressed the button and fired the fuse. So many Sunday Schools and churches and members have all the paraphernalia for a great work in readiness, and all that is now wanted is a baptism of the Holy Ghost. Let us "tarry at Jerusalem until we are endued with power from on high."

HELEN'S TRIAL.

BY REIS SAMSON.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Oct. 25:
"And I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever." John 14:16.

OH! I cannot, cannot bear it," cried Helen Davis, and she threw herself on the ground, burying her face in the long grass, sobbing piteously. "What is the matter, my child, what is it you cannot bear?" asked a gentle voice, and looking up, Helen saw, through her tears, the sweet face of Miss Lawrence, her Sunday School teacher bending over her.

"Everything, all my troubles, mamma's death," answered Helen in a broken voice.

"Ah yes, I understand," said Miss Lawrence seating herself on the grass and drawing Helen to her. "Poor child," she murmured tenderly, "you have indeed suffered a great loss, an irreparable one, but Jesus will comfort you. He will heal that aching, bruised heart he—"

"Don't talk to me of God, I don't want to hear about him," interrupted Helen almost fiercely.

"Helen," said Miss Lawrence gravely.

"I don't care, he took my darling mamma away from me; he has left me all alone with no one to love me," continued Helen, choking with emotion.

"Helen, God did not take your mother; her life had come to an end, her work was done, and she simply went home to her Father's house."

"But she was so young. If she had been old or sickly—"

"So it seems to us, dear, but we cannot question God's wisdom. He knows best, and does all things for our good."

"But my trial is so hard," murmured Helen.

"Yes, dear, it is hard, if you are trying to bear it alone, but if you will go to Jesus, and like a tired child, lay your head on his bosom in this your darkest hour, he will comfort you; his love will fill the aching void in your heart."

"Miss Lawrence, please don't talk that way; it's no use, you can't comfort me for mamma's loss."

"True, Helen, no earthly friend can give you rest. God tenderly bring you to that place soon, where in his love and friendship you will find that peace which the world cannot give, and the world cannot take away."

"Miss Lawrence," said Helen, choking back a sob, "Jesus can't help me, you don't know what an aching pain there is in my heart."

"Yes, darling, I do know, but he is all sufficient. He has said, 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter that he may abide with you forever.'"

"But he hasn't done it, Miss Lawrence."

"Have you asked him, dear, or have you been rebellious, giving way to your feelings, hearkening to the voice of the evil one."

Helen blushed and hung her head. "O Miss Lawrence, I have been wicked, but I am sorry, and I do want Jesus now."

"Then, dear, the moment you are willing, he will come to you, he will open his arms to receive you. He will send the Holy Spirit to abide with you, to guide you, to teach you, to give you a new life, and in return he asks you to trust him, to love him, to keep his commandments."

"Keep his commandments," repeated Helen, "but they are so many and so hard. I could never do that."

"Dearest, by faithfully performing all your little duties, by loving and serving God, you are keeping his commandments. Helen," continued Miss Lawrence, "will you not kneel with me now, and yield yourself fully to God, let him come into your heart and life as never before. Let him be your Comforter. Say yes, darling."

"Yes," murmured Helen, so together they knelt, and Miss Lawrence poured out her heart in earnest prayer, Helen repeating each word after her. "Now, dear, I must bid you good-bye," said Miss Lawrence as they rose from their knees. God bless you and keep you and bring you into all the fullness of his love."

"Miss Lawrence, I will be good, I feel happier already, and I will trust Jesus," cried Helen throwing her arms around Miss Lawrence's neck, "indeed I will, for I do love Jesus."

After Miss Lawrence left her, Helen walked home very slowly, she had so much to think about. "If ye love me, keep my commandments, and I will send you another comforter," repeated Helen. She was not surprised now that God had seemingly deserted her. Since her mother's death, she had refused to pray, to go to church, to read her Bible. When Lita, her elder sister, came home in the evening tired out, from teaching French at Madame Vinot's seminary, she always found the house dark and cheerless, and Helen lying on the sofa, with red swollen eyes. Helen saw clearly that this was one of the duties she had neglected, but with Jesus to help her, she meant there should be a change. In her anxiety to reach home before Lita, she ran the remaining blocks, she still had half an hour to spare, "just time enough," said Helen, as she ran upstairs to her room. Hastily taking off the heavy black dress, which Lita said made her feel gloomy, Helen put on a pretty, soft, white mull and went down stairs. How dark and cold the dining-room looked, "Poor Lita," sighed Helen, as she drew down the blinds and lighted the gas. "I shall set the table myself. Norah does it so badly."

A little while later, when Lita came into the room she was surprised to find a bright fire burning in the grate, the table set as if for company, fresh flowers everywhere, and Helen standing by the window humming a cheerful song.

"Darling, what is it," asked Lita as Helen turned around.

"O Lita," cried Helen, running over to her, and hiding her face against her, "its Jesus, just Jesus. He's comforting me for mamma, I'm so happy, and I mean to love him and live for him."

"Thank God," murmured Lita, folding her little girl tenderly to her bosom, "if you are good and faithful, he will comfort you as he has done me, for he has promised and cannot break his word."

There were many days of trial, many days of darkness, but Helen never faltered once in her trust. She had truly given her heart to God, and was trying to follow the teachings of the Holy Spirit. Little by little he came into her life, filling it with a joy and peace hitherto unknown, and on her face there came an almost unearthly look, a smile of content, proving to the world that Christ had indeed kept his word, and sent his Comforter to abide with her forever.

TWELVE MILLION PUBLIC SCHOLARS.

An interesting showing is made by the Commissioner of the Bureau of Education in his report submitted to the Secretary of the Interior a few days ago. The report states that there were enrolled during the fiscal year 1889-1890 in the public schools of elementary and secondary grade 12,686,973 pupils, as against 9,867,505 in 1880. The enrollment formed 20.27 per cent. of the population of 1890. The average daily attendance of pupils on each school day in 1890 was 8,144,938. The total amount expended during the last fiscal year for public school purposes was $140,277,484, as against $78,094,687 in 1888. The expenditure per capita of population in 1880 was $1.56 and in 1890 it was $2.24. The total value of grounds, buildings, and apparatus of educational institutions in 1891 was $72,894,729, a large increase during the year.

A METHODIST CONGRESS.

It Assembles in Washington and Has a World-Wide Representation - A Great Gathering to Discuss Church Interests.

FEW events in religious circles of late years have attracted more general attention than the Methodist Congress or "Ecumenical Conference," which assembled in the Metropolitan M. E. Church, Washington, D. C., on Oct. 7th.

It is attended by delegates of Methodist Churches throughout the entire world, and although a voluntary assembly, and not an authoritative body in the usual sense, it is not only a Conference vast in numbers, but of far-reaching importance to Methodism everywhere; since it has for its ultimate object the mutual stimulus and higher efficiency of the denomination in every land where Christianity has a foothold.

In calling such a Conference, the Methodists of Europe and America have followed in the footsteps of other great ecclesiastical organizations which, recognizing the progressive tendencies of the day in Church government as well as in other matters, have already taken steps looking to the unification of their respective wings of the great Christian body of bridging over divergencies and differences of opinion relative to Church government and methods, and of extending organization lines and fraternal relations.

An enthusiastic reception was given to the visiting delegates in New York, on October 5. A collation was served at six o'clock and a large public meeting was held in the Music Hall at eight o'clock. Mr. John D. Slayback, Chairman of the Reception Committee, presided. Viewed from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD boxes, the scene was an imposing one. Among the ministers were Bishops Hurst, Foss and Wilson; Dr. T. Bowman Stephenson, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes and Rev. H. T. Marshall from England; Rev. W. Morley from New Zealand; Dr. M. Lelievre from France; Bishop A. Carman and Dr. Briggs from Canada; Dr. T. B. Neely of Philadelphia; Dr. Fisk of Michigan, beside the large contingent of New York ministers.

After the opening exercises, the Chairman called upon the Rev. J. M. King, D.D., to make the first address of welcome. Dr. King called attention to the coincidence that the first Ecumenical Council of the Church was held in London near the dust of the illustrious Father of Methodism, and the second was to be held in Washington, the city of the illustrious Father of his Country. The speaker then sketched at some length the history of Methodism in the United States, and concluded with expressions of cordial welcome to the brethren from the other side the Atlantic, and the hope that the approaching Conference would promote the best interests of the Church. Bishop C. D. Foss in the unavoidable absence of Bishop Andrews having briefly seconded the address of welcome the Chairman introduced Dr. T. Bowman Stephenson, the Chairman of the English Wesleyan Conference.

Dr. Stephenson contrasted the magnificent reception which he and his fellow-delegates had received with the cold reception which the two pioneers of Methodism, Wesley and Whitefield, received on these shores one hundred and twenty-two years ago. He congratulated the Church on its wonderful growth and development since that day. The delegates were sure of their welcome now, for they knew these brethren here, and were well aware of their brotherly feelings. The ties which bound the two countries together were growing stronger year by year. Methodism was a heritage of blessing common to the churches on both sides of the Atlantic. It was traced back beyond the Wesleys to its origin on the day of Pentecost. The churches were one in heart and supported by the vast bodies of Christians in both lands, who were determined that the friendship of the two countries should be maintained. This sense of mutual brotherhood was manifested when Americans assembled to mourn the death of Browning and when only the historic fane of Westminster Abbey was thought worthy of the assembly of Englishmen called to lament the death of James Russell Lowell. There had been a time when those relations seemed to be on the verge of rupture, but happily for both lands, there was in the White House at Washington a man whom God had raised up from the soil as he raised Adam, a man of wisdom and power, and on the throne of England the noblest woman who ever sat on a throne, and these two bade the dogs of war be still, until the nations could have time to think calmly and reasonably on the dispute. He thanked God that now no obstinate king and no reckless minister could embroil in war two countries in which three million Methodists on one side and five million on the other, backed by a host of Christians of other denominations called each other brethren.

At the conclusion of Dr. Stephenson's speech, which elicited round after round of enthusiastic applause, brief addresses were made by Rev. H. T. Marshall the President of the Methodist New Connection Conference, Rev. W. Morley, representing Australasian Methodism; Bishop Carman of the Canadian Methodist Church; Bishop Pettet of the African Methodist Church; Dr. Lelievre from France; and lastly, from Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, who, as it was then after ten o'clock contented himself with delivering a message of hearty good will; from Rev. William Arthur the famous author of The Tongue of Fire, who had been present at the beginning of the meeting, but owing to his advanced years had retired earlier in the evening.

We present on this page portraits of several of the more eminent leaders in Methodism who are taking a prominent part in the deliberations of the Conference.

On the opening day, October 7, the introductory sermon was preached by the Rev. Wm. Arthur, M. A., after which the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was observed. The day was devoted to election of officers and addresses of welcome, the first of the latter being delivered by Bishop Hurst. On October 8, "Ecumenical Methodism" was the selected topic and able papers were read by several prominent members. On October 9 the topic discussed was "The Christian Church, its Essential Unity and Genuine Catholicity," and on the following day, Saturday, October 10, the subject taken up was "The Church and Scientific Thought." October 11, Sunday, the delegates attended service, Bishop Newman preaching the Memorial Sermon on "John Wesley."

On October 12 the fifth day of the Conference, those now presented. The Rev. Wm. Arthur, of London, who delivered the inaugural sermon before the Conference is also included.

All of the seven Methodist divisions in Great Britain are represented in the Conference. These divisions or sects include the Wesleys, the Methodist New Connection, the Primitive Methodists, "Bible Christians," "United Free Methodist Churches," "Wesleyan Reform Union," and "Independent Methodist Church." Besides the foregoing, there are represented the Irish, the Australasian, the South African, and the West Indian Methodist Churches, and the Methodist Church of France. Of the 29 distinct ecclesiastical organizations in the Washington Assemblage, 17 belong to the American section and 12 to the European. The British Wesleyan Churches do not confer the title of Bishop upon any of their pastors or superintendents, as is done in the United States. Instead, government is administered by central representative conferences possessing authority in their respective branches. It is for the most part the leaders in these Conferences who are now representing the Eastern Section at the Washington Ecumenical Council.

The four Permanent Secretaries of the Conference are Rev. Dr. J. M. King, New York, Dr. E. B. Ryckman of Ottawa, Ont., Rev. John Bond of London and Mr. Thomas Snape of Liverpool.

The Ecumenical Conference is composed of 500 delegates, 300 being allotted to the Western and 200 to the Eastern Sections, the American contingent being apportioned as follows:

October 12 the fifth day of the Conference, was wholly devoted to the discussion of "The Church and Her Agencies," prominent among the participants in the symposium being Bishop Foster, who described "The Responsibilities and Qualifications of a Preacher," and the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, M. A., of the London Mission, Wesleyan Methodist Church, who spoke on "The Religious Press and the Religious Duties of the Secular Press." On October 13, the same topic of discussion was resumed, many interesting papers being read on the subject. Rev. W. D. Wallace, Secretary of the London Mission, Wesleyan Methodist Church, made an address on "Methodist Brotherhoods and Sisterhoods" and Rev. Benjamin St. James Fry, Bishop of the M. E. Church, spoke on "Woman's Work in the Church."

The topic selected for discussion on October 14, is "Education," 15, "Romanism" and "Temperance," 16, "Social Problems" and "Missions," 17, "War and Peace," 19, "The Church and Public Morality," and on October 20, the closing day, according to the programme, "The Outlook," will be the theme.

From time to time, the portraits and biographies of the most eminent Methodist churchmen here and abroad, as well as divines of other denominations, have appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose readers are doubtless familiar with some of the faces we now present, notably Bishops Bowman, Ninde, Mallalieu, Goodsell, Newman, Vincent, and Fitzgerald. In a recent issue, we fully described the great charitable work of Bishop Stevenson of London, "the Children's Friend," whose portrait is among the group of those now presented. The Rev. Wm. Arthur, of London, who delivered the inaugural sermon before the Conference is also included.

All of the seven Methodist divisions in Great Britain are represented in the Conference.

SAVE THE CHILDREN.

THE Spartans who threw their sickly children to the wild beasts were merciful compared with that stolid indifference which, in this age, would give up the destitute youth of our country to be eaten up of their own depravity. These so-called ragamuffins are coming up to be the men and women. That spark of iniquity which you might put out with one drop of the water of life, will flame up into a conflagration of every green thing that God planted in the soul, and that which was intended to be a temple of the Holy Ghost will be a scarred and blasted ruin, every light quenched, and every altar in the dust.

That petty thief who slipped into your store and took a yard of cloth from your counter will be the highwayman of the forest, or the burglar at midnight picking the lock of your money-safe, and blowing up your store to hide the villainy. A great army, with staggering step, and blood-shot eye, and drunken hoot, they will come on, gathering recruits from every grog-shop and den of infamy, to take the ballot-box and hurrah at the elections.

The great, hard-knotted fist of ruffianism will have more power than the gentle hand of sobriety and intelligence. Men bloated, and with the signature of crime burned in from the top of their forehead to the bottom of their chin, will look honest men out of countenance. Moral corpses which ought to be buried a hundred feet deep to keep them from poisoning the air will rot in the face of the sun at mid-day. Industry, in her plain frock, with her hand at the spindle, will be unappreciated, while multitudes of able-bodied men will wander about in utter idleness, with their hand on their hips, saying, "The world owes us a living." Oh what a terrible force there is in iniquity when, uneducated, unrestrained and unblanched, it goes on concentrating, and deepening, and widening, and gathering momentum, until it swings ahead with a very triumph of desolation, drowning like surges, scorching like flame, crushing like rocks! Cold indifference meets these desperate ones and says, "What a pity! but it can't be helped." The law meets them and says, "Blackwell's Island and Sing-Sing are the places for you." Fashionable fastidiousness meets them, and gathering up its robes, says: "They are so dirty I cannot bear to have them touch me."

OVER-WORK.

MEN make the mistake of working according to their opportunities, and not according to their capacity of endurance. "Can I run this train from Springfield to Boston at the rate of fifty miles an hour?" says an engineer. Yes. "Then I will run it, reckless of consequences." Can I be a merchant, and the president of a bank, and a director in a life insurance company, and a school commissioner, and help edit a paper, and supervise the politics of our ward, and run for Congress? "I can!" the man says to himself. The store drives him; the school drives him; politics drive him. He takes all the scoldings and frets and exasperations of each position. Some day at the height of the business season he does not come to the store; from the most important meetings of the bank directors he is absent. In the excitements of the political canvass he fails to be at the place appointed. What is the matter? His health has broken down. He committed suicide by over-work.

THE COMING WINTER.

LET us look forward to the cold season without depression. I never hear the winds gallop but I want to join them. The snow is only the winter in blossom. Instead of here and there on the pond, the whole country will be covered with white lilies. I have seen gracefulness enough in the curve of a snowdrift to keep me in admiration for a week. Do you remember that morning after the storm of sleet, when every tree stood in mail of ice, with drawn sword of icicle? Besides, I think the winter drives us in, and drives us together. We have never had such a time at our house with checker-boards, and dominoes, and blind-man's-buff, and the piano, as in winter. Father and mother said it seemed to them like getting married over again. Besides that, on nights when the storm was so great that the door-bell went to bed and slept soundly, we had more time to read and we revelled in books, and Charles Dickens stepped in from Gad's Hill; and Henry W. Longfellow, without knocking, entered the sitting-room, his hair white as if he had walked through the snow with his hat off; and William H. Prescott, with his eyesight restored, happened in from Mexico, a cactus in his buttonhole; and Audubon set a cage of birds on the table—Baltimore oriole, chaffinch, starling and bobolink doing their prettiest; and Christopher North thumped his gun down on the hall-floor, and hung his sporting jacket on the hat-rack, and shook the carpet brown with Highland heather. As Walter Scott came in his dog scampered in after him, and put both paws up on the marble-top table; and Minnie asked the old man why he did not part his hair better, instead of letting it hang all over his forehead, and he apologized for it by the fact that he had been on a long tramp from Melrose Abbey to Kenilworth Castle. Books associate us with the good and great of all ages.

POLITICS AS A BUSINESS.

WHAT a most unsatisfactory life, the life of professional politicians must be! The vast majority of them go from disappointment to disappointment. For every position there are at least a hundred candidates; hence, of necessity, ninety-nine applicants are disappointed. I do not suppose that all the complaints made up and down the land are founded in unadulterated patriotism. The simple fact is, the disappointment is more than they can bear. By an inexorable law, we cannot have more than six Presidents in a generation. What a discouraging thing to seek the Presidency, when out of the one thousand who think themselves fit for the office, only five men can get it! There is more probability that any of them will be struck by lightning than that they will get to be President. If you, through love of city, or State, or nation, seek official position, go ahead; but if you seek it for a livelihood, or seek it for fun, you make a terrible mistake. Always vote. Always attend the caucus. Always use your best influence for the betterment of the public interest. But he who enters politics as a profession, hoping from it to get famous and high places, is in all probability committing a fatal blunder.

Through all the wards, through all the townships, through all the States, there are people sore of head and sore of heart, cast down and misanthropic. The time was when men were so far from office-seeking that they had by penalties to be compelled to take office. The Court of Plymouth, in 1632, enacted that "whoever should refuse the office of Governor should pay twenty pounds sterling unless he should be chosen two years successively; and whoever should refuse the office of counsellor or magistrate should pay ten pounds." No more such compulsion is necessary, and the scramble is terrible, notwithstanding all the peril financial, social, moral and eternal. Macaulay wrote, "Every friendship which a man may have becomes precarious as soon as he engages in politics." Thomas Corwin, the great orator of Ohio, said to a man who wanted him to get him official position at Washington: "Accept a clerkship here and you sink at once all independence. I may give you a place to-day and I can kick you out again to-morrow, and there is another man over at the White House who can kick me out, and the people by and by can kick him out, and so we go. But if you own one acre of land it is your kingdom, and your cabin is your castle. You are a sovereign and you will feel it in every throb of your pulse, and every day of your life will assure me of your thanks for having thus advised you." But if you have a mission in public affairs, advance confidently. Whatever our hand findeth to do in any department of social, or civic, or religious duty, let us do it. What we have to do for this world's improvement we must do quickly or never do it at all. Napoleon said that the Austrians failed at Rivoli because they did not know the value of minutes.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS.

AN eminent clergyman, traveling in the East, wrote home a letter in which he quoted the passage of Scripture about "the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees." The type-setter, not being very familiar with the Bible, mistook the "going" for the word "gong." We could scarcely believe our eyes when we read about the sound of a gong in the tops of the mulberry trees. We did not believe it could have been possible that a man had climbed up into such a place with that familiar hotel instrument of music. If he had reached that elevated point with a gong, he would not have been able to poise himself well enough to strike it to any advantage. We felt disposed to pronounce the whole thing to be a libel, until we thought that it must have been a typographical error.

But what writer or speaker has not suffered from similar mistakes? Hon. Daniel S. Dickinson told us that he thought the type-setter had shortened his life by ten years. After what a man did really say has gone through three or four different hands, the speaker would not recognize his own deliverance. We recently read in a Boston paper two columns of a sermon which once or twice reminded us of something that we ourselves had said, when on finishing we looked up to the heading, and to our surprise, found it to be our own. The process through which the sermon had gone had changed its entire texture. But faults are often charged on reporters and printer which belong really to the speaker or writer. If people realized how many inarticulate utterances come from pulpit, platform and forum, the reporter would be excused for occasional mistakes. If people knew how much infamous chirography comes into a printing office, they would be more sympathetic with people who publish newspapers and books.

BRIEF NOTES.

Gipsy Smith commences services on Oct. 18th in the Nostrand Avenue M. E. Church, Brooklyn. His work at Bridgeport, Conn., was much blessed.

Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, formerly of Bethany Church, Philadelphia, has been invited to preach for Pastor C. H. Spurgeon during his convalescence.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon has regained strength sufficiently to bear the journey to Eastbourne, a noted health resort on the Southeastern coast of England.

Evangelist J. Norberry has just closed a series of meetings at the North Fifth Street M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. He goes now to Good Ground, L. I.

Local option is making rapid strides in the Australian colonies. Both New South Wales and South Australia are now engaged in legislation to decrease the liquor traffic.

The excellent story entitled The Captain's Bargain, by Julia McNair Wright, which has been published in serial form in this journal, has been issued by the National Temperance Society, 58 Reade St., New York. Price 60 cents in paper covers; $1.25 in cloth.

The New York Midnight Mission is enabled to extend its usefulness by establishing a home at Mamaroneck, N. Y. Inmates of the Home in Greene Street who give promise of reformation, will now be transferred to Mamaroneck, where they will have the benefit of purer surroundings moral as well as physical.

The Presbyterian and Methodist Episcopal Churches of Salem, N. Y., have been holding united revival meetings. They were conducted by Rev. Francis E. Smiley of Philadelphia. Rev. William Fraser the Pastor of the Presbyterian Church, writes that the services were blessed of God to the salvation of souls and to the stimulating of Christians to more aggressive labor.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has closed the wonderful meetings he has been holding at Birmingham, Conn. Such scenes of joy and thankfulness as were witnessed in the huge tent on the day of the jubilee meeting have never taken place in that town before. Over three hundred persons have made profession of faith during the services and have connected with churches of various denominations.

A meeting to bid farewell to thirteen lady missionaries, who are setting out for fields of foreign labor was held at the Warren Avenue Baptist Church, Boston, Mass., on October 2. Among them were Miss Ida M. Cushman of Philadelphia, who goes to Thatons, Burmah; Miss Kate Knight of Westfield, N. Y., to Maubin, Burmah; and Miss Annie Hopkins of Norwalk, Conn., to Rangoon. The party sailed on the Pavonia for Liverpool.

This week is a festival week at Rev. Jacob Freshman's Hebrew Christian Church, 17 St. Mark's Place, New York. It is the sixth anniversary of its organization, and services are being held every day. Among the preachers at the various services are Drs. Charles Thompson, Charles F. Deems, J. H. McIlvaine and David G. Wylie. An earnest effort is being made by Mr. Freshman to extinguish the small remaining debt on the church which has so long tied his hands.

Mr. Penzotti since his release from prison in Peru, has resumed his work. He writes that Yrigoyen, one of the colporteurs, had returned from the south, where his life had been in peril. In Cajamarca, Noriega had had to contend with the civil authorities as well as with the ecclesiastical. The friars induced a young fellow to snatch some of his books from his hands and take them to the convent. At Farma, after heaping all kinks of insolence upon him, they shouted, "Get away from here, Penzotti's dog!" Penzotti's prosecution has had the effect of stirring up the whole country, and the clerical party are trying to inflame popular prejudice against him.

A request has been received from the Committee of Christian Workers in the United States and Canada, that the readers of this journal be reminded of the approaching Convention at Washington, D. C. It will be held in the first Congregational Church, November 5th-12th. This is the sixth of those Conventions and it promises to equal its predecessors in usefulness. Fully a thousand ministers of various denominations and three thousand Christian laymen attended last year's conference at Hartford, Conn., and returned home with renewed energies, and with many practical suggestions derived from conference with their brethren. Information may be obtained from the Secretary, Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Death of Parnell the Irish Leader—A European Monarch and a Great British Commoner Dead—Hawaii's Dying Queen—The Week's Disasters.

THE news of the death of Charles Stewart Parnell which, on October 7, was telegraphed throughout our own land, as well as Great Britain and Ireland, produced a profound sensation wherever it was told. The reason is not far to seek. It is supplied by his strange personality and his wonderful career. The whole world had watched his rise, admired his courage and sagacity in conflict, applauded his triumphs, anticipated his final victory, and had lamented the fatal sin which in one day made him as powerless as Samson was made by the shears of Delilah. No man of modern times has been a more conspicuous instance of magnificent genius and fortitude joined with despicable moral weakness. Think of what he did! A Protestant and a landlord winning the enthusiastic confidence of a people detesting both characters. A man with no prestige compelling, by the simple force of personal magnetism, the implicit loyalty and obedience of such a body of men as the Irish members of

CHARLES STEWART PARNELL.

Parliament—men of a race remarkable for subordination to any leader and jealous of any assumption of authority. A man with a discredited cause confronting the chiefs of the two great English parties in Parliament, with their experienced and well-drilled cohorts, and forcing them to listen to the grievances of his people, and even to undertake the neglected task of solving the problem of their emancipation. With a patience, a persistence, and an inexhaustible fertility of resource, availing himself of the rules of debate which his adversaries had made and, with these weapons, so blocking public business that the men who had for long years shuffled, and evaded, and postponed any remedial measures for Ireland, were obliged to consider and discuss those measures to the neglect of all others. It was a marvellous exhibition of strategic skill. Night after night he held those proud patricians entangled in the net which they had woven for their own convenience, but which he had dexterously thrown over them, compelling them to remain in their seats from sunset to dawn, until he inspired them with respect for himself and the cause he represented. Then, as Ireland came to recognize the brilliant qualities of her son, and gave him a larger band of supporters, solemnly pledged to obey him, he went back to Parliament at the head of such numbers that he could defeat any Cabinet by casting the solid vote of his party with the opposition, or negative any party measure that either Liberals or Conservatives introduced. If he could not initiate legislation, he could prevent any one of the parties effecting legislation, or could aid the weaker party to carry its measures. Then his alliance was worth having; then he could bargain for support for the Irish cause by the offer of a support that was practically a casting vote. That was the time when he was dubbed, and with justice, "The Uncrowned King of Ireland." And the Irish people loved him. They had seen him standing up boldly for their interests and their national love of valor was joined with their patriotism as they acclaimed him. They had seen him sent to prison and overwhelmed with contumely for their sakes, and they gloried in their leader. Gladstone, the most powerful English statesman, espoused his cause and quitted office for the sake of the principles Parnell had nunciated. Victory seemed almost within his grasp, when he fell. A disgraceful intrigue with his friend's wife, a practical confession in a court of law of his guilt, and he was overthrown. For a week or two, men said, "What does it signify? What has private immorality to do with political questions? His abilities, his generalship, his strategic skill, which have shown the way to victory so often, are not impaired." But the falsity of such a theory was soon proved. The conscience of England and Ireland was aroused, and though Parnell fought hard to retain his power, he saw it snatched from him. The consciousness of the fact was probably a factor in his death. A sudden cold, caught early in the month, five days of illness and he was dead. A year ago his death would have been considered an overwhelming calamity to the cause of Ireland. Now men are asking themselves if it is not a blessing. So it has been that the warnings have been fulfilled which the wise king uttered against the sin which Parnell sinned: "A wound and dishonor shall he get and his reproach shall not be wiped away."

Sir John Pope Hennessy Dead.

It was a remarkable coincidence that simultaneous with the death of Parnell, the sudden demise of Sir John Pope Hennessy, the man who gave "the Uncrowned King" his first defeat at the polls, should also have taken place. Indeed so sudden were the deaths of these two political foes that the story spread that they were the result of a duel. This, however, was unfounded. Sir John Hennessy was a native of Cork, born in 1834. He was elected to Parliament in 1859, and for faithful services the government promoted him rapidly to the governorship of Labuan, the West African settlements, the Bahamas, Hong Kong and Mauritius successively. In 1890 he contested the N. Kilkenny election defeating Scully, the Parnellite, by 1147 votes. This was the turning tide of Parnell's success and the first of the long series of disasters that afterwards befell him. It was in this memorable fight that Healy opened his vials of wrath against what he called Hennessy's apostasy, and it was Hennessy's adherents who subjected Parnell to the most violent abuse at public gatherings. Sir John, besides his political avocations, found time for time for literature and published many articles in the leading magazines. His death occurred twenty-four hours after that of Parnell.

The Sole Survivor of the 26 Congress.

The only remaining member of the 26th Congress, the Hon. Henry Watterson, father of the well-known editor of the Courier Journal, is slowly dying in Louisville, Kentucky.

HON. H. WATTERSON.

When elected to Congress, Mr. Watterson was the youngest member on the floor of the House and for many years, during a very active life, he was a distinguished figure in national politics. With him will pass away one of the closest personal friends of Gen. Jackson, who was his godfather. During the Civil War, he was a strong supporter of the Union. His portrait is given above.

Two Notable Deaths.

The cable brings intelligence of the death of two distinguished Europeans: King Karl I, of Wurtemberg, and the Rt. Hon. William Henry Smith, First Lord of the British Admiralty. Karl Friedrich Alexander, the monarch of the Wurtembergers, and the eldest son of the late King Wilhelm, was born in 1823, and ascended the throne in 1864. He was a strong supporter of German unity. Karl married the Grand Duchess Olga-Nicolajewna, daughter of Nicholas I, Czar of Russia. It was his influence, perhaps, more than that of any other individual, that brought about the present Prussian military system. Notably eccentric and weak as a ruler, he at one time was controlled by three American adventurers whom he ennobled, installed as favorites in his palace, and enriched to the extent of impoverishing the royal treasury. The charge was made that the monarch was a spiritualist, and so great a scandal was created that the Cabinet resigned. Finally the adventurers were expelled from the country. King Karl will be succeeded by his nephew, Prince William, who is forty-three years of age. The new monarch's portrait is given in this column. The great English Commoner William Henry Smith was the son of a man who made a fortune in a very humble way. Young Smith learned his father's business, that of bookseller and news agent. Succeeding in life, he was elected to Parliament in 1868, and in 1874, when Disraeli came into power, he chose him as Parliamentary Secretary of the Treasury. So well did the young news-dealer perform the work of this office, that nobody was surprised when he was elevated to the office of First Lord of the Admiralty in 1887. Since that time, he has held many high offices, among them First Lord of the Treasury and Secretary of State for War, and he has been recognized as the government leader in the House of Commons. Recently another honor—that of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports—was imposed upon him. His health has been failing for a few years past.

KING WILHELM.

His health has been failing for a few years past.

Chinamen Smuggled from Canada.

It has just been discovered that quite an extensive business is being done in the line of smuggling Chinamen over the border from Canada. Several deputy United States Marshals have been detected in collusion with the smugglers. These deputies entice the Chinese into the hands of the Marshals, who then secure the fees that ought to go to the United States Treasury. Doubtless this traffic has been somewhat extensive, but it has been so adroitly managed by the very men who were supposed to prevent it, that it only leaked out accidentally through the local police at Niagara Falls.

An Emperor's Life Attempted.

The latest attempt at royal assassination in Europe occurred a few days ago at Reichenberg, near Prague, when what is believed to have been a deliberate plot to kill Emperor Franz Josef of Austria, was discovered, but not till after the danger had passed. Two bombs charged with nitroglycerine were placed in the drain of a railroad tunnel through which the imperial train must pass. The assassins, however, miscalculated the time, for the fuse acted before the arrival of the Emperor's train in the tunnel, and merely destroyed the masonry above and around the bridge, but did not disturb the bridge itself. An effort is being made to detect the plotters, but thus far without result. During the investigation that followed, thirteen bombs were discovered under a bridge of the Rosenthal Railway, over which the train would have also passed.

The Week's Disasters.

The past week has not been without the usual quota of accidents, attended by loss of life. One of the worst of these occurred at Mahanoy City, Pa., where fourteen miners were entombed in the Richardson colliery which is owned and operated by the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company. There was an explosion in the colliery on last week, and the workers in the mine at once ascended to the surface, with the exception of fourteen men who were cut off in one of the gangways. A rescuing party was organized, but was powerless to render aid. After digging through fifty yards of coal and rock, they succeeded in reaching eight of the men but too late to save their lives. Two had been crushed to death and six fatally burned. The other six were still imprisoned and there was little probability of saving any of them.—A freight crew on a train on the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad, near Akron, O., violated orders and the train crashed into a passenger train, on which was an excursion party. Three persons were killed and twenty-four injured. — Nearly two hundred acres of ground in the outskirts of Carbondale, Pa., situated above the Coalbrook Colliery, caved in slightly on the 5th inst. The miners were all ordered to quit work, as the ground above was swaying like a sea. It is believed the whole section will ultimately cave in. — Great forest fires in North and South Dakota have burned over tracts three hundred miles long and two hundred wide, destroying ranches, farms, dwellings, stock and cattle. Millions of feet of lumber have been consumed. It is believed that the fire was started by the Indians of the Mille Lacs Reservation, as there is evidence of incendiarism and the Indians' property was protected.—Rumors come from Mexico of the massacre by Indians of nearly two hundred persons in the district of Tulumengo. There has been trouble between the Indians and the miners, several colonies of Spaniards and Germans having attempted to settle upon lands claimed by the Indians who resisted bitterly. Men women and children are said to have perished in the massacre. Mexican Government troops have gone to the scene.

England's Liberal Congress.

The National Liberal Federation met in Newcastle, England, last week, and was formally opened by Hon. John Morley, the well-known Liberal leader and editor. In addressing the Federation, he claimed that Ireland had vindicated the confidence of the party by refusing to follow a leader (Parnell), whom Liberals could not conscientiously trust. He accused the Conservatives of blocking temperance reform and said the Liberals at heart favored it. He believed the temper of the present agitation was favorable to renewing the struggle against the hereditary peers, whenever their lordships were ready. The voice and influence of the British workman could not be heard reflectively in Parliament until the country had a Constitution like other countries, and a means of subsistence was provided for workingmen's representatives. There are in the Congress over one thousand members. It is expected that its action will be in the direction indicated by Mr. Morley, and that it will adopt resolutions favoring the granting of compulsory powers to representative local authorities for acquiring land for allotment in small holdings and also for providing dwellings for the working classes.

RT. HON. JOHN MORLEY.

NEWS NOTES.

A great strike has begun among the London dock men for better wages.

A daughter was born to Mrs. Cleveland, wife of ex-President Cleveland, on Oct. 13.

Edmund A. Schermerhorn, a miser, died at Newport, R. I., last week, leaving $25,000,000.

The funeral of Boulanger was a quiet affair. No public demonstration was permitted. He left a political testament that has not been made public, but which enjoins on his followers a continuance of the agitation he began.

Secretary Tracy proposes a reorganization of the present methods of promotion in the Navy. The number of officers will be reduced so as to give a navy of grades suitably proportioned to each other.

The Ulster County Savings Bank at Kingston, N. Y., has closed its doors. It has been discovered that there is a deficiency of $500,000 in the bank's cash and that it has been systematically robbed by two of its officers during a period of nearly twenty-five years. The treasurer and assistant treasurer have been arrested.

Queen Liliuokalani of Hawaii is dying of organic heart disease at Honolulu. Her death is expected to be the signal for an attempt by England to secure a controlling influence in the kingdom, but Americans at Honolulu will oppose this. Princess Kalulani, the heir to the throne is favorable to Britain, but the natives want a republic or annexation to the United States.

The American schooner, J. Hamilton Lewis, was shot at and seized by the Russian man-of-war Alert, for seal poaching about Cooper Island, Alaska. When ordered to come aboard, Captain McLean of the Lewis and twenty-five of his crew responded. On touching the deck of the Alert, a fight took place but the Americans were overpowered, and sent as prisoners to Vladivostok. An inquiry will be made by the State Department.

On the other hand, it is said that true religion makes people miserable. I would set an assembly against anybody who dares to say that. Unhappy ! Unhappy through being Christians ! I have suffered as much of bodily pain as most here present, and I know also about as much of depression of spirit at times as anyone; but my Master's service is a blessed service, and faith in him makes my heart leap for joy. I would not change with the most healthy man, or the most wealthy man, or the most learned man, or the most eminent man in all the world, if I had to give up my faith in Jesus Christ—tried as it sometimes is. A ! it is a blessed thing to be a Christian, and all God's people will tell you so.

It is oftentimes our lot to go to see the sick, but sick believers usually cheer our heart. There is a seat just below that used to be occupied by a beloved sister, well-known to you, whom I went to visit in her sickness; and I do assure you, when she was in a consumption, and near to death, I never spent a happier hour than I did with her. And only last week, or ten days ago, when I sat down with her, and she could scarcely speak, yet what she did say was as full of sacred joy as words could compass. She is in heaven now, and heaven was in her then. "So much farther on have I got," said she, "to the better land—so many the fewer of these hard breaths to fetch, and so many the fewer of these hard pains to bear. I shall soon be where Jesus is;" and she talked as freely about dying, and as I should talk of going to my own house when this service is ended. Before she fell asleep yesterday, about twelve o'clock, she said to those about her she felt strangely as if she were going through a river. At one time she said she was in the midst of it, the floods were round about her; and soon she said, in intervals of consciousness, "I am going up the other side; the waters are shallower; I am mounting the other bank." At length she cried, "Jesus is coming for me! I can hear the music of heaven!" Her heart seemed to be overpowered with some sweet mystic melody, which, if it did not enter her soul by the ear, at any rate reached her inmost spirit by some other channel. "I can hear them sing! I can hear them sing!" she said, and when Jesus comes don't keep him waiting for me; don't wish me to stop. Let me go." She is gone. Never one I think suffered more in dying, and never had a consumptive more difficultly in breathing. Thank God, they do not often suffer as much as she did; yet there was never one more calm, more comfortable, and more joyous on the bed of death than this daughter of affliction.

I believe in God without any evidence except himself, and his own revelation of himself to my soul; but yet I thank God for evidences; and among those most helpful to me are the #### Death-Beds of Believers.

It does my soul great good to see the Lord's people depart this life. I grieve that you should be taken away to heaven, for we want you here; but ah! if the departure of any of you shall be so sweet as those I have been privileged to witness of late, I shall come to my pulpit boldly. If the religion that I teach makes men and women die like this, I am not ashamed to preach it. If the faith that I have delivered to them, by the power of the Holy Ghost, makes them so triumphant in the last article of death, I will deliver nothing else, but still continue to tell them to trust simply in the substitutionary sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and rest wholly and only there. I say, then, by the living saints that do rejoice, and by the dying saints who die without a fear, I set an assembly against the man who dares to slander true religion by saying that it does not make men happy.

I had many other things to say, but it were well to leave you where you are, only praying you, by the shortness of time, by the glories of heaven, by the value of your own souls, by the blood of Jesus, and by the glory of the eternal God, to cease being his enemies. Seek ye his face. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

A RUNAWAY LOCOMOTIVE.

CURIOSITY has caused a little boy in New Jersey a terrible fright. He was playing about the tracks near Newark on September 26th, when he noticed an engine standing alone on a siding. There was no one on the engine, so the boy climbed into the cab to look at it. He examined the different parts, ascertaining by experiment how they worked. He lifted one lever and pushed another, until to his dismay, the engine gave a snort or two, and then moved at a lively pace down the siding toward the main track. The boy was wild with terror, for he was not sure which lever it was that had started the engine. The pace was increasing and nothing that he could do would stop it. The engine travelled on for about a mile, when it struck a switch not set for it. Then it jumped the track and plowed through the soft earth of the meadows until the steam was exhausted. The boy jumped off and ran to tell his mother of his escapade. The railroad men say the boy ran away with the locomotive, but it would appear rather that the locomotive ran away with the boy. It would not have done so, however, if he had not meddled with it. The same may be said of men who are going rapidly along the downward track of drunkenness and vice to their ruin. They never intended to start on such a journey and they would stop if they knew how. (Prov. 11:19.)

DIAMONDS IN METEORITES.

UNIQUE specimens of precious stones are to be among the exhibits in the World's Fair. The Chicago Tribune says that a fragment of meteoric rock which fell from the sky on the earth near Canon Diable, Arizona, was recently sent to Prof. G. A. Keering to be cut and polished for exhibition. He found it to be extremely hard and spent a day and a half in trying to make a section. The hardest chisels were broken against it and an emery wheel was spoiled by something in its composition. On examining it more closely, it was found that the obstruction was two diamonds, so hard that they would cut polished corundum as easily as a knife cuts wood. The diamonds have been extracted and will be exhibited at Chicago as specimens of celestial jewels. They will form an interesting exhibit, for it has hitherto been supposed that the much-coveted stones were to be obtained only from the earth. So men have thought about happiness joy and pleasure, but that also is an error. Experience has proved that those who seek them in their highest and purest forms must seek them in the heavens. (James 1:17.)

AN ELIGIBLE HUSBAND.

A PRESS dispatch from Atlanta, Ga., announces a wedding which took place at Ansell on September 21. The bridegroom settled there as a farm laborer a few years ago. He was a German immigrant, honest and industrious and apparently well educated, but very poor. He won the respect of his employers but the women around slighted him on account of his poverty. One girl alone, who worked in the cotton fields, showed an interest in him. He appreciated her kindness and soon their friendship ripened into love. Marriage, however, was not to be thought of, as both were so poor. Early this year the man received a letter calling him back to Germany. He said that his father was very sick. On his arrival there he found that his father was dead and he was the sole heir to his fortune, which amounted to $600,000. He stayed a month or two settling up his affairs and then returned to America. The story of his good fortune preceded him and when he arrived in Atlanta, clad in garb appropriate to his station, he received a cordial welcome. There were many beautiful ladies who would not have rejected the addresses of the wealthy German gentleman, but he went back to the farm where he had worked. The girl who had been kind to him was taken from the cotton-fields and arrayed in silk and fine linen and on September 21 they were married. When asked why he did not marry an educated girl, he said none such showed him any kindness when he was poor. If one of them married him now it would be for his money. He preferred the girl who had loved him as a poor man and he could have her educated. It is so that Christ will honor his bride, the Church, when he comes in his glory. Especial honor will they have who loved him and followed him in his humiliation. (Rom. 8:17; Rev. 19:7, 8.)

PROPOSED MARRIAGE BY PROXY.

AMONG the immigrants who arrived in New York, by the Hamburg steamer on September 23d, was a German girl whom the Commissioners detained for investigation. She said that six months ago her lover preceded her to America. He had settled at Milwaukee and had sent her money to follow him, and they were to be married on her arrival. He was not here to meet her, so a dispatch was sent to him at Milwaukee informing him that the girl was at the Barge Office and would be sent back to Germany if he did not come to claim her. He replied that he was perfectly willing to marry her but could not afford to take several days off and bear the expense of a journey to New York to be married. He enclosed an affidavit stating the facts, and offering to be married by proxy. He authorized the Chief of the Emigration Commissioners to "select some gentleman to act as my proxy." The notary who drew up the affidavit also wrote that a perfectly valid marriage could be performed if some person duly authorized represented the bridegroom at the ceremony. The Commissioners thought otherwise and refused to allow a marriage of that kind to take place. The girl then suggested a marriage by telegraph, but that too, was, declared inadmissible. The bridegroom must come in person and be married, or the girl would be sent back to Germany. Many have been brought to the same pass in seeking union with Christ. In that, too, no proxy is available and if business or pleasure is an obstacle it must be sacrificed or the union cannot take place. (Luke 14:16-21.)

EXTRACTING A TIGER'S TOOTH.

For some time past a big tiger in a travelling menagerie has surprised his keepers by spasmodic ill-humor. He was so vicious at times that it was dangerous to approach him even to give him food. It was noticed that at such times his jaw was swollen, and the manager began to suspect that he was suffering from toothache. The suspicion proved correct, for on closely watching the beast while eating, a decayed tooth was seen in his upper jaw. The manager feared that if nothing was done for him blood-poisoning might set in, and the animal, which had only recently been purchased at a cost of nearly one thousand dollars, would die. He decided to have the tooth extracted, but not until the show reached Chicago could a dentist be found with enough courage to undertake the operation. There a man agreed to do the work. A stout collar was fastened around the tiger's neck and a leather belt around his body. Each of his feet was secured by ropes and his mouth kept open by a gag. The animal fought fiercely while he was thus secured, and when he saw the dentist approach with his instruments he made another convulsive effort to free himself. But he failed; if he had succeeded he would surely have killed one or more of the men. In a few minutes the dentist by a mighty pull drew out the offending tooth. The animal was released, and has since recovered his normal health and temper. Probably the operation saved his life, but the animal could not be expected to know that he was being tortured for his own benefit. Even men do not always bear patiently the suffering which is remedial. Especially is this so when spiritual benefit is to come from physical suffering. The day will come, however, when the Christian, looking back on the afflictions of his past life, will thank God for them because they have yielded "the peaceable fruit of righteousness." (Heb 12:11.)

OUR OWN MISSIONARY.

The Work in North East Missouri of Rev. George W. Sharp "The Christian Herald" Missionary of the Sunday School Union.

HEARING intelligence comes from the South-West, where, as our readers are aware, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is supporting a missionary of the American Sunday School Union. This work is peculiarly gratifying because it is undenominational work. The souls won are not accessions to one sect from another, but have been gathered from the world's great harvest-field into the kingdom of Christ. No attempt is made to organize churches of any particular denomination, but to get the people, especially the children, together to listen to the simple Gospel which is able to make them wise unto salvation. That is our missionary's sole aim. He goes into neglected, sparsely settled districts with that one purpose, leaving to others who may follow in his steps the explanation of denominational differences.

Rev. George W. Sharp the missionary in question, whose portrait is here given, had been laboring in Northeast Missouri and adjacent districts for nearly twelve years, when the American Sunday School Union discovered ed that owing to straitness of its finances it was no longer able to maintain a missionary in that field. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD knew something of the services Mr. Sharp had rendered and of the urgent need there was for a continuance of them. The publisher, therefore, invited the readers to join him in defraying the cost of Mr. Sharp's work and they promptly responded. The American Sunday School Union was notified that the necessary funds for Mr. Sharp's support for a year were in hand and since June last he has been proceeding with his work.

The energy and indefatigable industry this consecrated man has displayed have been truly wonderful and the results of God's blessing on his efforts are such as to cause profound thankfulness. In one district he visited, there was no church or public building in which a Sunday School could meet or religious services be held. A poor farmer was induced to allow meetings to be held in the lower floor of his house. The school was well attended and that not by children alone. Many older people came and when Mr. Sharp visited the place again, ten persons made profession of faith in Christ and ascribed their conversion to the blessing of God on that Sunday School.

In June last Mr. Sharp visited a village where he established a school a few years ago and remained a few weeks organizing it. By the time he left, the school numbered in scholars, teachers and officers, all told, eighty persons. When he went there again in June of this year he found that the school had grown until another school in another building had been organized, the two having an aggregate membership of 162. Both were union schools representing together four denominations. Mr. Sharp held a mass-meeting and he and the teachers gave evangelistic addresses. More than a dozen of various ages, including a venerable white-haired man, rose to ask for prayers.

How far-reaching are the results of these labors is indicated by the fact that during last month's tour Mr. Sharp met a young man who recognized him and asked him if he did not establish a school in a certain district about six years ago. Mr. Sharp replied that he did. The young man said that he attended the school and produced a little book which the missionary gave him then. It had been the means of his conversion and he is now himself engaged in Evangelistic work. A second young man who ascribes his conversion to Mr. Sharp's labors, is now preparing for the ministry in Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn., and the sermons he has preached during his vacations have been blessed to the conversion of many souls. Thus the seed sown bears fruit. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is sure that when its subscribers read of these tokens of blessing they will rejoice that Mr. Sharp has been kept in the field and will pray that God will continue to bless his labors.

An Eminent Literarian and an Authority on Biblical History — Rev. Dr. Burr's Busy Life at Mansewood, Ct.

ENOCH FITCH BURR, D.D. (Amherst), LL.D. (London), the author of the new serial, "Aleph, the Chaldean," which is begun in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is a native of Westport, Ct., and belongs to the same family with Aaron Burr, second President of the College of New Jersey. In early childhood he lost his father. His mother, a woman of great energy, piety, and love of learning, became father as well as mother to her three sons, and carried two of them through a course of liberal education. Enoch was graduated at Yale. The next three years he spent in New Haven in post-graduate studies, chiefly of a theological and scientific nature. He spent two or three years in close study of the higher mathematics and physical astronomy, in connection with the College Observatory. He then accepted the pastorate of a Congregational Church in Lyme, Ct., which he has continued to hold without interruption until the present time—with the exception of a year spent in foreign travel in company with his wife and brother.

For several years he has lectured to the Senior Classes in Amherst College on The Scientific Evidences of Religion; and on The Latest Astronomy against Atheism; as well as on kindred themes in the Schofield Scientific School, Williams College, and other institutions.

His spacious home, Mansewood, is situated in an elevated and picturesque part of the old historic town of Lynne, Ct. In this house his wife, Harriet A. Lord, was born and has always lived. It abounds in books and works of art. Among the latter is a marble bust of Christ, life-size, by an Italian artist, which has been much admired, and is believed to be the finest piece of sculpture in this country.

In addition to other literary work, Dr. Burr has published seventeen volumes which have been received with great favor by leading scholars, and have found their way into many lands. The list is as follows:

"Ecce Caelum," "Pater Mundi," "Ad Fidem," "Doctrine of Evolution," "Work in the Vineyard," "Toward the Straight Gate," "Sunday Afternoons," "Thy Voyage," and "From Dark to Day," (Illustrated Poems); "Dio, the Aethian," "Ecce Terra," "Tempted to Unbelief," "Celestial Empires," "Universal Beliefs," "Long Ago," and "Supreme Things."

In the last issued, Aleph the Chaldean, the object is to present in a vivid manner in connection with interesting personal adventures and scenes in the first century, the historic evidences of Christianity. It has been compared by eminent critics to Gen. Lew Wallace's Ben Hur, and it will produce a powerful impression on all who read it. It is especially a story for the home. As it progresses, our readers will discover its rare charm and the force of the great truths it teaches, with all the attractions of a perfect story.

Volume XI., of The Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1888, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office: price $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885 and 1887, are also for sale.

OUR FATHER'S HOUSE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 25. John 14: 2-4; I. Cor. 2: 9, 10; II. Cor. 5: 1.

HOW much is included in the words, "Our Father's House" even in their earthly meaning! The boy away at school looking forward to vacation, the young man in the city store, or office, or bank, setting out to the old familiar dwelling, even the man of mature age visiting his native place, cannot tell all the meaning that the words convey. They speak to the memory, if not to the present sense, of peace, of security, of affectionate association, of tenderness, of loving companionship, of rest and a host of other pleasant suggestions. And there are privileges too. A poor woman was gazing intently through the iron palisades which enclose the garden of a European palace. Her eyes were set on a cluster of rose-bushes laden with the wealth of richly scented blossoms. "How I wish I had just one bud for my sick boy!" she said. "He dearly loves a rose." "They are not for the likes of you," said the gruff soldier who stood on guard at the house. A young man whom the soldier saluted with great deference, heard the woman's words and the soldier's reply, as he passed. "I will give you some roses my good woman," he said, "and I hope they will do your boy good." He cut a handful of the most beautiful and put them in her hand. "I hope you will not get into trouble, kind sir," she said, "for your kindness to a poor woman." "Oh! no," was the reply, "this is my father's garden; I am the son of the Prince." That explained it. She could understand, when she knew that, why he could cut the flowers and give them away.

Jesus was going to his Father's house. He was leaving his friends behind and he comforted them by telling them whither he was going and his purpose. He knew that house well and his words were spoken with confidence. It was "a house of many mansions," as when an Oriental potentate adds a wing to his palace for the dwelling-place of a grown-up son, or builds for him a cottage in his wide domain within sight of his own home. Jesus was going home—to his Father's house, and he was going to prepare a place for them. The separation was to be but an interval and it would be spent in the preparation of an eternal home. That preparation he undertook, but on their side there should be preparation also, and he provided for that too, for he told them how he had prayed for the Holy Spirit to be given to them, and from him they would receive the preparation necessary. They who go on a visit to wealthy and influential people, think much of what they shall take with them to wear and to use; but nothing of that kind was necessary to those whom Jesus invited. Yet, as they were to live there, some preparation was needed. The poor among princes is a burden to himself and to them. He must learn the ways of the house, the manner of life of the inmates, the spirit that animates them, their habits and pursuits, before he can be happy there. The pattern is before us. He who is most like Jesus is best fitted to enter the house of many mansions. The unselfish spirit, the magnanimous forbearance, the love of others, the self-sacrificing devotion which characterized him and made him the admiration of the ages must be in those who by his invitation enter his Father's house. Having this hope in them they purify themselves through the Spirit given to them.

And what a hope it is! Even the beloved John was transported with wonder by the vision he had of that house of many mansions. He uses the symbols which men are wont to associate with magnificence—the wealth of gold and gems—to convey to the imagination conceptions too grand for mortal thought. The Apostle Paul, though he had been caught up there in the spirit, will not make the attempt. "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard neither have entered into the heart of man the things prepared." And there is besides, the thought on which John dwells with joyful exultation, "They go no more out." It is not a brief visit but a residence forever. No wonder that such a prospect has made poverty and hardship and even the martyr's fire endurable. The passage is but short and the destination so blessed. A Christian dying of a painful disease being near the last pang was trying hard to keep his thoughts fixed on that home, though his body was racked with pain. "You are going home," said his minister consolingly. "Yes, yes, sir I know," was the reply. "I am only just a bit confused with the flitting." That was all. It is a confusing time, but in the home to which he was going there would be no confusion and those who go there find that God wipes all tears from their eyes.

DIRECTIONS TO KING'S DAUGHTERS.

LETTERS frequently reach us asking what steps are necessary to joining the King's Daughters. The following directions given by the President of the Order in the Ladies' Home Journal will answer these correspondents: I will give you explicit directions now as to what you should do so that you will not write "Tell me what I am to do?" You must be a member of our Order before you ever join any Circle; you can be enrolled as a member of the Order at our headquarters in New York city, 47 West Twenty-second street. Send your name and address there with ten cents, the membership fee, and there you can get your cross which is the badge of the Order. We are an incorporated society and a silver cross is the seal of our corporation. You are not obliged to wear this cross, but no other cross can be worn as our badge; though a bit of royal purple ribbon is an emblem of membership, and can be had at the same place, so you can wear either one or both; but, if you can afford it, I would advise you to have the cross; it will cost you but thirty cents, and that will make the total cost forty cents. There may be some who cannot afford the cross—I know women who write to me from away off on the frontier, and they really have no money, no paper, no stamps. Nothing has touched me more than to receive letters written by educated women who are hedged in by their present environment so as to make it exceedingly difficult to get money enough requisite to write a letter, and yet they want to join our Order and wear this cross. I speak of this because if it comes to you to give, "In His Name," the little silver cross to one who cannot afford to buy one, I will see that your wishes are carried out. I hope there will come a time when we shall be rich enough at the Centre to do this; but that time I assure you is not now.

AN APPEAL OF THE Y. P. S. C. E.

THE committee appointed by the Christian Endeavor Convention at Minneapolis to influence the World's Fair Commissioners in favor of closing the Fair on Sundays has issued an appeal to the Societies urging them to separate and united action. It is signed by Rev. R. V. Hunter, Chairman of the Committee, and the following are some of the suggestions made:

That the C. E. forces should be organized, in order that they may bring the proper influences to bear upon those Commissioners in whose hands the deciding of this question lies. We should seek to influence these Commissioners, when assembled in Chicago, but especially while at their homes. There are many Sabbath organizations looking after the Commissioners when in session. It has been agreed that the proper function of the C. E. forces is to influence these Commissioners in the retirement of their homes. More can be done with an individual by a friend or neighbor when alone, than can possibly be accomplished when overwhelmed with business, and in company with the Commissioners at Chicago. Let the C. E. forces then emphasize this particular phase of the work.

Something can be accomplished also by bringing Christian and patriotic influences to bear upon the Commissioners of the various State exhibits. If a large number of the States can be induced to close their exhibits on the Sabbath; and if those departments of the Exposition over which the ladies have control can be closed also; and if, as we have reason to believe, a few of the Foreign departments may be closed, the logic of the situation will compel the National Commissioners to close the whole affair on the Sabbath day.

Now what this Committee would advise is, that your State C. E. Executive Committee, either through your district or State conventions, or in any way that may seem best to the State Executive Committee, shall proceed to organize, so that influential men and women may be led to bring their influence to bear upon these Commissioners, State and National, in favor of Sabbath closing. This can be done by different bodies calling on these gentlemen at their homes.

Let the necessity of Sabbath closing be urged in every possible way, upon every legitimate ground. This can be argued on grounds of economy, morality, religion and patriotism. Urge that we are a Christian nation, and that our example before the world should not be immoral. Commence action at once. Enter into this work with zeal and wisdom.

You may find out from the Governor of your State or from your State Secretary, what persons constitute your State Commission. Do not fail to communicate with them. Their influence will be valuable.

It would be well if a place should be given in your State and District Conventions to the consideration of this subject. Let some one be selected who can present the question in a strong, clear, and enthusiastic manner. Large numbers would thus become acquainted with the plan, and, we hope, interested in pushing the cause.

It has been proposed also, if possible, to secure the passage of a bill in the coming Congress, instructing the Commissioners of the World's Fair to close on the Sabbath day.

The honor of our Master is at stake; the good name of our Republic is threatened by the ungodly; the million Christian Endeavorers should be felt in this matter. For the sake of our Lord, our country and the world, let us act promptly. Pray, organize, push.

A NEW CIRCLE.

As there are many women and girls on ranches and in lonely places where they are not often within easy reach of each other, who nevertheless would like to be enrolled as King's Daughters, Mrs. Bottome, the President of the Order, has devised a plan to meet the exigency. She proposes to form a special Circle of these scattered sisters and she suggests that it bear her own name. The proposal is made in one of her talks in the Ladies' Home Journal. She writes: "No kindness shown to any fellow creature is too small to be called a service 'In His Name.' Your little children need to be educated in unselfishness, and there is nothing in the principles of our Order that a little child cannot understand. Undoubtedly many will join 'The Margaret Bottome Circle' who are just coming into the Order, and who write me, 'Must I form a circle to be in the Order?' 'There are no Circles in this place.' And yet, though they cannot form a Circle and there is no Circle in that place to join, they somehow do not wish to feel alone, though in a vast 'Sisterhood'; so this will meet their want. My sister in the Argentine Republic will join. My friends who are on ranches far from all old associations will join. I know what an addition to my letters this will make, but I invite you all to write who want to join my Circle."

HOW TO MEET A CRISIS.

THE story of a crisis in a Young Men's Christian Association is told by the Young Men's Era. It appears that in a certain town the officers of the Y. M. C. A., discouraged by lack of support, called a general meeting and recommended that the institution be abandoned. They were so thoroughly convinced of the hopelessness of the work that they were opposed to any effort being made to revive it. Two or three of the members, however, realizing the need of Christian work among young men strongly urged that such an effort be made. Finally twenty young men were found who pledged themselves to save the Association if it could be done. They formed a new Board of Directors, arranged an attractive programme and set themselves diligently to find new members. Not only has the Association been saved, but it is more prosperous than at any period of its existence; it pays its Secretary $1,000 a year and is now looking out for an efficient physical director. So much may be done by an energetic band of young men really in earnest in a good work. The crisis was safely passed and need never have come if the twenty young men had given themselves to the work earlier. The emergency called them into action and the hour of crisis was, as so often happens, the hour before daybreak.

"AS HE IS."

(1. John 3: 2.)

WHEN we see Him as He is,
In that Land of peace and rest,
Surrounded by the millions,
His own sacrifice hath blessed,
We shall lose our rougher natures
For a gentle one like His;
And we all shall be new creatures,
When we see Him as He is.

But we need not wait so long
To see the Master's face,
To listen to His soothing,
And behold His matchless grace;
There's not a flower that blossoms
But reflects a love of His
That will shine out strong and steady,
When we see Him as He is.

His presence is about us
And when we let Him in We're welcoming the Lamb of God
Who takes away our sin.
Too often we look past Him,
And behold no face like His,
In fearing we shan't know Him—
Till we see Him as He is.

Let us see Him here in nature—
In the kind words of our Friend;
With heaven right around us,
Let earth and heaven blend:
Nor waste in speculation
This precious time of His—
E'en glimpses make us like Him,
Till we see Him as He is. —L. A.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

Visit to the Tomb of Rachel—One of the Earliest "Memory Places" in the World.

MUCH interest had been expressed by the younger members of the household in the beautiful picture illustrating the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, published in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and there was a very general desire to know more about the ancient highway and the historic remains on either side.

"The most attractive of all the places along the road, outside of Bethlehem itself," said Uncle John, "is the tomb of Rachel. You remember that Dr. Talmage, in a sermon preached quite lately, described the meeting of Jacob and Rachel at the well in Mesopotamia where the droves gathered to water? Jacob was looking for a wife then and he saw a beautiful shepherdess come to the well with her father's flock. Her body now lies in a small mosque, which marks the spot where she died when Benjamin was born."

"That was little Benjamin who afterward went down to Egypt to see Joseph, wasn't it?" asked one of the children.

"Yes," replied Uncle John. "Rachel herself called him 'Benoni,' which means 'the son of my sorrow,' but Jacob who set great value by the lad called him Benjamin, 'the son of my right hand,' meaning I suppose that love of Rachel, his Aramaean wife, he would always keep the boy beside him. Many years afterwards, when he was a venerable patriarch, he told the touching story. 'As for me, when I came to Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan on the way; when yet there was but a little way come to Ephrath: the place is Bethlehem.'

"All over the Holy Land Rachel's memory is held in loving reverence, and even the invading invaders respected her tomb, and erected a mosque over the site."

"The Turks did that?" inquired Tom.

"Turk or Saracen," was the reply. "The mosque has within it a small rude shrine which marks the remnant of the pillar that was set by Jacob over her grave. Every month the pilgrims go to the mosque and lament for Rachel. I have seen them there making their outcry, though she had died but yesterday, instead of thousands of years ago. The mosque itself is a square building, rather modern in aspect although it covers the first monument to the dead that was ever set up since the creation of the world. Before the seventh century there was only a pyramid of stones surrounding the pillar and no mosque. Nearby, the ground is covered with stones, entirely hiding the soil, and this peculiarity is explained by a legend. Christ was passing along near the tomb of Rachel when he discovered a peasant sowing. Being asked by the Saviour what he sowed the fellow replied angrily: 'Stones!' 'Then,' said Jesus, 'Stones ye shall reap' and he passed on."

"What a singular legend!" exclaimed one of the listeners.

"We visited the tomb while in Palestine," continued Uncle John. "It is about half a mile north of Bethlehem and the Turks, Jews and Christians all agree as to its authenticity. Kubbet Rahil (Rachel's Grave), it is called by the natives, and so it was probably called in the days when the long lines of weeping Israelites passed it to go to captivity in Babylon. It is now rather neglected and falling into decay, as you can see by the general appearance of the mosque in the photograph; still, pilgrimages are made to the spot by the Jews and the inner walls are covered with names written in almost every language, and almost all being those of Hebrews or their descendants.

"There was one weak spot in Rachel's otherwise beautiful character, that has been transmitted to us by history. When she went with Jacob to Canaan, she took away with her her father's household gods, apparently without informing Jacob of the act. You remember reading in Genesis 35: 2, how the presence of these idols caused trouble in Jacob's household and how, finally, at God's command he ordered the images to be cast out. It was after his household had been purified that his bereavement came; but he doubtless remembered the circumstance with lifelong sorrow and attributed to it much of his affliction."

What Came of a Woman's Effort.

HERE is a little experience fruitful in suggestion for those who are by their environments shut off from the larger field of effort in God's work. A mother writes us from Christiansburg, Va:

"I have been conducting a Sabbath School in my house and trying to do good by reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to those who cannot read themselves, and it has become of such interest that my house will no longer accommodate those who are eager to hear, therefore I am resolved by God's help to build a church. We are a little flock, trying to pay for homes to raise our children, and are unable to get a church within ourselves, but we have been for two years praying God to help us in this cause, and we believe that we will yet see a house in which we can assemble ourselves with more ease than we have done. We do not want to discontinue our work in winter, if we can help it, but my house is only a small cabin and I cannot warm it comfortably."

"I first started by reading and teaching my own little ones; then they brought other children and these children brought their parents. Now we number more than fifty who never attended worship anywhere till now. Though I cannot preach like Paul, I can tell the story of Jesus to little children and the poor ignorant ones by whom I am surrounded."

This brave Christian woman, who has thus marched on "from strength to strength," deserves the encouragement of everyone who loves God's word and delights in his work. The Lord never permits true service to go unrewarded.

"It Pays."

"A FATHER" writes us from McConnellsville, Ohio, "Our son's death came upon us at first as a heavy blow, but it has since proved a rich blessing. He had been a consistent Christian for many years, but it was left for his death to reveal to his parents his usefulness and the extent to which he had endeared himself to the people of F—— and especially those who are Christians there. We want you to tell the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it pays to bring up children with prayer and God's word, ever trusting in the Lord for help and guidance. Our boy was a subject of prayer from his birth. God be praised for the memory of his precious life."

Yes; it pays. The recollection of a young dured your brother when there was no one else, but that when there was—well, then it was different? Is that any reason why you should not listen to his word of advice about other girls and their brothers? None whatever. Try to take an interest in your brothers, especially if they are younger than you are. Good will come of it and much pleasure in the home circle, besides.

THE IDEAL HOME.

WE may build a house, says a writer in the Rocky Mountain Christian Advocate, and we may call it home, but unless it is the place above all others for soul culture and mental growth, it seems almost sacrilegious to give it that endearing name. An ideal home may be in an unpretending cottage as well as in a palace. In either case love must be the pivot on which the intricate machinery of home duties turns. If we desire a model home, we must be willing to work for it—with brain and heart as well as hands.

Children should receive their first lessons in usefulness around the family hearthstone. Very early should they be taught that their own desires must be made subservient to the comfort of the family. Were this rule generally followed, there would be fewer selfish exactions, and the home-life would be largely filled with generous, disinterested deeds.

If more time and pains were taken to make homes that are worthy of the name, the wrongdoings of sons and daughters would not so often plant thorns in the pillows of their parents during their declining years.

If parents would take more interest in the amusements of their children, there would be less danger of them entering forbidden paths of pleasure when they are called to leave the home that has sheltered their childhood. Young people must have recreation of some kind. It is natural and necessary, and needs much thought and care.

Ah, blessings on those little hands,
Whose work is yet undone!
And blessings on those little feet,
Whose race is yet unrun!
And blessings on the little brain,
That has not learned to plan!
Whate'er the future holds in store,
God bless the "coming man!"

A Kind-hearted Emperor.

A PLEASING story of the late Emperor Frederick is related in one of the German papers. Some years ago, shortly before the death of the old Emperor, a tall, handsome gentleman jumped into a third-class carriage of a local railway at Berlin, just as the train was leaving the station. An old flower-seller, with a basket of newly-cut hyacinths, was the only other occupant of the compartment. He asked the old dame to sell him a bunch, and she chose the freshest and largest, and handed it to him. Its price was a penny; but she was paid with a mark piece, which, as she said at once, was a thing that had never been heard of before in a third-class carriage.

Presently the stranger and the flower-seller were in conversation, and it turned out that the poor woman was the bread-winner of a family of four. Her son was crippled, her granddaughter a little school-girl, and her husband had for some months past been out of work, since a new railway official had dismissed him as being too old to do much work. The stranger then suggested that she should apply, on her husband's behalf, to the railway authorities.

"That is no good whatever," she replied, as she wiped her tears with her apron. "If you haven't the Pope for your cousin now-a-days you can't get anybody to listen to you."

"Then try the Emperor," the stranger went on.

"Alas!" she sighed; "If the old gentleman was allowed to see the petitions that are sent, it might do some good; but he does not get to know about us poor people."

"Well, then, let your husband write to the Crown Prince."

"Yes," she said, "he might do that," and she would tell him so as soon as she had sold her flowers.

By this time the train had got to the terminus, the old dame bundled out her basket, and noticed with astonishment that the officials and the crowd on the platform looked at her carriage and saluted and cheered. "What's up?" she asked. "Why, the Crown Prince was in the same compartment with you."

Then the flower-seller held her head high, and told every syllable of what had happened to the delighted crowd. Her flowers were sold before five minutes were over.

A True Sister.

THE sister who is well-beloved by the brother is almost certain to be liked elsewhere. There is no surer way to learn genuine courtesy than to practice it habitually in his presence. You say, "But he's my own brother." Is that any reason why you should take his courtesies for granted, and never say "thank you"? Is that any reason why you should not try and make an evening at home pleasant for him, instead of forcing him by your selfishness to seek his happiness somewhere else? Is that any reason why you should not think his opinion of your frocks, your bonnet or looks, worth consideration? Is that any reason why you should appear before him in a clumsy wrapper and with your hair in papers? Is that any reason why, when you have a man visitor, he should be made to feel that you en-

A JAPANESE PIONEER.

Flight from Japan.*

IN the summer of 1864, the brig Berlin of Nagasaki, Japan arrived at Hakodate, consigned to Frederick Wilkie, Esq. in command of William B. Savory, of Salem, Mass. Just before leaving on the return voyage to Shanghai, Captain Savory was informed by Mr. Wilkie that a young Japanese, the friend of a native clerk in his office, was anxious to escape from Japan to the United States, where he hoped to obtain an education. Reminding the Captain that serious consequences were likely to follow his detection in the act of taking a native out of the country, Mr. Wilkie called the young man, then about twenty-one years of age, into his office, and Captain Savory, through the clerk, who acted as interpreter, offered him a passage to Shanghai provided he could reach the brig without assistance from those on board, and promised to do what he could towards securing his transfer to some vessel returning to the United States. As a result of this proposition the clerk, before mentioned, assisted his friend on board the Berlin during the night. Owing to the presence of Japanese custom officers on the vessel, the runaway was secreted in one of the cabin state-rooms, and given to understand by signs that he must remain in hiding until the brig was under way. "I shall never forget," writes Captain Savory in 1883, "the first interview I had with him or how happy he felt when he saw the shores of his native land fading from his view, knowing that he was safe from all harm. His sole aim then was to learn the English language, that he might be able to translate the Bible into his own tongue for the benefit of his countrymen."

On arriving at Shanghai, the Berlin was ordered to Nagasaki. Knowing that his young protegee could return to Japan only at the risk of his life, Captain Savory secured his transfer to the ship Wild Rover of Boston, Mass., owned by Alpheus Hardy & Co., under the command of Captain Horace S. Taylor. In Sept. 1864 Captain Taylor sailed for Foochoo, but remained in Chinese waters through the winter. On April 1, 1865, he set sail from Manila for Boston where he arrived after a four months' passage. When this young Japanese came on board the Wild Rover at Shanghai, he could speak but a few English words, though he had some knowledge of the written language. On being asked his name, he replied "Neesima Shimeta." "I shall call you Joe," was the Captain's laconic announcement.

Shortly after reaching Boston Captain Taylor informed his owner that he had a Japanese boy on board the ship, who was anxious to secure an education, and at Mr. Hardy's request Neesima was sent for. During the voyage he had acquired the ship's vocabulary, but was still unable to make known his wishes in correct English. To every question asked by Mrs. Hardy, he replied only in monosyllables. It was impossible to understand from his answers why he had left Japan, and beyond the statement of Captain Taylor, a very reticent man, nothing could be learned of his aims or desires. Neesima was therefore sent to the Sailors' Home, and requested to put in writing the reasons which led him to flee his native country. In a short time Mr. Hardy received a quaintly written statement clearly explaining his desire for an education and his whole previous history up to that date. It concluded as follows:

A Japanese Letter.

"I AM concerned about it as much as my brain would melted out, and when such musings fell on my head, I could not read book at all, I would not do anything very cheerfully, and I looked around myself long time as a lunatic, because it confused my mind very much. But I know not yet will I take what course of my life, and I know not too any trade to earn myself. Alas I am poor and foolish. I have no one around me to relieve me except you. Then I wish heartily to you that please let me direct into some good way which I may reach my aim. If you let me reach my aim I will never forget your kindness and virtuousness. Although I will go down behind a grave, my soul will go to heaven to tell to God about it and let him bless you. Please let me hear that Mr. Hardy will let me go to what kind of a school, and I wish that he gave me the remainder of his table for my eating, old one of his clothing for my dressing, ink, pen, paper, pencil for using of my study."

To this remarkable statement was due the beginning of that interest which deepened with the years and which subsequent events amply justified. On learning that Mr. Hardy had determined to send him to school, Neesima was full of gratitude. He wrote to thank him, concluding with the prayer: "O Lord please set thy eyes upon my Hardy, and keep out him from illness and temptation."

In 1885, when after a lapse of twenty years, this runaway occupied a position of honor and influence in his native land, he sent to those whom he loved to call his American parents a fuller account of his early life. From this narrative and from his letters much of the material of this volume has been obtained.

LOST MANUSCRIPTS.*

STUDENTS of Holy Scripture and of early Christianity are learning every day to look more and more to ancient Greek, Syriac and Armenian writers, and to the libraries of the Eastern Churches for fresh light on these important subjects. It is only natural we should do so. Writers like Simeon Metaphrastes and Photius, the student Patriarch of Constantinople, lived a thousand years nearer the Apostolic times than we do. They flourished in an age of the highest civilization, when precious literary works, in hundreds and thousands, which are no longer known amongst us, lay all around them and at their command. These men and their friends gathered them up and made extracts from them and common sense alone teaches that a critical study of their writings will reveal to us somewhat of the treasures they possessed. During the last fifty years we have sought diligently in the libraries of the East for the works to which they refer and the search has been amply rewarded. The recovery of the complete works of Hippolytus and of Clement of Rome, the discovery of the Teaching of the Apostles are only specimens of what we may yet hope to exhume from the dust of ages.

Let me briefly tell the story of the finding of the lost Apology of Aristides and show its bearing on the age and date of the Acts. Eusebius, the historian of the fourth century, mentions in his Chronicle the two earliest apologies written in 124 in defence of Christianity; one by Quadratus, a hearer of the Apostles, the other by Aristides, a philosopher of Athens. Now this year, 124, was about twenty years after the death of the Apostle John. These apologies have hitherto been best known by this historian's notice, though Eusebius says they were widely circulated in his time. The Apology of Aristides has often been sought for. In the seventeenth century it was said to have been extant in a monastery near Athens, but no Westerner had ever seen it in a complete shape in modern times. Two years ago, however, Professor J. Rendel Harris, M. A., of Haverford College Pennsylvania, discovered it in a Syriac version in the library of the Convent of St. Catharine on Mount Sinai, whence he has published it with an English translation in a new series of Texts and Studies in Biblical and Patristic Literature, the first number of which has appeared at Cambridge within the last few weeks.

I need not go farther into the discovery of this document which raises high our expectations of others still more interesting. The Apology of Quadratus would be even more important as it bore direct testimony to the miracles of our Lord. The brief extract which Eusebius gives in his history (Book 4, Chap. 3), proves how precious would be the complete work. "The deeds of our Saviour," says Quadratus, "were always before you, for they were true; those that were healed, those that were raised from the dead, who were seen not only when healed and when raised, but were always present. They remained for a long time, not only while the Saviour was sojourning with us, but likewise when he had been removed. So that some of them have also survived to our own times."

OUR COMING LORD.

BY REV. A. B. SIMPSON.*

HAT "blessed hope," our Lord's promised and personal coming, has been, in great measure, lost by the Church of to-day. There are not wanting those who, as in the early Thessalonian church, say, "The day of Christ has arrived," and claim a millennial presence of the Lord which supersedes the longing for his glorious appearance. And there are still more, in whose minds that definite and personal advent has dissolved into a vague and distant vision of a spiritual millennium.

Instead of looking for Christ, multitudes are looking for the millennium, the conversion of the world, the regeneration of the nations. How different all this from the spirit of and commands! His charge was, watch not for the millennium, but for the Lord. If it were true that a thousand years of spiritual blessing and universal righteousness must certainly precede his personal coming, then, how irrelevant, how absurd, the command to watch for his coming as an ever-impending event! To his mind, and the minds of the early church, there was no such certain interval antecedent to his return. That was the one goal of hope and anticipation. The apostles themselves so honestly and earnestly cherished this hope, that we find even Paul classing himself among those who hoped to be "alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord." True, in the later Epistle, he does tell that certain things will intervene; but these are not of the nature of millennium blessings, but the very opposite.

There will be a Falling Away;

a revelation of wicked men; a system and a personality of dark and terrible iniquity, in the very midst of which the Lord will suddenly appear in judgment and destruction. Christ's own picture of the Christian age exactly corresponds with this. It is a picture, not of gospel triumph, but of abounding iniquity, of awful temptation, of spiritual declension; a period which has no parallel but the days of Noah and Lot; a period when, regarding the very elect of God, he asks: "When the Son of Man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?"

True, the gospel of the kingdom will be preached among all nations first, but this does not imply that it will be universally accepted. On the contrary, its design is clearly declared to be "as a witness," to utter to leave them without excuse, and "to gather out of them a people to his name," and complete "the fulness of the Gentiles." Then shall the end come, and the fulfillment of this last condition cannot now be very far in the future.

As to the prospects of a spiritual millennium before the Lord comes, we find little to encourage such a hope in the history of Christianity. The past eighteen centuries have witnessed many wonderful outpourings of the Holy Ghost, but none of them have brought any such blessed condition. Even if the heathen nations were as much Christianized as England and America have been for a hundred years, it would be a sad millennium.

No; the picture drawn by inspiration is one flattering to human pride; it is not unlike the popular dreams of patriots, poets, and even preachers; it is one of national commotions, spiritual conflicts, a terrific developments of evil, dark, portentous shadow, amid which the only sure gleams hope and light are from the Morning Star and the Sun of Righteousness. And the events of our own generation, the throes of universal unrest and convulsion, the unparalleled succession of wars and revolutions, the swift sudden movements of God's mighty providence, the intense activity of good, and awful malignity of evil—all seem to echo words which we have just read from the pen of a great and good man on the other side the Atlantic. Surely, it may be near, even the doors. The condition of European society cannot much longer continue. It is one which no word can describe except "drift." L. Paul's ship in the Adriatic storm, which "could no longer bear up against the wind, and they let her drive." What is of this hope? Does it cut the sinews of hopeful endeavor, or does it really tend to sanctify Christian character, and stimulate true Christian effort? Most assuredly it is one of most practical of all precious promises of the Lord. It must lead every honest Christian to a life of holy vigilance and purity, for "every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." It is one of the strongest influences to separate us from evil world, for "our conversation is in heaven from whence we expect the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ." Men who speak or feel thus are not likely to bury their souls in a defilement or a doomed world.

Terrestrial Convulsions,

The Practical Value

It is the most powerful of all incentives missionary effort; for, if we are really looking for the end, we will hasten to utter the warning cry to the world, and, if the preaching of the Gospel to all nations be before his coming, all that "love his appearing," will seek to "hasten" it by fulfilling that condition. Surely, there can be no more blame and all-constraining impulse than hope that we, looking past the dark grave the opening heavens, may be permitted to complete the great commission, to prepare world for his advent, and then, his last commands completely fulfilled, to turn our face the heavens, and welcoming Him back to earth again, close this age of sin and sorrow with the last prayer of inspiration, "Even Lord Jesus, come."

And, finally, it will have a tendency to courage us amid seeming failures and disappointments, by the intelligent apprehension of his own revealed plan, which foresaw the very failures, and provided for the great victory by his own glorious appearing, and his sovereign and all-subduing reign.

PASTOR SPURGEON'S ILLNESS.

PROTESTANT Christians of all lands (says The Scottish Congregationalist) have been profoundly interested in, and anxious about, the disease which has for so long held the great preacher as its victim. He has been prayed for by name at hundreds of religious gatherings throughout the world. The International Congregational Council began its work by praying for his recovery. The North Conference remembered him, the great Convention in connection with the Christian Endeavor Societies in America remembered him. In requests for special prayer read out at a certain High Ritualistic Church, Mr. Spurgeon's name was coupled with that of an English bishop who has also been ill. The Archbishop of Canterbury and other dignitaries of the Episcopal Church of England, the Prince of Wales and others of the British nobility have each personally or sent messages of sympathy and kind inquiry. Whether God answer the prayers of his people by the complete restoration of his servant to health and strength or Mr. Spurgeon has, by enduring this illness, done very real, manifest and incalculable work towards the reunion of the Protestant Churches. They have all met in the Spirit for prayer around the sick-bed of one Baptist minister. To the spiritual discerner this has been a glorious, thrilling scene. Surely Mr. Spurgeon's view of this use to which God has put his illness, may sympathize in a very deep way with the apostle's words—"Now I rejoice in sufferings for your sake, and fill up that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in flesh for his body's sake, which is the Church"

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H. J. Morse, Freehold, N. J. Your inquiry better suited to the columns of a secular journal than to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

B. C. Ottawa, Kans. Can a man who has two living wives be a Christian, provided he has a divorce from the first one?

1. See the Saviour's own words on this point, Mark 10:11, 12.

Moss, Kansas City, Mo. The custom prevails to capitalize all pronouns which represent the Godhead. Is this right and by what authority is it done? Capital letters are not used in the Bible.

The authority is that of veneration and respect for the Deity and things sacred. It is a time-honored custom sanctioned by immemorial usage, just as for the same reason in some ancient Bibles we find the words "Lord" and "God" wholly in capital letters.

F. Jones, Elido, O., and "Reader," Lillydale Ranch, Glenwood, Colo. If the appearance of the rainbow in the heavens is produced by natural laws, is it not reasonable to believe that the same result took place previous to the promise of our Creator given to Noah after the deluge, to assure us and be a sign of immunity from a similar visitation?

Sophistry is full of such suggestions. The fact that the Lord declared to Noah that the bow in the heavens would thereafter be "a sign" of immunity from deluge does not necessarily imply that such a bow had never before appeared.

M. Kelly, Columbus Falls, Mont. Is it right for a Christian to marry a Catholic?

A Catholic is also a Christian in that he or she believes in the divinity of Christ. Our correspondent probably referred to the propriety of marriages between Protestants and Catholics. Such marriages, while not prohibited, are fruitful of disputes and troubles, because the Catholic party to the union is pledged to rear the children in the Catholic faith. These marriages are rarely productive of happiness. See II. Cor. 6: 14.

Thomas Crago, Houghton, Mich. Explain the ebb and flow of the tides.

The tides ebb and flow twice in a lunar day twenty-four hours, and are occasioned by the attraction of the sun and moon acting unually on the waters in the different parts of the earth, thus disturbing their equilibrium. When sun and moon are in conjunction as at new moon or opposite, their united influences produce the high or spring-tide. When the moon is in the first or third quarter, the sun's attraction being unimpaired produces the usual neap-tide.

E. A. P. sends a fuller reply to the question concerning the origin of the proverb: "Cleanliness is next to godliness." "It was written," he tells us, "by a Hebrew and is older than any parts of the Bible. It appears in Berachoth, the last of Mishna of Sota, chap. 9, and is found in other Hebrew works. That learned Rabbi, Rev. Dr. Bettelheim, gives the following translation: Shenehas Ben Bair says: the virtues of religion are resolved into (or are next to) carefulness; carefulness into vigor; vigor into righteousness; righteousness into abstemiousness; abstemiousness into cleanliness; cleanliness into godliness (or piety). The meaning of the original is that cleanliness is next to or akin to godliness or piety. Mishna is used to describe a collection of Jewish traditions and explanations of the Scriptures. From a sick-bed I have copied this translation for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

McTurk, 333 Gross Street, Pittsburg, Pa. What is sleep? How come our dreams, and from whence? Is it the spirit asserting itself apart from the body?

Sleep in that state of suspension of the sensory and motor functions common to all animals, with an active condition of those functions, and is designed for their recuperation and replacing of wasted tissues. This is the physiological definition, but the psychological phenomena of sleep are too extensive a subject for discussion here. During sleep, the brain is comparatively bloodless, and the blood throughout the entire system moves with diminished rapidity. Complete sleep has no arms, but usually there is a limited mental activity or sensitiveness which responds more or less to external impressions such as touch, temperature, and sound, and which gives the principles of "suggestion" and "association ideas" unlimited operation. All voluntary control of the brain is temporarily lost, and one impression or suggestion calls up another, producing dreams that may either be part of a chain connected with the waking thoughts or emotions, or be caused by outward impressions received through the sensory nerves, while the body is asleep. Dreams are in almost every instance referable to the peculiar condition of the body and called into existence through the external senses. (See Carpenter's Cyclopedia of Anatomy and Physiology, and Sir B. Brodie's Psychological Inquiries.)

Samuel Ricker, Fredericksburg, Pa. If the Pharisees were children of the devil, how could the kingdom of God be within them?

When Christ explained to the Pharisees that the kingdom of God was within them, he doubtless intended to convey that that kingdom, as far as this world was concerned, was in the hearts of men and did not consist of mere temporal power and government, like the kingdoms of earth. "The kingdom of God is within you," may properly be accepted as a passage in general illustration of this, rather than as a statement applied to the individuals to whom he addressed himself.

J. Lewis, Milwaukee, Wis. Does God justify cremation? What is the best means of disposing of a body, from a Christian standpoint?

There is nothing either for or against cremation in the Bible, nor is any law laid down to regulate the disposal of the dead, or to prohibit the choice of any method that may appeal to sanitary or climatic considerations. Cremation has been practiced by many nations for centuries and there may, in some countries, be many valid reasons for preferring it as a mode of dealing with the dead. If God is able to resurrect the bodies of saints buried centuries ago and long since turned to dust, he is equally able to restore from the ashes of the cemetery urns the bodies of those who have been cremated.

Rev. Hafstein Pjetursson, Grund, P. O. Manitoba, Canada. I am an Icelandic minister. All Icelandic ministers have the same method of preaching. They write down their sermons, in extenso, and read them from the paper. I have learned another method of preaching in Copenhagen, Denmark. The Danish ministers deliver their sermons speaking without any help of written manuscript. I have commenced to introduce that method of preaching among my countrymen. Am I doing right?

Both ways may be right. It depends largely on the temperament and ability of the pastor to think out with due system his sermon beforehand, whether or not he will be able to deliver it. For a person with an impulsive temperament, who is liable to make rash assertions, or to be carried away by his own eloquence, the better plan would be to prepare a carefully written sermon. The whole matter, however, is one to be decided by conscience. If you consider that you can give sufficient preparation to your sermons without writing them, you are quite right in doing so.

John James, 25 Torrance Street, Montreal, writes:

May I be permitted to add a word to the very important question in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for September 23, 1891. "Did Satan own the Kingdoms of the world when he offered them to Christ?" You rightly answer, "No; Satan did not own them." But it is still true that they were in his hands to offer to Christ; he had usurped them. At Creation, Man was placed in the Garden of Eden as lord over all. "Thou hast put all things under his feet," was true of the first Adam (see Ps. 8: 4-9), while it will only be carried out permanently under the second Adam. (See I. Cor. 15: 25, Eph. 1: 22, Heb. 2: 6-9.) But when Adam listened to Satan and fell, he transferred his allegiance, and through that Satan became the "prince of this world." (See John 14: 30, 16, 11, 18, 36, Luke 22: 53, 2 Cor. 4: 4.) The consequence of this has been that the empires of the world have been truly delineated as wild beasts. (Dan. 7: 3.) It was universal empire Satan offered to Jesus, but which he refused to take from his hand. When Satan said, "to whomsoever I will I give it" (Luke 4: 6), the Lord did not deny it, but was content to go on in the path of obedience until the time should come for the Father to give it to him. (Matt. 11: 27.) Then "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." (Rev. 11: 15.) The fact that "the powers that be are ordained of God" Rom. 13: 1, does not conflict with this. God did put authority in the hands of Noah, Gen. 9: 6, but this has been usurped by Satan, through the willingness of man to be led by him.

Rev. A. Gregory, Mercer, N. J. I believe Satan did own the kingdoms. A kingdom implies subjects. What would Great Britain be without subjects? Would be only so many acres of land. Now as subjects are essential to a kingdom, it follows that as there can be no doubt that Satan ruled in the biggest half of the hearts of the subjects of those kingdoms, therefore he owned them and had the right to bargain them away, and it would have been the best bargain he ever drove had his offer been accepted. (Romans 6: 16.)

ALONE WITH GOD

(For The Christian Herald.)

At night, when weary of the crowding cares,
Which through the day oppress me with their load,
How longs my soul to lift itself in prayers
Above its toils to be alone with God!

Alone with God! No cruel eyes to see
The sacred thoughts that burn within my breast,
Unknown to all, except my God and me,
Too sacred here to be made manifest.

Alone with God! Above the gloom-capped heights
Of doubts cold mountain, where my soul
Once stood;
I see before me the eternal lights
That glow along the pathway of the good.

As Moses with the tables on the brow
Of rocky Sinai stood with God apart,
So he is writing with his finger now
His blessings on the tablets of my heart.

Alone with God! No higher boon I crave!
What could the highest angel wish for more?
Alone with God, not fears can fill my grave
But glowing visions of the shining shore.

Christ Liveth in Me.

"Yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."—GAL. 2: 20.

EL NATHAN.

JAMES McGRANAHAN.

1. As lives the flow'r within theseed, As in the cone the tree,
2. Once far from God and dead in sin, No light my heart could see;
3. As rays of light from yonder sun The flow'rs of earth set free,
4. With long-ing all my heart is filled, That like Him I may be,

So, praise the God of truth and grace, His Spir-it dwelleth in me.
But in God's word the light I found, Now Christ liv-eth in me.
So life and light and love came forth From Christ living in me.
As on the wond'rous tho't I dwell, That Christ liv-eth in me.

CHORUS.

Christ liv-eth in me, Christ liv-eth in me,

(For The Christian Herald.)

"GIVE Me thy heart:" O, child of sin,
Thy Saviour calls; oh! let Him in;
List to His gentle, pleading voice;
Obey, in Christ fore'er rejoice.

"Give Me thy heart:" in loving tones
Thy Father pleads; "My blood atones
For all thy guilt; Oh! ransomed be
From sin's dark bondage ever free."

"Give Me thy heart:" Oh! why refuse?
Why ways of error wilt thou choose?
"I will forgive,—thy burdens bear,
And guard My child with tend'rest care."

Give Him thy heart, oh! weary one;
Wait not till life's short day is done—
Until the night of death draws near.
Accept Him now, and He will cheer

Thy darkest hour and light divine
Will all along thy pathway shine;
And in the sunshine of His smile,
Bide, well content, earth's little while.

DON'T FRET.

Most folks worry more than enough. Nerve waste is somewhat a new field of consideration for people of studious habits. People think that the supply of vital energy is inexhaustible, and that repair goes on as fast as waste. Then comes a crash and they are puzzled. Nerves should be economized as carefully as a bank account. You cannot get out what is not put into the nerves any more than into the bank. Sleep is nature's way of winding up the machine. When we begin to get sleepless the nerves are then exhausted; and either insanity or some other form of nerve depression is near at hand. Railroad traveling, even in a sleeper, is not like a bed. Rapid mental work for short hours is better than a long struggle to do mental work when we are weary. The master said, "Come aside and rest awhile," and summer vacations are as good now as then.

"All run down" from the weakening effects of warm weather, you need a good tonic and blood purifier like Hood's Sarsaparilla. Give this peculiar medicine a trial. Sold by all druggists.*

MESSRS. PROCTER & GAMBLE, Cincinnati.

Gentlemen:—Although a stranger to you, and my testimonial entirely unnecessary, as it certainly is unsolicited, yet I take great pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your "Ivory" Soap, and thanking you for putting it on the market at so low a price.

It has entirely supplanted the use of Castile and other fine soaps in my household for several years past, being in no way inferior, and from fifty to seventy-five per cent. more economical.

A good test I find for the purity of soap is to try it with a brush for cleansing the teeth, and the taste of the "Ivory" Soap so used is perfectly sweet and clean.

Very Respectfully Yours,

THE COST OF PRIDE.

NOT long ago a clergyman was visiting a sick lady who was an active member of his church. She was known to be very proud of her descent from an old and renowned family and her own character had been irreproachable.

Her end was evidently approaching and her pastor spoke to her about the coming change. He was startled by the way in which she responded to his remarks. He felt convinced that she was not trusting in Christ as her Saviour. She would talk about Church affairs, but not about Jesus. Returning from visiting her one day the minister entered his study and prayed for wisdom, then, rising from his knees, he said, "I will use the lancet to-day. I will ask her the straight question." He called again and began to speak of some of the great sinners in the Bible, of Manasseh, the dying thief, and Mary Magdalene, then coming near home he spoke of some of the flagrant sinners of their own little town, then summing up said, "But all alike are sinners, and all must be saved in exactly the same way." The dying lady raised herself on her elbow and looking her pastor in the face asked, "Have I to be saved in the same way as those characters?" "Yes, there is no other way." "Then," she replied, "I would prefer to be lost." And she would not listen to another word the minister had to say. Men and women who live moral lives and have never been open, flagrant sinners, often cannot understand that they must come to Christ just the same as the worst of sinners.

A CHILD'S QUESTION.

DURING a revival a man who had been very worldly-minded was awakened, but for some time concealed his feelings, even from his wife, who was a praying woman. She left him one evening in charge of his little girl of five years of age. After her departure, his anxiety of mind became so great that he walked the room in his agony. The little girl noticed his agitation, and inquired, "What ails you pa?" He replied, "Nothing," and endeavored to quiet his feelings, but all in vain. The child looked up sympathizingly in his face, and noticing how flushed and feverish it looked she said, "If you are dry, pa, why don't you get a drink of water?" The question was uttered in all simplicity, doubtless prompted by the child's memory of her own suffering and the refreshing drinks of water. But to the father it had a different meaning. The sermon which had stirred his heart and caused him so much anxiety was on the text: "Whosoever will let him take of the water of life freely." The child's question blended with his thoughts. He was thirsting for that living water, why did he not drink when it was offered freely? He went into his room and threw himself on his knees and asked God for the promised water. He rose a new man and from that night he dates the beginning of a new life.

OFF for Washington, D. C., via. Pennsylvania Railroad.

At a most attractive season, October 15th, the next personally-conducted Washington Tour will be run via the Pennsylvania Railroad. The National capital will be alive with work and the best chance thus presented of visiting the city when all the departments of an active government centre are open. These tours are certainly the most attractive and desirable mediums for traveling. $12.50 is the round-trip rate, which includes, in addition to railroad fare by special express train in both directions, meals en route, accommodations and board at hotels which are among the most famous in the country. The next tour of the 15th. will leave New York, foot of Cortlandt and Desbrosses Streets, in a special fast express train, at 11.00 A. M., reaching Washington early that evening; returning, leave Washington 3.20 P. M., the following Saturday. The dates of the later tours of this series are October 28th., November 12th., 26th., and December 10th., and they are all in charge of a Tourist Agent and Chaperon.

THE AFRICAN MEDICINE MAN.

The Scriptural statement that "where there is no vision the people perish" has a double significance among the tribes of Equatorial Africa. The people suffer in body and soul. Especially do the sick suffer by the prevalent ignorance and superstition. "A serious illness," says a lady who is helping her husband in his missionary work among them, "nearly always ends in death. How can it be otherwise? A man falls sick; he is either shut up in a stuffy little hut, with a wood fire burning day and night, or, if poor, left out in the bush. They have no nourishing food, no warm drink, and often sink for the lack of this. In some cases the ukanga is called in, and gives the patient a dose which probably hastens the end. After he is dead a witch-doctor palaver is held; the ukanga kills a fowl, and pretends to discover from an examination of the creature's inside, who has caused the death. The person charged with the deed is then tied up until he pays a large fine to the relatives of the deceased. We were visiting a town where a death had just taken place. The ukanga was there, and had given his verdict as to the cause of death. All listened with great attention, and we asked to have it repeated. In this case the reason assigned for the man's death was that he had not fed the crocodile in the river for many days; consequently the animal had killed him in revenge! The poor, misguided people fully believed this, and the discussion which followed was a very serious one. As a matter of fact no one feeds the crocodiles and why should they? But if the crocodiles could cause the death of a man for not feeding them who would be safe? My husband stayed and reasoned with them and in the end disabused their minds as to the power of the crocodile but they will believe the next story the witch doctor tells them."

We are a patient people—the ox is nowhere in comparison.

We buy lamp-chimneys by the dozen; they go on snapping and popping and flying in pieces; and we go on buying the very same chimneys year after year.

Our dealer is willing to sell us a chimney a week for every lamp we burn—a hundred or more a year—and we plow for him, pay him for goading us.

Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass" do not break from heat; they are made of tough glass.

As likely as not our dealer would rather his chimneys would break; "it's good for the business," says he. He buys the brittlest ones he can get.

"What are you going to do about it?"

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car-Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

COMPOUND OF Pure Cod Liver Oil And Phosphates

It has required much experience and care to enable the proprietor to combine the Oil and Phosphates so that they would become thoroughly efficacious together, and he has the only recipe by which this can be accomplished. Another important advantage which the Pure Cod Liver Oil possesses prepared in this way, over the plain cod liver oil, is the fact that besides adding largely to its medicinal qualities it preserves the oil pure and sweet for a longer period than it can be done in any other manner. This fact alone would recommend this form of using the Oil even if the phosphates did not also add vastly to the healing qualities of the preparation. The perfect incorporation of the phosphates with the cod liver oil has only been accomplished by the adoption of the most perfect rules of chemistry; and a medicine has been produced which while it is so efficacious is also perfectly

Flannel Cakes.

ORIGINAL. No. 67.
BY NELLIE CAMPBELL BEDFORD.
Four cups flour; one-half cup white corn meal; four eggs; one tablespoonful butter, melted; two cups milk; one teaspoonful salt; two level teaspoonfuls Cleveland's Baking Powder. Beat the yolks and whites of the eggs separately. Mix the flour, meal, salt and baking powder, add the milk, egg yolks and melted butter and beat hard. Stir in the stiffly beaten whites and bake on a hot griddle.

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

If cake dries out, gets husky, crumbly, or tasteless like bakers' bread, it isn't bad luck but bad baking powder.

Cake keeps moist, keeps its natural flavor when made with Cleveland's Baking Powder. One special excellence of Cleveland's.

CLOSE OF THE COUNCIL.

The Great Methodist Conference at Washington Ended—Its Work Reviewed—Many Notable Addresses of the Highest Interest to Methodists in Every Land.

It is universally admitted that the Methodist Conference, which closed its sessions in Washington yesterday, was the greatest gathering ever known in the history of Methodism. The debates were among the ablest ever listened to by an American audience, and the outcome of the Conference cannot fail to be of the highest importance to Christianity at large and more especially to Methodists throughout the civilized world. In last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we published a brief outline of the earlier proceedings, and to-day, from our correspondent in Washington, we are enabled

REV. J. C. KEENER, D.D.

When Bishop Hurst rose to greet the assembled delegates in the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church, at the first day's session, his eyes lighted upon a remarkable gathering. Venerable bishops, grown gray in the service of the Church, sat side by side with others yet hardly less famous, sermon was read by a most brilliant speaker, the Rev. Dr. Stephenson, President of the British Wesleyan Conference.

REV. J. N. FITZGERALD, D.D.

REV. H. T. MARSHALL, D.D.

Bishop Hurst's address of welcome was a pleasant surprise. One of the most felicitous passages during its delivery occurred when, after welcoming the English-speaking delegates, he turned to the French delegates and repeated the welcome, using the purest French in its translation. This done, he faced the German delegates and once more translated the language of the address, speaking to them also in their native tongue. This linguistic feat aroused the enthusiasm of the Convention more than anything that had preceded it. Rising to follow Bishop Hurst, the Rev. Dr. Stephenson inquired jocosely into how many languages he was expected to translate his own remarks.

Some of the finest orators on the floor were the colored members of the Conference. At the reception tendered to the delegates by the colored members, great enthusiasm was developed and the speeches were remarkable for their oratorical power, no less than for the intense emotion and earnestness they exhibited. One of the most effective of the colored speakers was Bishop Arnett, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, whose address was characterized by many unique and original ideas. Speaking of the unity of the race, he said they were all one in origin, in destiny and in responsibility. There were three books, he said, that were being brought to the attention of the colored people: the spelling-book, the Bible and the bank book. He found the latter the shortest cut to the Anglo-Saxon heart.

REV. R. K. HARGRAVE, D.D.

"We colored people," he said, "have been free to imitate our white brethren, and we have succeeded in making several divisions of our Methodist Church. I admit that we are not yet quite abreast of you in this regard, as we have only reached our fifth division, while you have somewhere about twenty-three, I think."

Referring to the comparative progress of the colored race, he remarked, "The North American Indian has failed to keep abreast in the progress of the times. He is trampled under foot everywhere in consequence. We have endeavored to keep abreast of the Anglo-Saxon in education, culture and character, and the result is we are here with you to-day, and we are here to stay." These remarks were most enthusiastically received.

Although the scheduled papers were full of interest, the extemporaneous addresses attracted more attention. The five-minute speeches were a specially interesting feature and elicited some lively brief discussions. A notable passage-at-arms occurred during one of the earlier sessions, between those two famous leaders in debate: Mr. Hugh Price Hughes of the West London Mission and Dr. J. M. Buckley of New York, the first the recognized English champion of debate and the second, one of the ablest Americans in the forensic arena. Dr. Buckley had moved a resolution, which was adopted, that all degrees should be omitted after the names in the reading of the minutes and reports. On the following morning, the Secretary, while reading the minutes, mentioned the names of Rev. Dr. Stephenson and others, whereupon Dr. Buckley arose to administer a rebuke to the Secretary and the Conference for violation of the rules. Mr. Hughes sprang to his feet and every neck was craned to listen. He said the rule had not been violated as it simply prohibited the reading of degrees after names and not the word "Dr." when used as a prefix. Dr. Buckley maintained his point and called for the reading of the minutes, when it was found the Mr. Hughes was right and a point was good-naturedly scored for the English debater.

Probably one of the best papers read during the session was that of Rev. Dr. T. G. Selby of England, formerly a missionary in China. He delivered a thoughtful address on the "Unity of Methodism" which was followed by a general debate. Dr. Selby has recently published what is regarded as one of the best volumes of sermons that has ever proceeded from Methodist sources. The debate on his paper excited ed intense enthusiasm and, toward the conclusion, the venerable Bishop Foster of Massachusetts, arose in his seat and, spreading out his arms, eloquently invited all the Methodists of America to join in one common fold. The example was contagious, for Rev. Dr. Stephenson of the English Wesleyan Conference, immediately rose and extended a similar invitation to the Eastern Section.

The Rev. Dr. Wm. Briggs of Canada, made a characteristic address. He represented a country, he said, that was bounded on the North by the Arctic Ocean, on the South by the United States, on the East by the Atlantic and on the West by the Pacific. More literally than any other, did his dominion extend from the rivers to the ends of the earth. The Church in Canada has the proud distinction of being the only Methodist Church in the world, without suffix or affix, all the different sections of the Methodist family being united therein in one harmonious organization. This is the one example of perfect Methodist unity in the world.

In point of oratorical talent alone, the Conference has been a model of its kind, and one which, had it been held during the legislative session, might well have furnished valuable hints on effective eloquence to the nation's Solons. From Bishop Bowman, the senior member of the Methodist Church in America, down to the humblest member who addressed the Conference, there has not been a single dull or uninteresting speech throughout. Bishop Keener of the M. E. Church, South, spoke forcefully and reverently; Bishop Wayman, the colored bishop of the African M. E. Church, a man of massive frame and strong, earnest face was listened to with deep interest, as were Bishops Hendrix of Missouri and many others whose names are familiar to Methodists and who were heard during the sessions while the Conference lasted. Among the papers of special interest in addition to those already mentioned were several relating to the condition and character of the work of the Church abroad. Rev. Dr. Waller, of London, Secretary of the Wesleyan Conference, gave statistics showing the remarkable progress of the Church during the last thirty years, in which time Methodist membership has increased 21.2 per cent. in Great Britain, and now has nearly 2,000,000 Sunday scholars. Then came Bishop Fowler of San Francisco, who spoke on Methodism in the Western section. One hundred and seven years ago, he said, there was only one conference, now there are about three hundred; instead of eighty-three traveling preachers there are 31,765, besides 30,000 local preachers, 14,988 members, 5,000,000 communicants, 5,000,000 Sunday Scholars, and a following of over 20,000,000 souls in the Republic. ed intense enthusiasm and, toward the conclusion, the venerable Bishop Foster of Massachusetts, arose in his seat and, spreading out his arms, eloquently invited all the Methodists of America to join in one common fold. The example was contagious, for Rev. Dr. Stephenson of the English Wesleyan Conference, immediately rose and extended a similar invitation to the Eastern Section.

The Rev. Dr. Wm. Briggs of Canada, made a characteristic address. He represented a country, he said, that was bounded on the North by the Arctic Ocean, on the South by the United States, on the East by the Atlantic and on the West by the Pacific. More literally than any other, did his dominion extend from the rivers to the ends of the earth. ## THE GOSPEL OF THE PYRAMIDS.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon from the text: "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness." Isaiah 19 : 19, 20.

ISAIAH no doubt here refers to the great pyramid at Gizeh, the chief pyramid of Egypt. The text speaks of a pillar in Egypt, and this is the greatest pillar ever lifted; and the text says it is to be at the border of the land, and this pyramid is at the border of the land; and the text says it shall be for a witness, and the object of this sermon is to tell what this pyramid witnesses. This sermon is the first of a course of sermons entitled, "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis, or what I saw in Egypt and Greece confirmatory of the Scriptures."

We had on a morning of December, 1889, landed in Africa. Amid the howling boatmen at Alexandria we had come ashore and taken the rail-train for Cairo, Egypt, along the banks of the most thoroughly harnessed river of all the world—the river Nile. We had, at even-tide, entered the city of Cairo, the city where Christ dwelt while staying in Egypt during the Herodic persecution. It was our first night in Egypt. No destroying angel sweeping through as once, but all the stars were out, and the skies were filled with angels of beauty and angels of light, and the air was balmy as an American June. The next morning we were early awake and at the window, looking upon palm trees in full glory of leafage, and upon gardens of fruits and flowers at the very season when our homes far away are canopied by bleak skies and the last leaf of the forest has gone down in the equinoctials.

But how can I describe the thrill of expectation, for to-day we are to see what all the world has seen or wants to see—the Pyramids. We are mounted for an hour and a half's ride. We pass on amid bazaars stuffed with rugs and carpets, and curious fabrics of all sorts from Smyrna, from Algiers, from Persia, from Turkey, and through streets where we meet people of all colors and all garbs, carts loaded with garden productions, priests in gowns, women in black veils, Bedouins in long and seemingly superfluous apparel, Janissaries in jacket of embroidered gold—out and on toward the great Pyramid; for though there are sixty-nine pyramids still standing, the pyramid at Gizeh is the monarch of pyramids. We meet camels grunting under their load, and see buffaloes on either side, browsing in pasture fields. The road we travel is for part of the way under clumps of acacia, and by long rows of sycamore and tamerisk, but after awhile it is a path of rock and sand, and we find we have reached the margin of the desert, the great Sahara Desert, and we cry out to the dragoman as we see a huge pile of rock looming in sight: "Dragoman, what is that?" His answer is "The Pyramid," and then it seemed as if we were living a century every minute. Our thoughts and emotions were too rapid and intense for utterance, and we ride on in silence until we come to the foot of the Pyramid spoken of in the text, the oldest structure in all the earth, four thousand years old at least. Here it is. We stand under the shadow of a structure that shuts out all the earth and all the sky and we look up and strain our vision to appreciate the distant top, and are overwhelmed while we cry "The Pyramid! The Pyramid!"

I had started that morning with the determination of ascending the Pyramid. One of my chief objects in going to Egypt was not only to see the base of that granitic wonder, but to stand on the top of it. Yet the nearer I came to this eternity in stone the more my determination was shaken. Its altitude to me was simply appalling. A great height has always been to me a most disagreeable sensation. As we dismounted at the base of the Pyramid I said, "Others may go up it, but not I. I will satisfy myself with a view from the base. The ascent of it would be to me a foolhardy undertaking." But after I had given up all idea of ascending, I found my daughter was determined to go, and I could not let her go with strangers, and I changed my mind and we started with guides. It cannot be done without these helpers. Two or three times foolhardy men have attempted it alone, but their bodies came tumbling down unrecognizable and lifeless. Each person in our party had two or three guides or helpers. One of them unrolled his turban and tied it around my waist and he held the other end of the turban as a matter of safety. Many of the blocks of stone are four or five feet high and beyond any ordinary human stride unless assisted. But, two Arabs to pull and two Arabs to push, I found myself rapidly ascending from height to height, and on to altitudes terrific, and at last at the tip top we found ourselves on a level space of about thirty feet square. Through clearest atmosphere we looked off upon the desert, and the Sphinx with its features of everlasting stone, and yonder upon the minarets of Cairo glittering in the sun, and yonder upon Memphis in ruins, and off upon the wreck of empires and the battle-fields of ages, a radius of view enough to fill the mind and overwhelm one's entire being.

After looking around for a while, and a kodack had pictured the group, we descended. The descent was more trying than the ascent for climbing you need not see the depths beneath, but coming down it was impossible not to see the abysses below. But two Arabs ahead to help us down, and two Arabs to hold us back, we were lowered, hand below hand, until the ground was invitingly near, and amid the jargon of the Arabs we were safely landed.

I said the dominant color of the pyramid was grey but in certain lights it seems to shake off the grey of centuries and become a blonde and the silver turns to the golden. It covers thirteen acres of ground. What an antiquity! It was at least two thousand years old when the baby Christ was carried within sight of it by his fugitive parents, Joseph and Mary. The storms of forty centuries have drenched it, bombarded it, shadowed it, flashed upon it, but there it stands ready to take another forty centuries of atmospheric attack if the world should continue to exist. The oldest buildings of the earth are juniors to this great senior of the centuries. Herodotus says that for ten years preparations were being made for the building of this Pyramid. It has eighty-two million one hundred and eleven thousand cubic feet of masonry. One hundred thousand workmen at one time toiled in its erection. To bring the stone from the quarries a causeway sixty feet wide was built. The top stones were lifted by machinery such as the world knows nothing of to-day. It is seven hundred and forty-six feet each side of the square base. The structure is four hundred and fifty feet high, higher than the cathedrals of Cologne, Strasburg, Rouen, St. Peter's and St. Paul's. No surprise to me that it was put at the head of the Seven Wonders of the World. It has a subterranean room of red granite called the "King's chamber," and another room called the "Queen's chamber," and the probability is that there are other rooms yet unexplored. The evident design of the architect was to make these rooms as inaccessible as possible. After all the work of exploration and all the digging and blasting, if you would enter these subterranean rooms you must go through a passage only three feet eleven inches high and less than four feet wide. A sarcophagus of red granite stands down under this mountain of masonry. The sarcophagus could not have been carried in after the pyramid was built. It must have been put there before the structure was reared. Probably in that sarcophagus once lay a wooden coffin containing a dead king, but time has destroyed the coffin and destroyed the last vestige of human remains.

I wonder not that this mountain of limestone and red granite has been the fascination of scholars, of scientists, of intelligent Christians in all ages. Sir John Herschel, the astronomer, said he thought it had astronomical significance. The wise men who accompanied Napoleon's army into Egypt went into profound study of the Pyramid. In 1865, Prof. Smyth and his wife lived in the empty tombs near by the Pyramid that they might be as continuously as possible close to the Pyramid which they were investigating. The Pyramid built more than four thousand years ago, being a complete geometrical figure, wise men have concluded it must have been divinely constructed. Man came through thousands of years to fine architecture, to music to painting, but this was perfect at the world's start, and God must have directed it. All astronomers and geometricians and scientists say that it was scientifically and mathematically constructed before science and mathematics were born. From the inscriptions on the pyramid, from its proportions, from the points of the compass recognized in its structure, from the direction in which its tunnels run, from the relative position of the blocks that compose it, scientists, Christians and infidels have demonstrated that the being who planned this Pyramid must have known the world's sphericity, and that its motion was rotatory, and how many miles it was in diameter and circumference, and how many tons the world weighs, and knew at what point in the heavens certain stars would appear at certain periods of time. Not in the four thousand years since the putting up of that Pyramid has a single fact in astronomy or mathematics been found to contradict the wisdom of that structure. Yet they had not at the age when the Pyramid was started an astronomer or an architect or a mathematician worth mentioning. Who then planned the Pyramid? Who superintended its erection? Who from its first foundation stone to its capstone erected everything? It must have been God. Isaiah was right when he said in my text "A pillar shall be at the border of the land of Egypt and it shall be for a sign and a witness." The Pyramid is God's first Bible. Hundreds, if not thousands of years before the first line of the Book of Genesis was written the lesson of the Pyramid was written.

Well, of what is this Cyclopean masonry a sign and a witness? Among other things: of the prolongation of human work compared with the brevity of human life. In all the four thousand years this Pyramid has only lost eighteen feet in width, one side of its square at the base changed only from seven hundred and sixty-four feet to seven hundred and forty-six feet and the most of that eighteen feet taken off by architects to furnish stone for building in the city of Cairo. The men who constructed the Pyramid worked at it only a few years and then put down the trowel and the compass and the square and lowered the derrick which had lifted the ponderous weights but forty centuries has their work stood and it will be good for forty centuries more. All Egypt has been shaken by terrible earthquakes and cities have been prostrated or swallowed, but that Pyramid has defied all volcanic paroxysms. It has looked upon some of the greatest battles ever fought since the world stood. Where are the men who constructed it? Their bodies gone to dust and even the dust scattered. Even the sarcophagus in which the king's mummy may have slept is empty.

So men die but their work lives on. We are all building pyramids not to last ten thousand years, but forty thousand, forty million, forty trillion, forty quadrillion, forty quintillion. For a while we wield the trowel or pound with the hammer or measure with the yard-stick or write with the pen, or experiment with the scientific battery, or plan with the brain and for a while the foot walks and the eye sees, and the ear hears and the tongue speaks. All the good words or bad words we speak are spread out into one layer for a pyramid. All the kind deed or malevolent deeds we do are spread out into another layer. All the Christian or unchristian example we set is spread out in another layer. All the indirect influences of our lives are spread out in another layer. Then the time soon comes when we put down the implement of toil and pass away, but the pyramid stands. The twentieth century will not rock it down, nor the thirtieth century nor the one hundredth century. The earthquake that rocks this world to pieces will not stop our influence for good or evil. You modestly say "That is true in regard to the great workers for good or evil, and of gigantic geniuses, Miltonian or Talleysandian, but not of me, for I live and work on a small scale." My hearer, remember that those who built the pyramids were common workmen. Not one of them could lift one of those great stones. It took a dozen of them to lift one stone and others just wielded a trowel clicking it on the hard edge, or smoothing the mortar between the layers. One hundred thousand men toiled on those sublime elevations. Cheops didn't build the Pyramid. Some boss mason in the world's twilight didn't build the Pyramid. One hundred thousand men built it and perhaps from first to last two hundred thousand men. So with the pyramids now rising, pyramids of evil or pyramids of good. The pyramid of drunkenness rising ever since the time when Noah got drunk on wine, although there was at his time such a superabundance of water. All the saloonists of the ages adding their layers of ale casks and wine pitchers and rum jugs until the Pyramid overshadows the Great Sahara Desert of desolated homes, and broken hearts, and destroyed eternities. And as the pyramid still rises, layers of human skulls piled on top of human skulls and other mountains of human bones to whiten the peaks reaching unto the heavens, hundreds of thousands of people are building that pyramid. So with the pyramid of righteousness. Multitudes of hands are toiling on the steep, hands infantile, hands octogenarian, masculine hands, female hands, strong hands, weak hands. Some clanging a trowel, some pulling a rope, some measuring the sides. Layers of psalm books on top of layers of sermons. Layers of prayers on top of layers ington, its delegates the honored representatives of fifty million Methodists in all parts of the earth, will at every session do honor to the memory of John Wesley, but I wonder if any of them will think to twist a garland for the memory of humble Peter Bohler, the Moravian, who brought John Wesley into the kingdom of God. I rejoice that all the thousands who have been toiling on the pyramid of righteousness will at last be recognized and rewarded—the mother who brought her children to Christ, the Sabbath teacher who brought her class to the knowledge of the truth, the unpretending man who saved a soul. Then the trowel will be more honored than the sceptre. As a great battle was going on the soldiers were ordered to the front and a sick man jumped out of an ambulance in which he was being carried to the hospital. The surgeon asked him what he meant by getting out of the ambulance when he was sick and almost ready to die. The soldier answered: "Doctor, I am going to the front. I had rather die on the field than die in an ambulance." Thank God, if we cannot do much we can do a little.

Further, carrying out the idea of my text, the Pyramid is a sign and a witness that big tombstones are not the best way of keepings one's self affectionately remembered. This Pyramid and the sixty-nine other pyramids still standing were built for sepulchres, all this great pile of granite and limestone by which we stand to day, to cover the memory of a dead king. It was the great Westminster Abbey of the ancients. Some say that Cheops was the king who built this Pyramid, but it is uncertain. Who was Cheops, anyhow? All that the world knows about him could be told in a few sentences. The only thing certain is that he was bad and that he shut up the temples of worship and that he was hated so that the Egyptians were glad when he was dead. This Pyramid of rock seven hundred and forty feet each side of the square base and four hundred and fifty feet high wins for him no respect. If a bone of his arm or foot had been found in the sarcophagus beneath the Pyramid, it would have excited no more veneration than the skeleton of a camel bleaching on the Libyan desert; yea, less veneration, for when I saw the carcase of a camel by the roadside on the way to Memphis, I said to myself: "Poor thing, I wonder of what it died." We say nothing against the marble or the bronze of the necropolis. Let all that sculpture and florescence and arborescence can do for the places of the dead be done, if means will allow it. But if after one is dead there is nothing left to remind the world of him but some pieces of stone, there is but little left. Some of the finest monuments are over people who amounted to nothing while they lived, while some of the worthiest men and women have not had above them a stone big enough to tell their name. Joshua, the greatest warrior the world ever saw, no monument; Moses, the greatest lawyer that ever lived, no monument; Paul, the greatest preacher that ever lived, no monument; Christ, the Saviour of the world and the rapture of heaven, no monument. A pyramid over scoundrelly Cheops, but only a shingle with a lead pencil epitaph over many a good man's grave. Some of the finest obituaries have been printed about the worst rascals. To-day at Brussels there is a pyramid of flowers on the grave of Boulanger, the notorious libertine. Yet it is natural to want to be remembered.

While there seems to be no practical use for post-mortem consideration later than the time of one's great grandchildren, yet no one wants to be forgotten as soon as the obsequies are over. This Pyramid which Isaiah says is a sign and a witness demonstrates that neither limestone nor red granite are competent to keep one affectionately remembered; neither can bronze; neither can Parian marble; neither can Aberdeen granite do the work. But there is something out of which to build an everlasting monument and that will keep one freshly remembered four thousand years; yea, for ever and ever. It does not stand in marble yards. It is not to be purchased at mourning stores. Yet it is to be found in every neighborhood, plenty of it, inexhaustible quantities of it. It is the greatest stuff in the universe to build monuments out of. I refer to the memories of those to whom we can do a kindness, the memories of those whose struggles we may alleviate, the memories of those whose souls we may save. All around Cairo and Memphis there are the remains of pyramids that have gone down under the wearing away of time, and this great Pyramid of which Isaiah in the text speaks will vanish if the world lasts long enough; and if the world does not last, then with the earth's dissolution the Pyramid will also dissolve. But the memories of those with whom we associate are indestructible. They will be more vivid the other side of the grave than this side. It is possible for me to do you a good and for you to do me a good that will be vivid in memory as many years after the world is burned up as all the sands of the seashore and all the leaves of the forest and all the grass blades of the field and all the stars of heaven added together, and that aggregate multiplied by all the figures that all the book-keepers of all time ever wrote.

That desire to be remembered after we are gone is a divinely implanted desire and not to be crushed out, but, I implore you, seek something better than the immortalization of rock, or bronze or book. Put yourself into the eternity of those whom you help for both worlds, this and the next. Comfort a hundred souls and there will be through all the cycles of eternity at least a hundred souls that will be your monuments. A prominent member of this church was brought to God by some one saying to her at the church door at the close of service, "Come again!" Will it be possible for that one so invited to forget the inviter? A minister passing along the street every day looked up and smiled to a baby in the window. The father and mother wondered who it was that thus pleasantly greeted their child. They found out that he was the pastor of a church. They said, "We must go and hear him preach." They went and heard him and both were converted to God. Will there be any power in fifty million years to erase from the souls of those parents the memory of that man who by his friendliness brought them to God? Matthew Cranswick, an evangelist, said that he had the names of two hundred souls saved through his singing the hymn: "Arise, my soul, arise!" Will any of those two hundred souls in all eternity forget Matthew Cranswick? Will any of the four hundred and seventy-nine women and children imprisoned at Lucknow, India, waiting for massacre by the Sepoys, forget Havelock and Outram, and Sir David Beard, who broke in and effected their rescue? To some of you who have loved and served the Lord, heaven will be a great picture gallery of remembrance. Hosts of the glorified will never forget you. Ah, that is a way of building monuments that shall never feel the touch of decay. I do not ask you to suppress this natural desire of being remembered after you are gone, but I only want you to put your memorials into a shape that shall never weaken or fade. During the course of my ministry I have been intimately associated in Christian work with hundreds of good men and women. My memory is hung with their portraits more accurate and vivid than anything that Rembrandt ever put on canvas:—Father Grice, DeWitt C. Moore, Father Voorhees, E. P. Hopkins, William Stephens, John Van Rensselaer, Gasherie DeWitt, Dr. Ward, and hundreds of others all of them gone out of this life, but I hold the memory of them and will hold them forever. They cannot escape from me. I will remember them just as they looked on earth, and I will remember many of you after the earth has been an extinct planet for ages infinite. Oh, what stuff the memory is for monument building!

As in Egypt that December afternoon, 1889, exhausted in body, mind and soul, we mounted to return to Cairo, we took our last look of the Pyramid at Gizeh. And you know there is something in the air toward evening that seems productive of solemn and tender emotion, and that great Pyramid seemed to be humanized and with lips of stone it seemed to speak and cry out: "Hear me, man, mortal and immortal! My voice is the voice of God. He designed me. Isaiah said I would be a sign and a witness. I saw Moses when he was a lad. I witnessed the long procession of the Israelites as they started to cross the Red Sea and Pharaoh's host in pursuit of them. The falcons and the eagles of many centuries have brushed my brow. I stood here when Cleopatra's barge landed with her sorceries, and Hypatia for her virtues was slain in yonder streets. Alexander the Great, Sesostris and Ptolemy admired my proportions. Herodotus and Pliny sounded my praise. I am old, I am very old. For thousands of years I have watched the coming and going of generations. They tarry only a little while, but they make everlasting impression. I bear on my side the mark of the trowel and chisel of those who more than four thousand years ago expired. Beware what you do, Oh, man! for what you do will last long after you are dead! If you would be affectionately remembered after you are gone, trust not to any earthly commemoration. I have not one word to say about any astronomer who studied the heavens from my heights or any king who was sepulchred in my bosom. I am slowly passing away. I am a dying pyramid. I shall yet lie down in the dust of the plain and the sands of the desert shall cover me, or when the earth goes I will go. But you are immortal. The feet with which you climbed my sides to-day will turn to dust, but you have a soul that will outlast me and all my brotherhood of pyramids. Live for eternity! Live for God! With the shadows of the evening now falling from my side, I pronounce upon you a benediction. Take it with you across the Mediterranean. Take it with you across the Atlantic. God only is great! Let all the earth keep silence before him. Amen!" And then the lips of granite hushed, and the great Giant of Masonry wrapped himself again in the silence of ages, and as I rode away in the gathering twilight, this course of sermons was projected.

"Wondrous Egypt! Land of ancient pomp and pride,
Where Beauty walks by hoary Ruin's side,
Where plenty reigns and still the seasons smile,
And rolls—rich gift of God—exhaustless Nile"

GOING TO THE FRONT.

holy sacrifice. And hundreds of thousands coming down to sleep their last sleep, but other hundreds of thousands going up to take their places, and the pyramids will continue to rise until the millennial morning gilds the completed work, and the toilers on these heights shall take off their aprons and throw down their trowels, crying, "It is finished." Your business and mine is not to build a pyramid but to be one of the hundreds of thousands who shall ring a trowel, or pull a rope or turn the crank of a derrick, or cry "Yo heave!" while lifting another block to its elevation. Though it be seemingly a small work and a brief work, it is a work that shall last forever. In the last day many a man and woman whose work has never been recognized on earth will come to a special honor. The Ecumenical Council, now in session at Wash-

CHRIST THE TRUE VINE.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 15: 1-16. Golden Text, John 15:8.

I AM the true Vine, and my Father is the Husbandman." The vine exists for its fruit; its natural and luxurious beauty of foliage is sacrificed, its own growth hindered, and it is deprived of all attractiveness in itself, that it may bring forth fruit. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be my disciples." Just like the vine, the Church of Christ exists for her fruit. She too has to die to her own natural advantages, to lose her own life, to be crucified with Christ, acknowledging that all her own goodness is "as the flower of the field" which withereth and fadeth; and she has to be grafted into the true Vine, and be a channel of his life, in order to bring forth fruit. Everything which can recommend her to the world, all which is the beauty of the flesh, all which renders self-attractive, has to be denied that she may bring forth fruit unto God." (Rom. 7:4.) "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit,

He Taketh Away."

The branch is useless which bears no fruit, it has lost the meaning and purpose of its existence. Like the miry places and marshes (Ezek. 47:11), where the living water flowed in, but which had no outlet, and so could not fertilize the land, the branch which exists for itself, and not for the fruit, is out of harmony with the whole purpose of the Vine, it must be "taken away" lest it spread death around it; it cannot continue to be regarded as a part of the Vine, for its witness is to death, and not to life. An un-Christlike Christian, a useless professor, must be "taken away," not by a fellow-Christian, but by the great Husbandman. Do believers realize what this involves for the majority of professing Christians? But every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." Oh, how many of us have seen our natural powers decline; we have been despoiled of just that which men, even Christian men, could admire and have wondered at God's dealings with us. Powers which seemed so indispensable for the work of the Lord, have waned, talents which once drew crowds have declined, we have felt ourselves barren and useless. He was purging us of the natural, of the flesh, that we might become spiritual, divine. We have been admired and sought after for what we were, for a sanctified nature which God could use for the time being, but which left a stronger impression of us than of him on others. It is only in trial, the purging of the great Husbandman, that the true fruit of the Vine, the true character of Christ in us, can be manifested. It is just when and where our own resources fail, that the Lord has an opportunity to show what he can be in difficult, almost impossible circumstances.

"Now Ye are Clean

through the word which I have spoken unto you." Jesus saw in those hearts all that which made them, an hour or so later, forsake him and flee; he saw in Peter's heart his strong denial of his Lord with oaths and curses that very night; and yet, Priest that he was, by virtue of his atonement, not yet consummated he could say, "Now are ye clean!" Through all the deep humiliation of their failure, he saw his purpose already accomplished. Their failure would show them what all his teaching had failed to show them—their own utter nothingness. Then, by this means, emptied of self, and afterward filled with the Holy Spirit, they would be able to take in his words. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me." While we are unable to discern between "soul and spirit," (Heb. 4:12), we cannot understand what it is to abide in Christ. Human nature, even when converted, is full of itself, full of its resolutions, its purposes, its plans, its emotions, its ideas, its devotion, etc. But to abide in Christ is to turn from all this in the consciousness that all our resources cannot accomplish so much as one thought which is really of the Spirit. "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven (John 3:27), and in this utter helplessness he falls back upon the place which God's grace has given him in Christ. There he is sheltered, covered, separated, from what he is; he is part of another. "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?" (1. Cor. 6:15); "Members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." Abide then, outside yourself, in himself. Do nothing, speak nothing, independently of him. Let it be to you a strange land where you are not at home, if anything separates you from him for a moment. The source of fruit is in him, not in us. "From me is thy fruit found." (Hos. 14:8.) The life sap may flow through us, but can never originate in us.

"I am the vine, ye are the branches: He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without me (apart from me R. V.) ye can do nothing."

"Much Fruit,"

How much this speaks of the work of the husbandman! How much it tells of the vitality of the vine; how absolutely nothing of the value of the branches, except as they serve their purpose in their still subordinate office! "Ye are the branches," a very part of him, depending upon him for very life, but then, as being part of him, he must also depend upon the branches to pour his life through them. Blessed mutual dependence! "Without me ye can do nothing." It takes a lifetime to learn this lesson. How we try to pray our own prayers, until we learn from our own grievous failure that "we know not what we should pray for as we ought," and we have to depend upon the Holy Spirit who "helpeth our infirmities," and by whom God sends the Spirit of his Son into our hearts whereby we cry Abba, Father! (Gal. 4:4.) Then we can pray. We cannot control our own thoughts, but God has commanded us, "In nothing be anxious; but in everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God; and the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." (Phil. 4:6, 7, R. V.)

We Cannot Awaken a Soul,

but if the hand of the Lord is with us a number may turn unto the Lord. We cannot make ourselves love God, but "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which was given unto us," and even if we do not feel it, we may be quite sure God is not mistaken in what he states, and if indeed the Holy Ghost is given to us, then he has shed abroad the love of God in our hearts more than we are aware of. Perhaps our very consciousness of how much we lack in love to God is the surest sign that love to him does exist in our hearts. There is a wonderful rest in the fact that without him we can do nothing, it delivers us from the terrible self accusations which would otherwise constantly torment a tender conscience. We may see others doing what we know we cannot do. Then it is so precious to know that if he has not called us to just the same office, or just the same kind of life, we can serve him better in the sphere which he has given us. We live to please him, not to imitate or emulate others.

"If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." In me, yet not abiding; having faith, but not lasting faith; love, but not lasting love; zeal, but not lasting zeal; a devotion which is by fits and starts, not having in it the elements of eternity! This is a spurious conversion, and such are most of the so called conversions which take place! "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord." (Jer. 23:28.) Oh how many of those who have been looked upon as converted must be cast forth as branches, because the fruit of the Spirit, the "love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance," (Gal. 5:22, R. V.) which manifest an indwelling Christ, are wanting! Oh how many there are who think themselves all right, because they have a sense of pardon, while the fruit which they bring forth is pride, selfishness, envy, unkindness, evil speaking, debt, worldliness, etc.! And God says, as to Israel of old, "Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?" (Jer. 2:21.)

"If Ye Abide in Me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." To abide in Christ is to will with Christ, and to be patient enough to wait until his will is made known; then God can trust us with invariably answered prayers. To have his words abiding in us is to give his revelation of himself and of his will a home in all our being, to be willing servants of his will; and this implies interests in common with him. Then our experience may be one with our Lord's when he said to his Father, "I knew that thou hearest me always." (John 11:42.)

"Even as the Father hath loved me, I also have loved you; abide ye in my love. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love, even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. This is my commandment that ye love one another even as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Here is the secret of abiding: it is obedience, and obedience is love and self-sacrifice, life and will and plan laid down for him who gave his life for us, and for others whom he has redeemed equally with us. But how, then, can we obey this command so impossible to our nature, if without him we can do nothing? Just as the man with the withered hand obeyed the command, "Stretch forth thine hand." With the will to obey, the power was granted. We have not to feel it in ourselves beforehand, any more than this poor man had. We must be willing to yield to God and to man for God's sake—he does the rest. "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be full." A selfish joy leaves the heart still empty, but the joy of the Lord in accomplishing the will of the Father is the very essence of eternal life; it endures. "Ye are my friends if ye do the things which I command you. Henceforth I call you for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth, but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard from my Father, I have made known unto you." A common life, a common love, a common obedience, a common joy, a common knowledge between Jesus and his own! "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain (eternal fruit!), that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you." What a life of glory and privilege Jesus calls us to!

Not Servants,

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

HEREIN is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit. A little girl named Mattie had just given her heart to God. She read her Bible and in the course of her reading came to this verse. She sat and pondered awhile and then she arose determined to serve God more faithfully by bearing much fruit. She got up the next morning, resolved to look out for some great thing to do, in order to show her love for Jesus. But the day passed away without her finding any great thing to do; and at the close of the day she felt very much discouraged. So she put on her bonnet and went over to Aunt Jennie's. "Auntie," said she, the greetings over, "I want to serve the Lord Jesus and I have been looking all the day for some great things to do but I have found none." Her aunt, a very sensible and godly woman, replied, "Ah, Mattie, dear, you are just making the mistake many other persons have made before you. Now, suppose that instead of waiting all day for some great thing to do, you had begun the morning by asking Jesus to help you to serve him in little things, and then had helped mother in sweeping the room, or amusing the baby, or helped Mary in the kitchen, and then had gone to work, you would have found plenty to do all day."

"But, auntie, those are such little things." "I know it, Mattie; but then life is made up of little things."

Before leaving her room the next morning,

Mattie found work to do for Jesus. When her mother came up to make Mattie's bed, she was surprised to find it made up and the room in the nicest order. When Mattie went down stairs she found work to do for Jesus there. All day long wherever she went there was something for her to do. She was busy as a bee and as bright as a sunbeam all the day.

At the close of the day, when she was going upstairs, her mother laid her hand gently on her shoulder and said, "Mattie, darling, you have been a real blessing and comfort to me to-day."

This filled Mattie's eyes with tears, but they were tears of joy and gladness. And as she knelt down in her room to thank God for helping her to serve him, the stars never shone on a happier girl than Mattie was that evening.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. During the late war a farmer was drafted. He was much grieved about it, not because he was a coward, but on account of his motherless family, who would have no bread-winner or caretaker in his absence. The day before he had to march, young Mr. Durham, a neighbor, came over and said, "Farmer Blake, you have a large family to look after and a farm to attend to; I have no one dependent on me, and if you are agreeable, I will serve in your place." The farmer was astonished, so much so as to be unable to reply for some time. He stood leaning one hand on his spade and wiping the perspiration from his brow with the other. It seemed too good to be true! At length he took in the deliverance, grasped the hand of young Durham, and praised God. The young man went away, feeling that he was doing a noble deed, and all the village came out to bid him Godspeed. But alas! in the first battle he was shot and killed! When Farmer Blake saw in the newspaper the name of Charles Durham among the missing, he at once went off to the battlefield, and after searching for some time found the body of his friend. He brought it to the village, and to the little churchyard in which they had frequently walked together to the house of prayer. From the quarry upon the hill he cut out a plain marble tablet, on which he carved an inscription with his own hand. It was roughly done, but with every blow there fell a tear from his eyes. Then he put the marble tablet on the grave, and when the villagers stooped to see the little monument they also wept. It did not say much, but it deeply touched them. The inscription read:

C. D.

He died for me.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you. And we may all be chosen if we are willing to be. While this particular passage refers only to the choosing of the Apostles, it is equally applicable to all mankind. "Look unto me all ye ends of the earth and be ye saved," has no limitations except such as our own stubborn wills create.

A colored man who had received the Gospel became a preacher among his brethren. He was addressed on one occasion by his former master in these words: "Sam, I hear that you have become a preacher, and that you believe in election." "Well, yas sah, I believe dat truth is clearly revealed in the Word of God." "And I suppose, Sam, that you think you are one of the elect," rejoined the master. "Well, sah, I is prepared to say dat I gib all diligence to making my calling and election sure, dat is true." "But I suppose you don't think I am one of the elect." The sable preacher gave an answer which is well worth quoting. Sam knew his former master was given to the pursuit of pleasure, money, and the service of sin. Very quietly he replied "Well, Massa, I am not sure about dat, dis I know—I nebber knew of an election where dar was no candidate."

ROBERT'S VINE.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Nov. 1: "Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit." John 15:8.

ROBERT'S father was going to live in the country. Robert did not understand what that meant when his father told him. He was only ten years old, and those ten years had been passed in the city. His home was a flat in one of the high houses in a long city street, and he knew nothing of gardens or flowers but what he saw in the little backyard not much larger than a big dining table. To Robert's father, however, the change meant much. He had been a country boy, with all a country boy's love of nature, and only hard necessity had kept him working in the city for twenty years past. All those years he had longed for the time to come when he could afford to live in the country. That time had come at last, and it was with a heart full of joy that he announced to his partners that he had bought a little place and a bit of land in a village ten miles away. He would come to the city every day, but his evenings and mornings and Sundays would be spent among the scenes he loved. There was some laughing and joking about his turning farmer, but he did not care. He would have his little garden, and he guessed he knew how to cultivate it.

Robert's delight when he and his parents reached their new home fully equalled his father's. He could actually walk on the grass without fear of a policeman arresting him. Every day brought some new discovery, some strange flower or plant, or some animal which he had never seen before, or a bird's-nest with eggs in it. There were a number of questions to be asked of his father when evening came, and Robert would go to meet the train and lead his father off to show him what he had found and learn all about it. But his chief delight was in a little patch of ground that was all his own, and was called Robert's garden. It was on the south side of the house, and rooted in it and climbing up a trellis was a grape-vine. This was Robert's pride. He watched it daily. And how it did grow! He marked with a pencil on the trellis just where the tips of the longest shoots came to, and measured every day's progress. Bye-and-bye to Robert's intense delight there came a few strange looking bunches which he knew must be grapes. They were quite green and not larger than the heads of pins. But they grew larger and, as the summer passed, turned a rich purple, and were fit to be plucked and eaten.

What would that vine be next year! It was so small when Robert first saw it and see how large it was now. Why, there were branches four and five feet long, all grown that summer! Robert planned how to increase the length and height of the trellis which supported it. He spoke to his father about it and his father said he had arranged with a gardener to come and see to it and put it in order. "I think it is worth attention," he added. "Those grapes were very fair for outdoors. It might pay to run glass over the vine some day. They laugh in the city at my enthusiasm over the garden. I should be proud to take over a specimen bunch of grapes and see how astonished they would be."

Robert was away at school the next day when the gardener came. On his return he went around to his garden and as he saw the vine he stood aghast. All those long branches whose growth he had watched with such interest were gone. That gardener's knife had mercilessly lopped them off near to the parent stem. It was a mere skeleton of a vine that Robert looked on. "He has spoiled it," Robert exclaimed. "What will papa say when he knows?" But Robert's father was not dismayed. "It is all right," he said. "That is the only way to get grapes from it. It is the new wood that bears."

"But the vine," Robert said. "It had grown so large and beautiful. Next year it would have been ever so big. We could have trained it to make a summer arbor. The man has cut those lovely long branches with the beautiful leaves quite short. It was cruel. There is scarcely anything left of it."

"The parent stem is left and the root, Robert," said his father. "It is not the branches and the leaves we want, but the grapes. They would laugh at me in the city if I took over a branch with leaves, to show them what a good vine I have, no matter how beautiful they were. It is a big bunch of fine grapes I want to take over. That will convince them. They will not laugh at my gardening then. And this is the way to get the grapes. If this year's branches had been left, next year's branches would have grown out of them and the grapes would have been too far away from the root. You will see that next year the vine will be stronger, if it is no larger and the grapes will be finer and sweeter. It is all right my boy."

Robert found it as his father had said and the following year he was not distressed when the gardener again pruned the vine and when his father with a pair of scissors cut out of the young bunches some of the grapes that the others might have room to grow.

Many years afterward, when Robert was grown a man and his heart was well nigh broken with sorrow, when losses and bereavements laid him low, he read Christ's words: "I am the true vine . . . Every branch in me that beareth fruit he purgeth it that it may bring forth more fruit . . . Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit," and his boyhood experience was recalled to him. It was a lesson he understood and he was able not only to bear his cross patiently but out of his experience to comfort other sorrowing ones and lead them to Christ. Being purged he brought forth more fruit.

CLOSE OF THE COUNCIL.

century leaning on a solitary staff; she will cross over out of the century with more than two bands, besides flocks, herds, camels and asses, for she has 55,000 churches, 15,000 parsonages and over $20,000,000 worth of church property." The three wants of the church were a firm grip on the supernatural, the utilization of ideas, and a sufficiency of consecrated money.

Bishop Galloway said that every sixth soul in the South was a Methodist. Bishop Arnett of Ohio, representing the African M. E. Church, declared that more than one-half the negroes in the United States were influenced by African Methodist pulpits, whose mission was to show the colored man not only how to wear the golden slippers over there, but how to get and wear his shoes on Pennsylvania Avenue. J. H. Jones, of the African M. E. Church of Columbus, O., also made a most practical address.

When the discussion on "the Church and Scientific Thought" came up, it was quickly found that science had many champions, but none in conflict with revelation. The general tenor of the discussion was that the church should rather encourage than fear knowledge and investigation, and that modern science did not attack the essentials of religion. Rev. Frank Ballard, of England, held that if a man did not believe in science he did not believe in God. Bishop Fowler declared that unless Methodists could defend their ground they must surrender. A general debate followed, involving the whole subject of evolution, the prevailing sentiment as expressed by the speakers being that modern science, rightly understood, was not to be feared by the Church, and that science had abandoned more positions than religion.

Bishop Foster's paper on "The Responsibilities and Qualifications of the Preacher" called forth much favorable comment. High qualities of mind and proper qualities of body are needed, he said. There was too little preaching that brought man face to face with their horrid sins. Rev. John Bond, of London, Rev. William Howard Day, of African M. E. Church, Harrisburg, Pa., and several others spoke to the subject. One speaker condemned the preachers who invited doubt by delivering sermons on Darwinism and Huxleyism.

One of the very ablest addresses heard by the Conference was that of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, M.A., of London, on "The Religious Press and the Religious Uses of the Secular Press." He reviewed his subject since the year 1700, since which time 4,000 daily newspapers had sprung up. This great agency had rarely received consideration from the Church. It was the fourth estate, the greatest engine of the world. Christian churches must face the fact that it was in some cases in the hands of men who were indifferent to the Church and in others, of those who hated the Church. If so disposed, the editors of the daily press could render incalculable aid to the service of God. The religious press should never be used for political purposes. Concluding, he said the preacher had learned from journalism and "God grant that it may learn a little from us. United, we and the journalists can hasten the creation of that state which Christ is bringing to all lands, in which there shall be no room for or sign of misery."

Rev. Dr. Fergusson of the Primitive Methodist Church of England, held that occasionally politico-religious questions should be treated by the religious press, but to this the Conference made motion of dissent and he dropped the matter. Rev. E. E. Hoss, of Nashville, Tenn., Mr. John H. Lile of London, and Mr. Atkinson, an English member of Parliament, all spoke on Mr. Hughes' paper. Finally, all allusion to politics was dropped.

Two interesting relics of Methodism came to the notice of the Conference. The first was an antique chair, with a carved medallion of Wesley on the back, surmounted by an eagle, the whole cut out of timber of the chapel in which Wesley preached in England. This memorial was sent to America by the Wesleyan Conference of England, and was inspected by the members of the Ecumenical Conference with deep interest and veneration. The other was a time-stained copy of the Methodist Magazine, published in Philadelphia in 1798, contributed by Mr. James Overstreet of Nicholsonville, Ky. Both were placed in the collection of Methodist Historical relics in one of the class rooms.

In this issue of the CHRISTIAN HERALD we portray of a number of members who took an active part in the debates during the sessions, and also an illustration showing the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church where the Conference met. These will be regarded with interest as souvenirs of the second and greatest Ecumenical Council of Methodism which ended its labors yesterday.

A MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.

DISAPPOINTMENT drove a man almost to frenzy in a New York Police Court on October 9. He is a German by birth, but having spent the required period in America, he applied for and received his naturalization papers on October 8. He was much elated by his newly acquired dignity as an American citizen, and went about among his friends boasting of it. He treated them to beer extensively and was treated in turn. Before night he had imbibed so much that he was uproariously intoxicated. He grew quarrelsome and finally had to be locked up. When arraigned in court next morning he flourished his naturalization papers, and proudly declared himself an American citizen. "That does not excuse you," said the Justice, "Two dollars fine." "What!" exclaimed the man, "I will not be one of such a people," and he tore his certificate to pieces and flung the fragments on the floor. As he has abjured allegiance to the Kaiser and repudiates his American citizenship he cannot consistently claim the protection of any government. He appears to have been more concerned about acquiring the privileges of citizenship than about its duties. That is the case with many who seek entrance into Christ's kingdom. They want to have their souls saved from perdition, but to do as little for Christ and his cause, and give as little as possible. Such men are no real accession to the Church and they often fall away. (John 15:2.)

INCOMBUSTIBLE PAPER.

An important discovery is reported in a press despatch from Washington, D. C. It states that information has reached the Bureau of American Republics of the discovery at Bucaramanga, in the United States of Colombia, of a mineral substance not unlike asbestos. Senor Eloy Talenzuela, a distinguished geologist, has given this material the name of bucamanquina. It is the color of amber, is perfectly transparent, and is incombustible. Experiments now being made in Bogota with this wonderful material indicate that it can be woven in pliable fireproof cloth, or shaped in casques suitable for firemen's wear. A white varnish can also be extracted from this substance, and as experiments proceed it is claimed that the uses to which it can be put will make it much more valuable than asbestos. Its chief use, however, will be in the manufacture of bank notes and legal documents. So much property is every year destroyed by fire that any discovery which will make bank-notes and other securities indestructible by the flames will be welcomed by wealthy men. The Christian already knows how his treasures may be preserved even in that conflagration which will burn all other possessions. (1. Cor. 3: 12-14.)

TWO OUTCASTS.

A FREIGHT car with sealed doors was a conspicuous object on the Canadian frontier during the early days of this month. It was being sent to and fro and was at last side-tracked, and policemen set to guard it. It contained two Chinese lepers who had been sent from New York to Vancouver to join a party of thirty Chinamen who were returning to China. On the arrival of the lepers at Vancouver, their fellow-countrymen refused to travel with them. The lepers were therefore put in a freight car, with a barrel of bread and a barrel of water, the doors were locked and sealed and the car was sent back to the United States. But at the frontier it was stopped, the officials of our government refusing to allow it to pass. It was accordingly sent back to Vancouver. Thence it was sent back again eastward, but at Swift Current it was again stopped, by orders from the Dominion government, and sent back to Vancouver. The Mayor would not let it enter the town, so it was side-tracked, as the Railroad Company dare not defy the Dominion government by sending it eastward again. The Vancouver people became excited when they heard of the arrival of the car, fearing that the lepers might escape and steal into the town. They threatened to burn the car and its living freight if it was not sent away and the Mayor had to put policemen on guard to prevent them carrying out their threat. If the lepers are aware of the difficulty about them, they must feel a sense of desolation in being cast out by both nations and by the consciousness that they will not be welcomed in their own country. A more hopeless, desolate condition cannot be imagined. They have no hope in this life and they have probably never heard of Jesus in whom so many hopeless ones have found refuge, and who casts out none who come to him. (John 6: 37.)

A NOVEL FEE.

How a client paid a lawyer in New Orleans is told by the Times-Democrat of that city. It appears that some time ago the lawyer was engaged to defend the interests of a lady who was engaged in litigation with her co-heirs under her father's will. He made no stipulation as to his fee, but after the case was settled he sent in his bill. The lady called on him and explained that she had no money to pay it, but handed him as security a document granting him the usufruct for his life in a burial plot in the cemetery. She said it was the only thing of any value she had. The lawyer naturally objected to such a mode of payment. He explained to her that the lot was of no use to him, as the conveyance to him was personal and did not give him the right to dispose of it nor to bury any other person in it. Also, that he could not be buried in it himself, because his interest in it terminated at his death and he did not wish to be buried until he was dead. The client, however, said she had nothing else to give him, and, leaving it on his desk, quitted the office. It is not surprising that the lawyer is dissatisfied with such payment for the labor and time he devoted to the case. He will probably be more careful in the future about the character of the clients for whom he works. It may be hoped that he is a Christian, for if he is in the service of Satan he will receive still worse compensation for his services. That being pays his servants with misery in this life and a worse fate beyond the grave. (Rom. 6:21, 23.)

EXCLUDED FROM THE ELEVATOR.

A CURIOUS dispute over an elevator is to be submitted to the decision of the New York courts. A large building was erected for manufacturing purposes some years ago. The builder put in the shaft for an elevator but not the elevator itself. The floors were rented to firms engaged in different businesses and among them one to a piano-forte manufacturer. He urged the owner to put in an elevator, as he experienced much inconvenience in transacting his business without one. The owner postponed doing so on the ground that he was about to rent one of the floors to an elevator manufacturing company who would doubtless put an elevator in at their own expense. His surmise proved correct. The elevator was put in and all the occupiers were allowed to use it by paying a small annual charge. But after a time, the piano-manufacturer had a quarrel with the elevator people and the latter punished him by refusing him permission to use the elevator. His customers and employees had consequently to toil up several flights of stairs and he had to rig a block and tackle to hoist his pianos. The inconvenience has become so intolerable that he has appealed to the law to compel the elevator people to accord him the same privileges as those enjoyed by the other occupiers. There is little probability of his succeeding. He will have to bear the inconvenience or move out, if he does not settle his quarrel. The latter would probably be his wisest course, as it generally is. Many a man has suffered in body and soul by persisting in a quarrel and it has often happened that his way to the higher levels of Christian joy and experience has been rendered more difficult by the impediments which have been placed in his path as a result of the quarrel. (1. Cor. 11:18-30)

THE METHODISTS.

THE absorbing event is the Ecumenical Council at Washington, a grand convocation of Methodists from all parts of the world. Among other characteristics is that they look healthy, their religion seeming to agree with them. What is the use of such a convocation called at vast expense from the ends of the earth? Much, every way. It enlarges the ideas of the men themselves, and gives them additional endowment for usefulness when they return to their various fields. But, more than that, the meeting emphasizes before all Christendom the fact that the kingdom of God is coming. Enough statistics have been presented in that meeting at Washington to put pandemonium in a panic. Many of the veterans of that denomination from all lands are present. What a privilege for the people to look at those old warriors for the truth that have been in so many Balaklavas, the scars of the conflict on their faces. In England, many years ago, the government set apart a great pasture field for the old cavalry horses that had been broken down in war. Instead of being sold where they would be harnessed to heavy loads, and whacked by draymen and teamsters, those horses were in their old age put into fields of clover for the rest of their days. Now, I think it is a good thing to bring the old war-horses of all our denominations into religious councils and convocations, and let them feed on the victories of the truth and rest themselves in the great pasture fields by the still waters of contemplation. Give us an opportunity of seeing the men who have done bold and decided work for God for half a century. It will strengthen our faith, it will rally our courage, it will kindle our enthusiasm. Yea, it will demonstrate to the pessimism of the church that it is only a question of time when the earth shall be taken for God. The darkest hour is just before daybreak, and all the shadows of evil that now cover the earth are the precursors of the day-dawn of the world's deliverance. "Yes," says some veteran of the Cross, "all that may be true; but it will not come in my time. I will never see it." Yes, you will see it. You will be in the best place to see it. Who can see a victory the better, he who stands on the low level where the battle goes on, or he who stands on a high wall? Why, of course, he who stands in elevated position. Well, when the Gospel consummation shall have been reached, those who remain on the earth will see it and rejoice, but those who stand on the walls of heaven will have the best outlook, the finest opportunity to take in all the scene and the hosannas of those who are on the earthly levels will be drowned out by the hallelujahs of those who have mounted the jasper parapets.

A GOOD HABIT.

THE last few days have reminded us of the beautiful habit in humane nature of speaking well of the dead, omitting their faults and extolling their virtues. However vehemently and perhaps justly men are denounced for their principles or their behavior while they are in the battle of life, when they become exanimate anathema ceases. See how all the pens, all the types, all the tongues, that were full of attack for Mr. Parnell, have become lenient, if not positively appreciative. I think this is beautiful. As long as a man is alive, he can answer back. But if, when his lips are closed for the last silence, you assail him, the war is unequal. It is ignominious for one to attack the lifeless. It is the dead lion of the fable kicked by an ass. Whatever a man's faults, when he has passed off cease your excommunication. Only swine will root up a graveyard. None of us believe in the transmigration of souls or that the spirit of man passes into the brute creation; but if the doctrine were true, the last bird that I would want to become is the carrion crow. When a man passes the confines of this life, he passes beyond our ken. This world has nothing more to do with him. He is in a realm where only God can deal with him. I think we all admire this habit of speaking well of the departed or speaking nothing at all. Indeed, would it not be a good thing to build an annex to that habit and speak well of the living or speak nothing at all?

"But," some one asks, "ought we not expose wrong-doers?" That, no doubt, ought to be done; but let some one else do it. Carcasses ought to be removed from the field, but let the summer flies and the buzzards attend to that post mortem industry. There are enough people in every land who will attend to that part of social life. Indeed the doctrine of transmigration of souls, which I just now spoke lightly of, is not so much of an absurdity after all. There are people who display such obnoxious and devouring spirit while living that their souls might appropriately, after death, go into wasps and jackals and blood-suckers and crocodiles of immense swallow; while other people, from their dispositions here, would more appropriately, after death, put on the plumage of the morning lark, or become the gazelle or the roe on the mountains of Bether.

But before I turn from this subject let me say that I am reminded that political life, whether in Ireland, England, or America, is a tragic life and that no one should enter it except in the martyr spirit, which is a noble spirit. Do not enter that style of life for fun. It may be fun at the start, but it is crucifixion at the last. The doctors spoke the technical truth when they said that Mr. Parnell died of rheumatic fever, but the old mother at Bordentown spoke the unvarnished fact that it was a broken heart that killed him. The path of politics in all lands is lined on both sides with the bleached skeletons of mighty men.

"Hand us another," says Public Life, as it pitches one man aside and clutches for some promising man in law, or merchandise, or social position. Politics must be reformed, and if you have the martyr spirit go into them, but if you undertake that style of life for regalement and profit you make a mistake that cannot be corrected. A new book, the biography of the late Benjamin H. Hill, arriving yesterday from his son, the author, contains a letter dated in the United States Senate Chamber at Washington in which the illustrious senator writes the advice to his boy:

"If I were to express any regret or designate any great error of my life, it would be that I had ever connected myself with party politics or accepted a political office. If you would be happy, or useful, or self-respecting I would advise you let party politics and political positions severely alone."

My reader, the only safe spirit in which to enter politics is the martyr spirit, and then if you are sacrificed you will not be surprised. The fact that you have great brain affords you no safety, that is the very reason why you will be put down or viciously handled. The political parties do not want great brains hanging around prominent places. Every day reading the newspapers, I am surprised to find how little brains it takes to make a great man in this country. Do not enter politics because you have unusual mental equipment or especial fitness for office, but in the martyr spirit.

How many men are glad that Mr. Parnell is dead because they want his position? They will feel a wonderful spirit of resignation, and though they should sob so loud their dramatized woe could be heard from Dublin to Brighton, their cheek will be as dry of tears as a desert, that has not felt a drop of rain for ten years is dry of moisture. The only man on either side of the ocean who has spent a very long life in politics without being sacrificed is William E. Gladstone, and he, at eighty-two years of age, keeps all his enemies busy, and nothing seems able to put him down. When, in January, 1889, I was with him racing up and down his park at Hawarden we were followed by his dog, which the great man seemed to think a very remarkable animal, and several times Mr. Gladstone would stop, pick up a stick, call the attention of the dog, and then, after the animal was sufficiently excited, would hurl the stick to a great distance and then the dog would run and fetch it to the great glee of the aged statesman. So Mr. Gladstone keeps alive and sound and well by ever and anon throwing out some thought about England or Ireland that keeps all the British Empire in a grand scramble, and the manner the public men fly about seems one of his styles of amusement. But, generally, as soon as, in any land, a man gives himself up to politics he either lowers to the standard of the roughs, or, for his integrity and nobility of character, is put in the pillory.

LARGE AND SMALL GAME.

OUR boy, gun over shoulder, went out for game yesterday. His anticipation, like that of other hunters, was large. It is the season for duck, and ducks he wanted or nothing. He saw during the morning a great many robins, and says he could easily have bagged them, and for the practical purposes of the table they are almost as good as ducks. But he despised the smaller game, determined upon the larger, and came home without anything. As he set down his gun we laughed to see how the analogy runs all through life. We told him he ought to have brought down the robins and been sure of them, and taken the ducks also if he could. But men as well as boys make the same mistake. They despise the smaller successes of life in their tramp for greater ones. We are all out for rare game, and so miss much that is valuable in ordinary affairs. Young men will not save five dollars, because they are not a thousand. Christians neglect opportunities of plain usefulness, because they cannot do something extraordinary. Not robins but ducks.

We have noticed that those who will not serve God and society on a small scale fail completely. Because they cannot be eloquent they are stolidly silent.

Because they cannot endow a college, they will not help a poor widow who has lost her cow. Because in the hunt of life they cannot bring down something large and fat and memorable, they come in at the evening of their days and set down their gun chagrined and gameless. Despising robins, and ambitious for ducks, they get neither.

BRIEF NOTES.

It is reported that President Harrison has made strong protests to the Spanish Government against the harsh treatment to which American Missionaries have been subjected in the Caroline Islands by the new governor.

One hundred members have been added to the Euclid Avenue Congregational Church, Cleveland, Ohio, all of whom ascribe their conversion to the blessing of God on the labors of Rev. B. Fay Mills during his visit to that city.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, has been holding successful meetings at Elizabeth Port, N. J. He is now laboring at York Street M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., of which Rev. L. Richardson is pastor. At both churches there have been large numbers of inquirers and many have been led to Christ.

Mr. E. P. Telford, the English evangelist, commences a series of meetings at Providence, R. I., next Sunday. He asks us to state that many letters have missed him of late through misdirection. If they are sent to him at this office, 91 to 96 Bible House, they are sure to reach him.

Evangelist Geo. L. Barker whose young people's meetings at Ocean Grove were much blessed during the summer is now laboring at St. Paul's M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., with much success. At the conclusion of his services there this week he goes for three weeks to Simpson M. E. Church, Long Branch, where preparations are made for a great revival.

Dr. Arthur Neve, Medical Missionary in Kashmir, reports remarkable progress in his work in that country. Over thirty thousand patients have been treated by him. Some of them were so influential and so grateful for the benefits received that they have secured for him unwonted facilities for preaching the Gospel. More than once he has been allowed to preach in Mohammedan Mosques.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is going on the Continent, probably to Mentone, in the south of France, to complete his recovery. Before setting out he wrote to his Church urging them during his absence to aid Dr. A. T. Pierson by prayer and united effort. He adds that he is relieved of anxiety by Dr. Pierson's consenting to occupy the pulpit; "For," says Mr. Spurgeon, "he is a man after my own heart."

Rev. William E. Needham, of Germantown, Philadelphia, delivered one of his illustrated lectures recently at the Tabernacle Baptist Church, Brooklyn, of which Dr. McDermott is pastor. He lectures there again this (Wednesday) evening. He has an easel on the platform and rapidly sketches as he talks, illustrations of Gospel truth. This method of interesting and impressing an audience has been found very successful wherever he has spoken.

A press dispatch from Baltimore, Md., states that Prof. Paul Haupt of Johns Hopkins University, has just returned from conferences in London and Berlin with noted scholars who propose making a new translation of the Bible and the Apocrypha. Each book is to be in charge of one scholar, who will add to his translations explanatory notes. Among the American translators are Prof. W. R. Harper of the Chicago Baptist University, Prof. C. H. Toy of Cambridge, and Dr. W. H. Ward of New York.

At the recent meeting of the New York Presbytery, the Committee on the case of Prof. Briggs presented the citations it was appointed to prepare. Dr. George Alexander and Dr. John Hall each moved resolutions framed so as to avoid a trial. They were negative, however, by a vote of 64 to 62. The majority consisted of forty-four ministers and twenty elders; and the minority of fifty ministers and twelve elders. The trial will accordingly take place, and will commence on Nov. 4 in the Scotch Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has been holding some wonderful meetings at Trenton, N. J. On Sunday Oct. 4 he addressed an audience of men only in the Opera House on the invitation of the Young Men's Christian Association. Admission was by ticket and no less than nineteen hundred tickets were taken at the door. In the evening he preached to an overflowing congregation in the Century M. E. Church of which Dr. Davis is pastor. The following day, on the invitation of Dr. Hanlon, he addressed the students at Pennington Seminary.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Wreck of the U. S. S. "Dispatch"—Hawaii's Royal Heiress—More Rioting in China—Rebellion in Uruguay—Parnell's Successor—Prison Reform Congress—News Notes.

THE National Prison Reform Congress, in session in Pittsburg, Pa., during the past week, listened to a very interesting address by ex-President R. B. Hayes, as to reforms urgently needed in American prisons. The speaker asserted that a large majority of the prisoners accused or convicted in the United States are dealt with in defiance of justice and wisdom; young criminals are huddled with old offenders; professionals are sent out again at the end of their terms to prey on the public; prisoners are discharged under such circumstances that all the world is against them, and they are drawn back to jail by invisible but irresistible cords; and, finally, the prisons are under control of political appointees, removable at the whim of politicians and without regard to the effect on the management or the purpose of reform. These facts, the ex-president argued, largely explained the increase of crime, and he believed the defects indicated should be made the subject of effort by legislatures and Prison Reform Congresses.

The Latest Chinese Outbreak.

News from China is anything but reassuring. Despite the promises of the Imperial government to take strong pacificatory measures, the riots continue, and the safety and welfare of the missionaries are constantly jeopardized. Numbers of refugees from Ichang, in Hunan, the scene of the latest disturbances, are arriving at Hankow, bringing with them news of the troubles there. A crowd wrecked the American Episcopal Mission and compelled its inmates to flee for their lives. The Mission House was then set on fire, and afterward the Roman Catholic Convent. Seven Convent Sisters were thrown into the river by the native soldiers, but were rescued and taken on board the steamer Paohua. The American Consulate was next threatened but fortunately no one was injured. The new British Consulate was torn down and several dwellings adjoining, belonging to British subjects, were looted, the buildings being fired with kerosene. Mandarins were present and encouraged the rioters. The Scotch missionaries escaped by boat. It was quite clear that the rioters had the approval of the local authorities. When the soldiers get orders from their secret leaders, they care nothing for their officers. The central government seems to be impotent and the situation is very critical; for, unless a force is sent sufficiently strong to overawe Hunan, the rebellion must spread and foreigners will be in peril continually.

England's New Postmaster-General.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON, the successor of the late Mr. Raikes, Postmaster-General of England, is one of the most experienced public servants in Europe. Now nearly sixty years of age, he has filled a number of important offices with especial credit and has demonstrated executive talent of the highest order. He comes of an old Scottish family, but his training and work have been wholly English. On leaving the army in 1852 he entered Parliament, and remained a member eighteen years. Later, he was appointed Governor of South Australia and New Zealand, and afterward of Bombay. He then succeeded Sir Richard Temple as Under Secretary for Home, Indian and Foreign Affairs, and has been understudy to Lord Salisbury since 1885. He is quite an able political debater, and has been in many a Parliamentary fight where his chief's administration has been assailed. A portrait of the new appointee is given above.

A Revolution in Uruguay.

THE cable brings news of an attempted revolution in Montevideo, the trouble having begun with the members of a revolutionary club firing upon the troops stationed there. The latter returned the fire with deadly effect, and a number of persons were killed outright and many wounded. Several of the ringleaders in the plot were arrested, a priest being among the number. Attempts were made to assassinate President Obes, and to seize the members of the Junta, or governing body. Eight thousand troops are now on duty in the city preserving order. It is believed the outbreak originated with the Blanco party, who are plotting to secure the Presidency.

England's New Parliamentary Leader.

It now seems probable that Sir Michael Hicks-Beach will be chosen as the Government leader in the House of Commons, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the Rt. Hon. W. H. Smith, which was announced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week. During the week, political circles in Britain have been in a ferment over the question of the succession, and there has been a sharp struggle of diverse interests, Mr. Goschen and Mr. Balfour each having many adherents for the leadership. While the Liberals warmly espouse the claims of Mr. Goschen, the Carlton Club and many Conservatives have urged Lord Salisbury to select Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who has at different times led the House with marked ability. Besides, the Cabinet takes the same view of the matter. Sir Michael, who is well advanced in years, is President of the Board of Trade and is popular not alone with the Conservatives but with the Irish members as well. He stands squarely on the Unionist platform, however, and is orthodox politically. A portrait of the new leader is given on this page.

Parnell's Successor.

WHILE the death of Parnell will unquestionably have the ultimate effect of reuniting the factions of the Irish party, the immediate outcome has been a torrent of wrath from the adherents of the "Uncrowned King," directed against the anti-Parnellites and the English government. This was specially the case at Belfast, where the Ulster contingent of Parnellites who attended the funeral bore with them to Dublin, and carried to Glasnevin cemetery, where the interment took place, wreaths and mottoes with the words "Murdered" and "Revenge" in purple and red flowers. No such demonstration was ever seen in the Irish capital as that which took place on the day of the obsequies. Forty thousand persons viewed the body as it lay in state in the City Hall. The procession to the grave was miles in length and, save the excitement incident to the frightful crush at the cemetery, no disturbance took place. Delegations from every part of Ireland were in attendance, and Parnell's colleagues in Parliament walked or rode side by side with members of the opposing Irish factions. Mr. Parnell's favorite horse followed the bier. Then came the near relatives, followed by carriages containing the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the City Marshal, sword and mace-bearers and other officials; next were the corporations of various Irish cities, numerous Irish patriotic societies, hundreds of private carriages, and thousands on foot. Darkness set in before the final services at the interment. It is estimated that 200,000 persons assembled at the cemetery. Parnell's last words, "Give my love to my colleagues and to the Irish nation," are everywhere regarded as a command to the factions to unite. The feeling against Dillon and his following is very bitter, however, and may lead to violent scenes before the union is finally cemented. Whatever may have been the hopes or prospects of Justin McCarthy, as the probable successor of Mr. Parnell, they seem to have been sufficiently extinguished by recent events. John Dillon will, in all probability, be the man around whom the united factions would centre, should union be accomplished. But this even is problematical, for Parnell's followers in Ireland and the United States have already decided to maintain their organization separate and distinct, and to agitate for the triumph of those principles which their leader represented. John Redmond is foremost in urging this plan upon the Parnellites in Dublin, and will probably continue to lead them while union hangs in the balance.

Hawaii's Heiress-Apparent.

PRINCESS Victoria Kajulani Cleghorn, the heiress to the Hawaiian throne, who will succeed to royal honors in the event of the illness of Queen Liliuokalani proving fatal as is now feared, is the sister of the present monarch. Her father is the Hon. Archibald Cleghorn, for many years Collector-General of the island kingdom. The Princess has received a European education and is quite accomplished. She is rather attractive-looking, and is now nearly nineteen years of age. Although she is undoubtedly under English influence, it is not now believed—if the latest advices are correct—that any serious complications will arise in the event of her succession, as far as the interests of Americans are concerned. There has long been in Hawaii open distrust of the English; indeed, this feeling has prevailed ever since Lord George Paulet, in 1843, hoisted the British flag over the islands and claimed them as British territory. The result of this distrust has been to create a bitter feeling among the foreign residents. Hawaiians have little loyalty for any ruler who has foreign blood in her veins, and although the father of the heiress-apparent will undoubtedly work for the furtherance of British interests, this feeling is so strong that it would be dangerous to make any open attempt in that direction and might even lead to revolution. The latest news represents Queen Liliuokalani as at the point of death from organic heart disease. A portrait of the Princess Kajulani is given above.

Wreck of the U. S. S. "Dispatch."

THERE was great commotion in the Navy Department at Washington, a few days ago, on receipt of the news that the United States Steamer Dispatch had gone ashore on Assateague Shoals, off the Virginia Coast during a gale. The excitement was increased by the rumor, which afterward proved to be unfounded, that Secretary Tracy was on board. The vessel struck the rocks about midnight, head on, and while running at reduced speed on account of fog and heavy weather. It would seem that Commander Cowles had lost his bearing, for the regular course is many miles clear of the shoals. The officers and crew of the steamer were landed safely at the Assateague Life-Saving Station and cared for. There is little probability of saving the vessel, as she is said to be rapidly going to pieces. The Dispatch was built in 1874, as a private yacht, and was afterwards purchased by the Government. She has been known as the "President's Yacht." She was not fitted as a modern fighting ship, her main battery consisting of only one three-inch gun, which was used for saluting purposes. She was a wooden vessel, copper bottomed, and was not in good condition at any time within the last three years. Her commander, Lieutenant W. S. Cowles, has the reputation of being one of the ablest officers in the service. Assateague Shoals are situated about sixty miles northeast of Cape Charles, Va. Incoming steamers report gales of unprecedented severity on the Atlantic. Three great ocean liners arrived several days late, and with a number of their passengers and crews injured from being thrown about during the storms. One cabin passenger—er—a lady—died of her injuries. One steamer lost 152 head of cattle. Reports of fatal disasters along the Atlantic coast were received from many points during the week.

NEWS NOTES.

Sharp frost was experienced throughout the Eastern States last week.

There is a notable dearth of interest among French merchants in the World's Fair.

Ex-Senator Blair's resignation as Minister to China has been accepted by the President.

"Ruth Cleveland" is to be the name of the new addition to the ex-President's household.

There is a prospect that France will soon remove the prohibition against the importation of American pork.

Austria has appropriated 15,000 florins to aid Austrian exhibitors in making a proper display at the coming World's Fair in Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Stanley have gone to Australia. Stanley is still lame from a fall he received in Switzerland, some months ago.

The famine in Russian Poland is growing worse. Workmen are looting the bakers' shops, and thousands of people are dying of starvation.

The British Tories are alarmed by the result of the Manchester election which has nearly wiped out their majority in the House. The Liberals have gained a dozen or more seats.

Two new plots to assassinate the Czar are said to have been discovered, one at Kieff and the other at Elsinore, in Denmark. Both were frustrated by changes in the imperial programme of travel.

Levi M. Bates, one of the leading dry-goods merchants of New York, a prominent Republican and once a candidate for Mayor, was accidentally drowned in Bowery Bay, N. Y., a few days ago.

The Hon. Henry W. Sage has given Cornell University $100,000 for a library, in place of the one bequeathed by the late Mrs. Fiske, but which the courts decided the college could not legally accept.

Russia has already expended 20,000,000 roubles in buying seed-corn for the peasants in the famine-stricken districts, but 100,000,000 will be required to supply the most urgent cases with bread alone.

The Ordnance Department at Washington is making a series of experiments with smokeless powder, with a view to introducing it generally in the army. A laboratory has been established at Frankford, Pa.

Melbourne, the rain-compeller of Kansas, has offered to bring moisture from the clouds at ten cents per acre, throughout the state. The farmers of Western Kansas are negotiating with him to water forty counties at the rate stated.

During a fire in the residence of Mrs. August Belmont, in New York City, $100,000 worth of art treasures were burned. Mrs. Belmont had a narrow escape. After being rescued she went back to her room and saved her jewels.

California experienced a severe shock of earthquake on the night of the 12th inst. At Napa the State Insane Asylum was shaken, and the inmates panic-stricken. The Masonic Temple was shattered. Stores and dwellings were shaken, and many people rushed into the streets half clad.

Ex-Governor Hobart B. Bigelow of Connecticut died at New Haven last week of Bright's disease. He was 57 years of age. At 17 he was apprenticed to the machinist trade and, although the son of wealthy and even distinguished parents, he rose by his own industry and perseverance to the highest post in the State.

The Eighteenth Annual Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New York State met in New York City last week and discussed many topics of interest. Among other statements made before the Convention was one to the effect that the girls of the metropolis chewed $6,000,000 worth of gum annually. One small town in the State spent $80,000 a year in tobacco and only $8,000 in preaching the Gospel.

Germany will make a reciprocity treaty with this government, it is said, on the basis of an understanding permitting American wheat, flour, potted and canned goods to be entered, free at German ports in return for the free entry in American ports of German beet sugar. This understanding is said to have been hastened by the fact that Germany would have been a serious loser by refusing reciprocity, her own crop of cereals this year being almost a total failure.

TRUST.

"That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation."—Ephesians 1: 12, 13.

BELOVED friends, I would have you notice in this verse the remarkable object which is set before us as the grand design of grace. Observe the singular expression of the apostle—"That we should be to the praise of his glory." Observe that he does not say, that we should sing to the praise of our glorious God, though we will do that; nor that we should suffer to the praise of our glorious God, though we will do that; nor that we should work to his praise, though by grace we will do that; but "that we should be to the praise of his glory." The very being of a believer is to the praise and glory of God. When in the quiet of the garden I have looked upon the in marvelous beauty, and I have realized our Master's words, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these, then I have said to myself, "What do these to the glory of God?" Quickly my heart has answered, "They exist to show forth the glory of their Creator;" by merely standing where they are, they yield praise to the Lord: their very being is worship. Even those flowers which are born to blush unseen of men do not bloom in vain, they do not waste their sweetness, though they pour it on the desert air, for God is in the lone places, and beholds with joy his own handiwork. God is glorified by the being of that which he makes, and especially by the being of that which he has a second time created by the power of his grace, through faith.

Lilies Standing Erect

Beloved, see the importance of that trust which is so constant an item in the purpose of God when he causes us to be to the praise of his glory. Unless we have trusted in Christ we are not living to the praise of God; but when we have come by faith into the place wherein we ought to stand, then is our very being unto the praise of his glory. In Christ our very existence glorifies God, and it is faith which consciously places us in Christ. Concerning that trust, or if you will—for the original bears that translation—that hope, which is so essential to the fulfilment of the purpose of God—concerning that trust I am now about to speak.

I. Our first point will be that trust is The Mark of the Saved.

"That we should be to the praise of his glory who first trusted in Christ, in whom ye also trusted." I care not whether you read it "trusted" or "hoped," the idea will still be the same. Trust in Christ or hope in Christ, is the distinguishing token of God's people. It was the mark of the apostles. It was necessary to an apostle that he should have seen the Lord, for he was to bear personal witness to that which he had seen with his eyes, and looked upon and handled; but this alone was not sufficient, for many saw the Lord and remained in unbelief, enemies of the cross of Christ. These could not have been spostles, since they did not trust in Jesus. The apostles were those who, with an inner as well as an outer eye, had seen the Lord, and had trusted themselves wholly to him as their Leader, Master, Teacher, and Saviour,

This was also the mark of the first converts, among the Jews. These had the honor to be the elder born—these who first trusted in Christ. Some of them had the advantage of having trusted in him looking for the hope of Israel, and earnestly expecting the coming of the Messiah. Before our Lord appeared at the waters of Jordan, and was pointed out by John the Baptist as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," there were hearts that believed in him, and eyes that looked for him. Still, whether they were Jewish believers, looking for his advent, or not, this was the mark of their being truly saved—that they trusted in Jesus, when he was revealed as the Anointed of the Lord.

Before His Advent,

Now, dear friends, this was the mark of those who were first saved by the great Redeemer, and I want you to notice how the Holy Spirit sets them in a class by themselves. He makes a distinction between those who first trusted and those who trusted afterwards, because it is a noteworthy honor to have been among the first that trust Christ. It is a privilege to be led by Jesus, to trust him first in order of time by beginning in your earliest youth. The Lord evidently delights to be found in a high degree of those who seek him early. They come to him first, and he remembers the kindness of their youth, and the promptitude with which they obeyed his call. It is also a great privilege to be called or out of a neighborhood. Peradventure some of you live where there are none who believe in Christ; may the Lord grant you this high favor to be the leader of your household and your district as a believer!

I greatly esteem in my own mind those first believers who were not borne in by the throng of others, but went forward alone. I compare them to the first navigators upon an untried sea; the men who first sailed out of sight of shore, greatly venturing. To be first in perceiving that Jesus of Nazareth was the Anointed of the Lord was no mean thing, for none of the princes of this world had any idea of that great fact. "These were in truth the 'men of light and leading,' the foremost minds of their age, peasants and fishermen though they were. These were the first swallows heralding a glorious summer-tide. These were the first song-birds waking the morning to behold the newly-risen sun. It is a patent of nobility to be numbered with these. I would put a holy ambition into the hearts of those who are young, and others who belong to ungodly families, suggesting to them that they should be among their households those 'who first trust in Christ.'"

Now, as this was the mark of the elder born, the text goes on to tell us that it was the mark of

The Younger Born:

in "whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation." The Ephesians did not see the Christ, they never listened to the melodious tones of his voice, nor looked into his beloved countenance; but they were converted by hearing the report of him. They were brought into salvation afterwards; but still it came to the same thing: they received like precious faith with those who in former days had obtained eternal life. Those to whom I now speak trusted in Christ after they had heard the word of truth.

Note, before I leave this subject, that trust in Christ is of the same nature in all believers. It is not the same in degree, nor in constancy, nor in energy; but yet it is the same faith. "Ye received like precious faith," said Peter. Paul's faith and your faith are the same faith if your faith be a true faith. The faith of Abraham and the faith of a little child who has newly believed in Jesus are

The Same Faith.

A diamond is a diamond whatever its size may be, and so little faith and great faith are of the same essence. Whether it be a grain of mustard-seed or a mountain-moving faith, it is still faith of the operation of God, faith in the same object, and faith working to the same end. Hence John, speaking to his converts, prays, "That ye may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." If thou art a believer, thou hast a right to the same fellowship with God as the Apostle had, thou hast the same perfect cleansing by the precious blood, thou hast the same adoption, the same regeneration, thou standest in the same place of love and acceptance, thou shalt be blessed with the same blessings on earth, and thou shalt enter the same joy at the right hand of God. See, then, dear friends, that trust in Christ is the invariable and infallible mark of the saved ones.

II. Secondly, this trust is

No Empty Notion.

The trust in Christ which saves the soul is no idle sentiment, but a strong, vital, active principle, having a living and a conquering power within it. It is of the operation of the Spirit of God, and hence it is a living and incorruptible seed, that liveth and abideth for ever. This day, if you trust Christ, you rest the whole weight and stress of your soul's affairs upon him. Looking at your sin and your sinfulness, looking at the past, the present, and the future, looking at death and at judgment, you deliberately believe that Christ is equal to every emergency, and you just cast yourself entirely and without reserve upon him to save you, and to keep you saved for ever. No other trust is worth a pin except this. It must be an absolute severance from all reliance upon your past merit, or upon your present resolutions, or upon your future expectations of what you shall be or shall do. You must have done with all other trust if Christ is your confidence. Your motto must be, "Jesus only."

This trust includes obedience to him: we have not trusted him at all unless we are prepared to accept his commands as the rule of our lives.

The Ship is on Fire;

the bales of cotton are pouring forth a black, horrible smoke; passengers and crew are in extreme danger, but a capable captain is in command, and he says to those around him, "If you will behave yourselves, I think I shall be able to effect the escape of you all." Now, if they trust in the captain they will do precisely as he orders. No sailor or engineer will refuse to work the pumps, or to prepare the boats, neither will any passenger disobey rule. In proportion to their confidence in their leader will be the alacrity with which they obey him at once. They believe his orders to be wise, and so they keep to them. Neither their fear nor their rashness will lead them to rush to and fro contrary to his bidding if they have a firm trust in them. When the boats are lowered and are brought one by one to the ship's side, those who are to fill them wait till their turns come, in firm reliance upon the captain's impartiality and prudence. They will get into the boats or they will wait on board, for they consider that his orders are dictated by a better judgment than their own. So far as each man and each woman firmly believes in the superior officer, discipline will be maintained. Do you not see this?

Obedience is the necessary outcome of true and real faith, and there is no trust where there is no obedience. Some of you fancy that you are to trust Christ, and then do what you like. You believe a lie, for such is not the teaching of God's word. The faith which saves is a faith which obeys. We must follow Christ's directions, if we would receive Christ's promises. Trust in Christ implies a yielding up of all that we have and all that we are into Christ's hands. We must be to him as the wax to the seal, or the clay to the potter. There must be an unreserved submission to his supremacy. O thou seeking sinner wilt thou submit to this?

Trust in Christ leads to an open following of him. Trust is not lame, but it walks in the footsteps it relies upon. If the Lord's way be the way of the cross, thou wilt nevertheless follow it, because thou wilt know it to be the right way, since he leads therein. He that is ashamed to confess Christ has good reason to fear that he is not trusting him. How can I be trusting him of whom I am ashamed? If I am not on his side of life, how can I say that he is my confidence? He declares that he that is not with him is against him. How can I trust him and yet be against him? If I refuse to have my name recorded on the muster-roll of his army below, how dare I hope that it is written in the Lamb's book of life above? Wilt thou come out then? Wilt thou come out on his side? If thou wilt, then thou hast saving trust.

This trust will lead a man to labor or to suffer for Christ as need occurs. The true truster considers it to be real gain to lose for Jesus. He reckons that toil unrewarded of men is the best rewarded form of labor when it is accepted of the Lord. It is enough wage to be permitted to serve the Lord Christ. This is faith: this which counts all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, this which hath respect unto a future recompense when the Lord shall come in his kingdom, but looks not for honor among men or any other form of reward here below.

True trust rejoices in the hope which Christ inspires. It looks for his coming and his glory, his reign and his heaven. It is full of hope; that living, lively, life-giving hope which sustains the heart. This trust hath through which light comes into the heart in the darkest hours. It lives and triumphs in the future through trusting the promise of Christ Jesus. If we have such trust as this we shall constantly meet with something whereon to exercise it. God never leaves true trust without work to do. In a thousand fields our trust will be tried ere we shall be able to sheathe the sword and enjoy the triumph. It is in this way that trust in Christ is made by our God to work to the praise of the glory of his grace. "What shall we do," said one, "that we may work the work of God?" meaning thereby a God-like work, a work so great as to bear a heavenly name. Jesus answered, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Jesus Christ whom he hath sent." Dear friend over yonder, you cannot build a row of almshouses to the glory of God, but you can trust Christ with all your heart to the glory of God. You cannot stand up and deliver an eloquent oration to God's praise, but you can pursue a life of faith, and thus praise him.

III Thirdly, this

Trust in Christ is His Due.

There came to me the other day a young man who wished to speak with me about his soul troubles, and he began thus: "Dear sir, I cannot trust Christ." To which I answered, "Have you found out something fresh in his character? Has he ceased to be trustworthy? Pray let me know all about it, for it is a serious matter to me; I have trusted him with everything I have for time and eternity and if he is not fit to be trusted I am in a terrible case." He looked at me, and he said, "I will not say that again, sir, I see I have made a mistake. Truly the Lord Jesus is in every way trustworthy." "Well, then," I said, "Why can not you trust him?" I left him with that unanswerable question. A man is certainly able to trust one whom he regards as trustworthy. My young friend saw that at once, and asked me further: "But may I trust Christ to save me? Am I permitted to

Trust my Soul with Him?"

I said to him, "Is not this the command of the Gospel: Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved?" He said, "So, then, if I trust Christ he will save me?" and I replied, "Certainly he will; he is the Saviour of all them that put their trust in him. He says, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.' It is written, 'He that believeth on him hath everlasting life:' he that trusts in Jesus is saved." He thanked me, and saying that he had found out the secret, he went on his way rejoicing. I told him the Gospel; he received it; and he entered into rest. I hope I may be equally successful with my hearers at this time, Remember next, his work, and especially his death. Here is immovable ground for my claim that you should trust him. Jesus loved men so, as to die for them, how can we doubt his love? I do not know how it is with you, but I lose the power to doubt when I realize Christ crucified. That crown of thorns hedges my mind around, and shuts out mistrust. His five wounds kill my suspicions and my fears. A crucified Saviour is the life of faith, and the death of unbelief. Canst thou stand and view the flowing of the Saviour's precious blood upon the tree and not trust him?

What More can He Do

to prove his sincerity than to die? His life is the mirror of love, but in his death the sun shineth on it with a blaze of glory so that we cannot steadily look into its brightness. Behold how he loved us! Oh, believe thou in the crucified Christ, for this is no more than his right and due.

Besides, he lives, and he has gone up into the glory with the same purpose of grace upon his heart. When men change their places they often change their minds; but he that loved us when he was despised and rejected, loves us now that he is highly exalted. He is not like the chief butler, who forgot in the palace the promise which he made in prison. The love of Calvary is with the Lamb in the midst of the throne. On earth he bleeds, in heaven he pleads. Ye sinners, come and trust the ever-living Christ, for he makes intercession for transgressors! I stand here this morning, and I say to all of you in this house that I claim your confidence in the Lord Jesus. I do not humbly ask for it as a beggar asks for alms: I demand for the Christ of God that you put your trust in him. God has set him forth to be a propitiation for sin, that through faith in his blood every one that believeth in him should be saved.

For Souls.

I have chosen an old theme this morning, and I have been studiously simple in my style, for my heart longs to bring you to trust in Jesus! I have no desire to be thought a fine preacher. I want to save your souls. Oh, that you would believe on the Lord Jesus Christ! If you believe in your heart that God hath raised him from the dead, you shall be saved. This is the way of salvation, and it is very plain. God help you to run in it! Lay aside pride and self-confidence, and trust wholly in Jesus; and this will be better than all tears, and despair, and resolves, and efforts. Fall back into the arms of redeeming love. Lean your whole weight on Jesus. Take your soul to Christ as you take your money to your banker, and leave it in his hands. He will keep it until that day when, at his appearing you shall appear with him in glory.

PROPHETIC QUERIES.

The Answers Given by Mr. Denham Smith to Two Questions at Mildmay Conference.*

QUESTION number one is: "Where will Christ and his Church be at the end of the thousand years when Satan is unloosed for a season?" I always like to admit that where Scripture is silent it is silent. The Word of God never gives us anything simply to feed curiosity. I see no difficulty, because where will Christ and his Church be during the Millennium? If you think of Christ, or his Church, or Abraham, or Daniel, or any of those saints as coming here to occupy simply the earth, you are very much mistaken. They would not be satisfied with that.

The Promise to Daniel

is not that he shall stand in his own lot merely on the earth, or merely in Palestine; the marriage supper of the Lamb takes place in heaven, not on earth. The saints will be risen and glorified, and ascended, and heavenly as to their position with the Lord, and that is where the marriage supper of the Lamb is to be. Then you read that the Bride-city comes down, and does not stay where it is—comes down over the earth—and the song is, "Thou hast redeemed us out of every nation, and kindred, and people, and tongue, and we shall reign forever and ever." The word used is the same as that used in connection with the canopy over Israel, for you remember how the Lord canopied them over. So the New Jerusalem is represented as coming out of heaven from God; and that is the city in which all the saints will dwell, and the Lord will be the light of it, and they will reign during the thousand years. But they will have access to earth.

Like Jacob's Ladder,

there will be maintained a blessed connection, and the glory of the heaven shall shine upon the earth. But the devil is let loose at the end of the thousand years. The Lord's throne is in the heavens, and so the devil will not touch it, but he will touch the devil. Fire comes down out of heaven. That is where the seat of power is. I need not say anything further about it. The Lord and his saints will not be dwelling on the earth, but in the heavens, through the Millennium. His throne will be in the heaven, and his kingdom will rule over all.

The next question is: "Where will our Lord be in the Millennium?"

This is like the former question, and I suppose what I have said will have answered it. To go back, however, when Satan is rampant upon the earth, and sin abounds, it is scarcely to be thought of that the Lord should be dwelling upon the earth. I think it is plain that the Lord will be dwelling in heaven.

The connection between them in the Millennium is represented by Jacob's ladder and the glory on the Holy Mount. Peter, James, and John were taken up, and represent those who, in the day of the glory, will be on the earth. Moses and Elijah were in the glory. Moses represented those who died; Elijah those who never saw death, and you have the blessed Lord in the midst of them. Oh, that will surely be a blessed day, for the whole earth will see the glory, as Peter, James, and John saw it. All the nations will bring their glory and honor unto it; they will adore him, and praise him, and the Lord in that day will reign gloriously. We are told that they shall learn the art of war no more. In the Millennium, during that time there will be no devil, for he will be down in the bottomless pit. And for the redeemed there will be no old nature, for the Lord says, "I will take out your stony heart, and give you a new heart." Whatever evil there may be, it will not be put down by battle, for men will learn the art of war no more.

The Day of Glory,

From heaven the fire will come down, and will devour those who rise up against him. The devil will be laid hold of; and instead of being put into a bottomless pit, where he was during the thousand years of the Millennium, he will go where human nature has gone before Satanic nature. This is a very solemn thought. The Son of Man, when he comes down, lays hold upon the false prophet and the beast, and they are put at once, not into the bottomless pit, but into a lake which burns with brimstone and with fire, which is the second death.

THE RIGHT ROAD.*

Mistakes of Consciences.

THIS holy thing we call conscience may make a mistake. The Spartan boy who stole a fox, and lied about it, did so with a good conscience. He did not know any better.

A good priest who was very useful among the poor fisher-folk of France is shown to have made a mistake. He could sail a boat with any of them; he taught them to be good, nursed them in sickness; when the wild nights of storm came, hung up a lantern to guide boats to his island home; and whenever a corpse came ashore, gave it sacred burial. He was very much loved by the fishermen and their families. One poor child died to whom he thought he had not been faithful through forgetfulness and overwork. His conscience smote him. To punish himself and make himself better, he left his charge and went away to join a society of monks, live in a cell, and never speak to any one. That was what his conscience prompted him to do. Now, if he had known better he would simply have stayed with his people, and tried to do more good by not forgetting anybody.

The Apostle Paul, whose words are in the text you have learned, persecuted Christians with a good conscience when he thought them to be only a sect of Jewish heretics.

Tim's Kit.

It surprised the shiners and newsboys around the post-office the other day to see "Limpy Tim" come among them in a quiet way, and to hear him say,—

"Boys, I want to sell my kit. Here's two brushes, a hull box of blacking, a good stout box, and the outfit goes for two shillin's."

"Goin' away, Tim?" queried one.

"Not 'zactly, boys, but I want a quarter the awfulest kind, just now."

"Goin' on a 'scursion?" asked another.

"Not to-day, but I must have a quarter," he answered.

One of the lads passed over the change and took the kit, and Tim walked straight to the counting-room of a daily paper, put down the money, and said,—

"I guess I kin write it if you'll give me a pencil."

With slow-moving fingers he wrote a death notice. It went into the paper almost as he wrote it, but you may not have seen it. He wrote:

"Died—Litul Ted—of scarlet fever; aged 3 years. Funeral to-morrow, gone up to Hevin; left one brother."

"Was it your brother?" asked the cashier.

Tim tried to brace up, but he couldn't. The big tears came up, his chin quivered, and he pointed to the notice on the counter, and gasped:

"I—I had to sell my kit to do it, b—but he had his arms aroun' my neck when he d—died!"

He hurried away home, but the news went to the boys, and they gathered in a group and talked. Tim had not been home an hour before a barefooted boy left the kit on the doorstep, and in the box was a bouquet of flowers, which had been purchased in the market by pennies contributed by the crowd of ragged but big-hearted urchins.

Truthfulness's Twin-Brother.

Truthfulness has a twin-brother in its inner life. It is honesty. One who speaks the truth will be found to be honest. The two are so nearly alike because they grow out of the same root in our soul. Indeed, we might study honesty as a duty to ourselves. But we shall see before we get through these lessons, that the virtues cannot belong to only one part of morality. What we find to be duty to ourselves, we shall also find to be duty to others. And to be true will ever keep us honest. We have, therefore, been studying truthfulness among the duties to ourselves, and we shall wait until we come to duty to others for the study of honesty.

REFLECTIONS OF A "SHUT-IN."†

"WHY is it that some good men must go down life's last decade with the tottering limbs of a second infancy? Sad, unspeakably sad, is that comment which we have sometimes to make upon one whom the world has honored with its trust in high places: 'He has been a learned man, a wise man, a great man: but now—' So strange a humiliation of a great mind and an heir of God must have something to do with its preparation for an immortal youth. 'Except ye become as little children.' Some may not be able to become that, except through the vale of second childhood. That earthly silence may be the great opportunity preparative to fitness for a service in the coming life, compared with which the grandest service of this life is but infantile. The sleep of the chrysalis is the forerunner of golden glory. If one can but believe that God's plan is made up of such inspiring mysteries! Yet why not? . . . Why should we not believe that God's reasons for things are like him? 'It must be his doing,' as Charles Kingsley said, 'because it is so strange and so painful.' None but an infinite mind could plan some things as they are in the lives of us all, and yet make them come out right in the end."

"Now I Begin to Live."

He was very weak, but his courage was higher than usual. His strong eye looked out longingly for the white fire of the breakers where its first glimpse could be caught from the railroad train. At the breath of the salt air at Portland, where he spent the night, his heart leaped for joy. The wonderful power of the sea wrought upon him, as it always did, an almost startling effect. From the hotel he telegraphed to his daughter in her own home: "Now I begin to live."

It was the last of those thoughtful telegrams, eagerly awaited for now so many years at the crisis of those hard and dangerous journeys.

What indited that message? His own prophetic heart? or the whim of fate? or the Power beyond himself that knew when the patient soul might say to the tyrant body, "Thus far, no further?" Only this we know: That long death-in-life, borne only God ever understood how uncomplainingly, was almost over. In deed and truth he had begun to live.

GOD WITH US.

Remarkable Manifestations of Divine Power at "The Christian Herald's" Midsummer Revival Services—Churches Revived and Souls Saved—Mr. Cannon's Splendid Work.

MIDSUMMER is the season of church vacations in the great centres of population, when all city people who can afford it go to the country. Meantime the churches are deserted. It is a season in which the struggling churches need extra help in order that the work of the Lord may not be impeded, as the devil takes no vacation.

It was with the view of aiding churches and pastors so situated that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last summer commissioned as its representative the well-known Evangelist, James H. Cannon, to labor in this particular field. Mr. Cannon possesses special qualifications for missionary work. His labors during the months of April, May, June and July, 1891, have occasionally been referred to in these columns. Beginning at the Woodstock M. E. Church in uptown New York, of which Rev. R. Pierce is pastor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist found the conditions most auspicious. At nearly all the various meetings, the altar and front seats were crowded with seekers. At one meeting in the Sunday School twenty-five scholars were converted and made confession of Christ. Mr. Cannon's exhortations at the Mission on 3rd Avenue and 167th Street, which is connected with this church, were also blessed to the saving of many souls. At this Mission one of the most promising converts was a little girl of nine—a beautiful and earnest child who a few days afterward brought her mother forward to the altar and herself led her to Jesus and peace and pardon. At almost every meeting requests were received asking for prayers in behalf of the unsaved, many of whom afterward received the blessing of a clean heart. At the close of the Woodstock services, which continued two weeks, thirty-five persons had become ardent Christians, and energetic workers in the cause.

The spiritual outpouring experienced at Woodstock M. E. Church was repeated in a number of other places to which the Evangelist was called by the resident pastors of churches. Hardly a service was without its harvest of souls, and large congregations were greatly moved by the fervor of the addresses, no less than by the clear, melodious Gospel singing of the Evangelist. In all nearly four hundred persons who attended were brought to a sense of saving grace, seeking Jesus as their Redeemer. Among other churches that availed themselves of the assistance of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist was the Bethany M. E. Church, New York, Rev. G. M. Compton, pastor, where Mr. Cannon labored for two weeks, exhorting and conducting prayer and consecration meetings, which were made precious to many souls.

At Bedford Street M. E. Church, New York, which was his next field of usefulness, Evangelist Cannon had many blessed meetings. Hardly an evening passed without its tribute of souls united to the Saviour.

Next the Johnson Street M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. (Rev. F. D. Littlewood, Pastor), claimed the energies of the Evangelist. Here a genuine revival took place, attended by many conversions. At the Asbury M. E. Church, New York, (Rev. J. S. Stone, Pastor), valuable results were accomplished and many members gave their hearts to God.

It has been the aim of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to aid churches seeking help, to an infusion of new spiritual life and energy. If this has been accomplished even to a limited extent, these missionary labors under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have not been in vain.

FRUIT BEARING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 1. John 15: 2; Phil. 1: 9-11; Galatians 5: 22, 23.

VERY practical is the teaching of these Scriptures. Fruit is expected of the vine. It exists for that purpose. It may be of graceful shape; it may give a pleasant shade, but if it brings forth no fruit it is accounted worthless. And it must be the right kind of fruit. Isaiah draws a pathetic picture (5: 4) of a vineyard which in spite of the fertility of the soil and the care and attention of the Owner brought forth only wild grapes. That too was accounted failure and the decree went forth that it should be laid waste. When Jesus said "Ye are the branches," he laid down the law for his kingdom. The branches must bear fruit. It is a solemn warning with a prescribed penalty. He that does not bear fruit will be taken away. The test is a test not of creed but of character. It is confirmed by the Saviour's teachings in other places. The reproach against those on the left hand was, not that they were heterodox, but "I was a hungered and ye gave me no meat. . . . Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me (Matt. 25: 42-45.) The man of one talent took care of his talent, did not waste it, or lose it, rather took especial pains to secure its safety, yet he was condemned. Idleness, indifference, inactivity, barrenness are fatal defects. The man who prides himself on his orthodox creed, who is fond of singing, "Doing is a deadly thing," and who supposes that a life of spiritual meditation and enjoyment is a Christian life, needs to regard himself in the light of a branch and ask himself if he is fulfilling the Lord's will.

What a light this idea sheds on affliction! It is a revelation by One who knew and understood God's methods. Loss of property, uncongenial surroundings, plans thwarted, unjust accusations, physical suffering, petty vexations—all the multitude of troubles which go to make up the burden of life are no longer mysteries. Why the good man suffers and the wicked man escapes, is no longer a difficult problem. Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. That is the object sought. The Lord desires still greater efficiency. It is for the perfecting of character. There is no caprice, no arbitrary infliction about all this suffering. The problem which perplexed Job and which his friends could not solve is explained for us. We are being trained and prepared for better service. The dreary toil over Latin and Greek and Mathematics, which is so sore a trial to the boy, who is longing for the play-ground, is not the same thing at all to him when, as a young man entering the arena of life, he finds himself better equipped for the struggle than his competitors. He understands it then and rejoices in the benefits it has conferred. So in the end will he rejoice who was purged as a branch that he might bring forth more fruit.

The fruit expected from us is of many kinds. The list which the apostle gives in Galatians are fruits of character not of service. But he who has these fruits cannot be lacking in deeds. He has within him the vital force and energy from which deeds come. Being in the vine the divine Spirit, like the sap, nourishes him and he flourishes and bears fruit to life eternal.

WHAT FOUR CAR FARES DID.

A KING'S Daughter, who describes herself as a "working girl," sends to her sisters in the Order, who are readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an incident of her own experience which may be useful to others who, like herself, may be anxious to make the most of the few opportunities of service within their sphere. She says: "There are many of us who wear the silver cross, which means that we are the children of God, and are to do good wherever we are, and whoever we are, yet who being working girls, as I am, wonder what we can do for Christ, whose cross we wear. I will tell you of a very little thing I did, and how I did it, as perhaps some one may be glad of the suggestion, and feel as I was. I bought a hundred tracts and poems for twenty cents, which sum I saved by walking four trips instead of paying a five cent fare each time. I read them very carefully so as to find out whom they would be most likely to help; then I knelt down and asked God's blessing upon them. I put them in my pocket, and as I went to my work I gave away my tracts and poems. When I saw the face of some sad and weary one who seemed desolate and lonely, I gave, 'Jesus, Lover of my soul.' I saw a man eating a frugal dinner on a stoop and noticed how anxious and worried he looked, so I found 'The Lord will provide,' and gave him that. Sometimes I found an opportunity to slip a tract into the lunch-baskets of girls, who, I know, have sad homes, and are having a hard time. I cannot tell you how many faces were brightened by what I got for that twenty cents. The girls did not know who did it, but I know they were glad of it, and I am sure God likes us to do those little things. Then sometimes one can send a letter for two cents to some poor prisoner, or some one in trouble, or some woman who has lost her husband or children and who sees the letter-carrier going to other houses but never coming to hers, because there is no one to write to her now. It does not cost much and it makes someone's life brighter. Then there is something we can do without any cost at all. We can show a smiling face, we can say a kind word, we can give a look of sympathy, or a friendly shake of the hand. We can show our colors in that way and people will know that we wear and bear the cross for Jesus. And we can never let the cross come in our faces nor on our tongues, but always be kind and cheerful; there is more good done that way than some people think."

Our correspondent seems to have rightly called herself a working girl, for the epithet applies to her in another sense than the one she intended. God send the world many more such "working girls"!

OUTLYING SPHERES.

THE Montreal Young Women's Christian Association has added to its work a department essentially Christian and philanthropic, but one not commonly undertaken by such organizations. It is another illustration of the fact that Christian women cannot be together in any work without trying to hold out a helping hand to any who may be heavily burdened on their way through life.

In a report to Faith and Works the Secretary of the Montreal Association announces the establishment of a Day Nursery which appears likely to lead to an effort to establish an orphanage. The Day Nursery frequently shelters forty-one children, who are not only sheltered but instructed. Sometimes the nursery is a temporary home to children whose mothers are ill. In some cases death has left the little ones to be permanently cared for by the Committee. Besides this the Association carries on the regular work with an Employment Bureau, a Cooking and a Sewing School.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR PLATFORM.

THE following seven planks have been drawn up by Dr. Wayland Hoyt, and are published by Dr. F. E. Clark in the Golden Rule, as the platform of the Society:

First and foremost, Personal devotion to our divine Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

Second, Utmost loyalty to their respective denominations on the part of all Christian Endeavor societies.

Third, Steadiest personal love and service for the local church in which a society of Christian Endeavor exists. The church for each local society is the local church with which it is connected.

Fourth, Interdenominational spiritual fellowship among evangelical denominations, so setting forth their spiritual unity in Jesus.

Fifth, Inasmuch as the name "Christian Endeavor," by a marvellous and triumphant trial and history of ten years, has come to mean the definite pledge for the weekly prayer meeting, the monthly consecration service, and the work of the lookout committee, we earnestly urge that, in all Christian fairness, societies which adopt substantially these methods adopt also the name "Christian Endeavor," and that this name be not applied to other methods of work. We believe that Christian Endeavor has earned the exclusive right to its own name and to its own principles and methods.

Sixth, Christian Endeavor interposes no barriers to the denominational control of the young people, and rejoices when denominations suggest special lines of scriptural study, of denominational indoctrination, of denominational missionary activity, local, home, and foreign.

Seventh, Christian Endeavor only desires that its fidelity to Christ and the local church and its opportunity for delightful spiritual fellowship be recognized and preserved.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN THE ARMY.

A GRATIFYING announcement is made by Mr. J. W. Baer, the General Secretary. He says: "Rejoice with me in the organization of a Christian Endeavor society in the United States Army. So far as I know, the society recently reported from Jefferson Barracks, near St. Louis, is the first "soldiers' society. Those who know, claim that our army never has been what it should have been in point of good name; conditions have been against it. Army authorities recognize the importance of many changes, and will make them as rapidly as possible. Cannot the Society assist in solving the problem? It can. Here is an open door for your good literature committee. Enter! And if you address Rev. Orville J. Nave, at Fort Niobrara, Neb., you will reach the corresponding secretary for the corps of U. S. A. chaplains and one who is deeply interested in helping the boys in blue."

A WESTERN SOCIETY.

THE true Christian spirit characterizes a report which we have received from Bro. C. W. Hansen of Fulda, Minn. He writes: "Our Young People's Society has not many members, but they are all consecrated to the work, and are living earnest, hopeful, loving, devoted Christian lives. The meetings are well attended and our members gladly take part in the exercises. The Lord is with us, blessing us greatly. As to our work, we have organized two mission Sabbath Schools, and a Christian Endeavor Society in an adjoining village, and one of our absent members is organizing another Society in the country near here. A great interest is taken in the study of the topic each week, and much good results through it. Once a month we take charge of the public services of our church, these meetings are well attended, and they help to spread the Christian Endeavor idea among the people and thus show to the world that we are in earnest and are active in the work. We believe in the pledge and do not think it implies any too much."

A FLOURISHING LEAGUE.

THE President of the Epworth League at Cape May sends to the Christian Advocate a cheerful report of the Chapter's work during the summer season. He says: "An excellent choir, with a faithful leader and organist, always insures a good musical programme, and every League member that has a specialty is assigned work, whether as a reader, declaimer, singer, or essayist. Recent programmes have been 'An Evening in Art,' 'An Evening with Daniel Webster,' another with Jenny Lind, and another given to Epworth Experience. Twice we have been favored with addresses full of point and power by Mr. E. Halford, the private secretary to the President of the United States. Such musical celebrities as Professor Lacey Baker, Professor Simon Hassler, and Miss Jeanette Halford, sojourning here, enabled us to arrange a concert of unusual merit, which was so appreciated by the audience that they dropped about fifty dollars in our glass vase, standing in the hall of the church, which amount is the nucleus of our new church fund of one thousand dollars that the League means to raise. Meanwhile the devotional work of the Chapter is pushed vigorously, and now that the season is over we are delighted to find that nearly every probationer either has or will join the church as a full member; not a single instance among our young church members has occurred where discipline was necessary; and the spirituality of all the meetings has been maintained at full strength and activity, the class-meetings have been well attended, and the public congregations increased. For the fall and winter months a full and progressive course of Bible study is being arranged, and will be faithfully pursued, and when revival services shall begin Epworth League night will preserve its identity by having the members take special part in the revival meetings."

"YE DID IT."

WAS but a tiny token
Of your love for Christ the Lord;
'Twas but a kind word spoken—
A loving, tender word.
But it touched a heart grown weary
Of its heavy load of sin,
And, no longer sad and dreary,
Has that lost one "entered in."

'Twas but a smile of gladness
That you dropped upon your way;
'It ne'er can banish sadness;
'Twas nothing!" some would say,
But it reached a heart nigh broken
With a sense of deepest grief,
And that seeming tiny token
Was the means that brought relief.

'Twas but a song for Jesus,
His love so true and strong,
So tender and so precious—
A simple little song.
But it smoothed the lonely pillow,
And it calmed the troubled breast,
Of one now o'er the billow,
In the land of endless rest.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

The Birds and Bird-Sellers of the East—Some Very Unique Pets.

A GRAY West African parrot—the feathered pet of the household—chattered a noisy and vociferous welcome to the merry group of children who gathered around his perch the other evening. He is a great favorite, and the vivacity with which he wags his short, crimson tail, fluffs with feathers, and swings on his tiny trapeze, while he articulates his welcome, shows a vivid appreciation of the attentions he receives.

"I remember," said Uncle John, when the screamer had been quieted by the tender of a lump of sugar from Ted, "when in Beyrout several years ago, seeing a bird-vendor in the public square who had songsters to sell. They were of a breed I had never seen before, and I was curious to know about them. He had the birds in a large cage of willows, woven together after a rude fashion and this he carried slung over his shoulder carelessly. The old man held in his withered fingers the ends of the cord by which the cage was slung, and when he found a customer, the cord was slackened from his turban and the birds, chirping and cooing, lowered to the ground. They were a species of pigeon, small in size and pretty to look at but far from melodious."

"They couldn't sing like my canary, could they, Uncle?" asked Millie.

"They had only a few notes, but those were very pure and tender. There was no song that I could discover. But they have in the East birds that sing charmingly, not unlike the chaffinch and the Southern oriole. You know the Orientals love birds and in some of the older countries they are objects of veneration."

"Do they worship parrots, too?" inquired one of the children.

"Not that I ever heard of. The ladies in Arabia and Turkey have them as home pets and very pretty they are too, some of them, with their flashing green and gold. But they are not found in the temples nor on the inscriptions upon the tombs of Egypt and Arabia. In the former country almost every conceivable kind of winged creature has been worshipped: the long-necked, slender-legged ibis, sacred to the Nile, whose wise-looking face reminds you of the hoary pyramids; the dove, the hawk, the owl, the bat and several others. Even the swallow and the raven have not been forgotten. This bird-worship was mingled with the worship of other animals—elephants, apes, crocodiles, serpents, dogs, frogs, rams, bulls, jackals and even beetles."

"The Scarabæus was the sign of the sacred beetle, was it not?" Tom interrogated.

"The Scarabæus is a beetle of a peculiar species and the Egyptians held it in the highest reverence. They carved its image on rings and necklaces and even on the crowns of their Pharaohs. They worshipped the cat, too, you know."

"What!" exclaimed the children in surprise.

"Yes," continued Uncle, smiling at their astonishment. "Even Pussy did not escape adoration. In old Memphis and Thebes and other cities the cat was held sacred and colonies of them were nourished and cared for by the citizens. This cat-worship has long since disappeared, although a trace of it is still to be found in the respect Egyptians entertain for felines. In some cities of the East it is not unusual to see some old fellow, perched on the camel-back, his arms clasp a dozen or more cats, cats sitting on his shoulders, lying across his neck and even stretching their soft skins over the folds of his turban or across his tawny breast. He is called the 'cat-father' and his charges are fed by the contributions of the people, who apply to him when they need a cat.

"The turtle-dove and pigeon seller, like the 'cat-father,' is a public character. His birds are liked everywhere and find ready sale. They may be bought to keep as household pets, or to use in the temple. You remember the Bible tells us that in Palestine, pigeons were permitted to be used by the poor in the sacrifice. They are as plentiful in the fields and woods as are the privileged bats in the shadowy nooks of the temples and the gloomy corridors of the pyramids, where they were believed to be under the protection of the gods. Jeremiah (5:27) mentions how these pigeons were caught by means of a cage full of decoys. Bird cages are also mentioned in Job 41:5 and Revelations 18:2. You should look up and read those passages at your leisure, children. Some of those ancient cages were dome-shaped like these you see in our American stores, while others were woven in more fantastic forms of osier or bamboo. Some of the prettiest of all are the cages I have seen in Turkish houses, where every woman in the family seems to have a feathered pet of her own."

At this point, the gray parrot gave a shrill reminder of his presence, and Tom rewarded his patience with another lump of sugar. He fluttered the feathers of his ashy-gray tail, and, twisting his head cunningly on one side, looked the traveller squarely in the eye as though he had understood every word of the narrative.

An Excellent Recipe for Happy Homes.

HUSBANDS, says a quaint old writer, are like peaches; they will not keep the year around unless they are well preserved. First, you must select your husband carefully. He might look very tempting and mellow in the market, but if he is too old he will not stand the test of the preserving process, but will expose his hard, stony heart. Husbands grown in the tropics of pleasure look very fine, but are usually insipid. The home-grown are the best. Select your husband, if possible, from a family tree growing on the sunny side of a church. You will be sure he is sound at heart. Unsound husbands, like unsound peaches, often have to be sorrowfully cast away. Having selected your husband, you should have a clear, steady, cheery fire of love. Your preserving kettle must be bright and clean. Husbands, like peaches, look black if this is unclean. Give him plenty of sweetness. Much sugar is needed. Vinegar is never used in sweet preserves. If you think he demands a little spice, use it with caution. Do not keep stirring him up, neither should you keep poking him with sharp points to see if he is done; it will spoil his looks. If the above recipe is followed, and you have selected the right sort of a husband, you will find his love well preserved.

Small Things Important.

"I REMEMBER," writes Mr. Moody, "hearing of a person who was always trying to do some great thing for the Lord, and because he could not do a great thing, he never did anything. There are a great many who would be willing to do great things if they could come up and have their names heralded through the press. I heard of a man's dream in which he imagined that when he died he was taken by the angels to a beautiful temple. After admiring it for a time he discovered that one stone was missing. All finished, but that one little stone left out. He said to the angel:

"Why is this stone left out?"

"The angel replied, 'That was left out for you, but you wanted to do great things, and so there was no room left for you.'

"He was startled and awoke, and resolved that he would become a worker for God; and that man always worked faithfully after that."

CHOOSING BABY'S NAME.

THE E comes a time when the naming of a baby is a matter of the greatest moment in the little household. In our own land the name selected is generally that of some dear relative or friend, and not infrequently that of one of the parents. In some parts of Europe certain names are hereditary in families, and have been handed down for hundreds of years. In the Orient, with some races, the tribe itself or its surroundings furnishes the suggestion; physique, complexion, temper, season, all being elements to be considered. Miss Sadie L. Packard, writing on this subject recently, contributes some interesting researches in baptismal literature. A Hindoo baby, she tells us, is named when it is twelve days old, and usually by the mother. Sometimes the father wishes for another name than that selected by the mother; in that case two lamps are placed over the two names, and the name over which the lamp burns the brightest is the one given to the child. In Egypt the parents choose a name for their baby by lighting three wax candles; to each of these they give a name, one of the three always belonging to some deified personage. The candle that burns the longest bestows the name upon the baby. The Mohammedans often write desirable names on five slips of paper, and these they place in the Koran. The name upon the first slip drawn out is given to the child. The children of the Ainos, a people living in northern Japan, do not receive their names until they are five years old. It is the father who then chooses the name by which the child is afterwards called.

The Chinese give their boy babies a name in addition to their surnames, and they must call themselves by these names until they are twenty years old. At that age the father gives his son a new name.

The Chinese care so little for their girl babies that they do not give them a baby name, but just call them by numbers. Indeed, a Chinese father may have a boy and half a dozen daughters, but when asked how many children he has, he will almost invariably answer, "One," the girl babies being ignored.

"There is one thing," says a thoughtful writer, "that is well for every parent to bear in mind—namely, that probably a large proportion of the evil we find in our children is but the continuation or increase of our own faults, unheeded, while they were our own, but which we—

Now despise,
For our baby took them
With our hair and eyes.

Vanity a Snare.

NOR the qualities that shine brilliantly on the surface are the best, but those that stand the test of time. Here is what Anna Katherine Green, a famous authoress and a woman with a wide knowledge of the world, writes on the snare of vanity. "Of the beautiful women that I have known, but few have attained superiority of any kind. In marriage they have frequently made failures; why, I do not know, unless the possession of great loveliness is incompatible with the possession of an equal amount of good judgment. So much is expected by the woman accustomed to admiration that she plays and palters with her fate till the crooked stick is all that is left her. This we see exemplified again and again. While the earnest, lofty, sweet-smiling woman of the pale hair and doubtful line of nose has, perhaps, one whose worth she has time to recognize, an acknowledged beauty will find herself surrounded by a crowd of showy egotists, whose admiration so dazes and bewilders her that she is sometimes tempted to bestow herself upon the most importunate one in order to end the unseemly struggle. Then the incentive to education and to cultivation of one's especial powers is lacking.

"Forgetting that the triumphs which have made a holiday of youth must lessen with the years, many a one neglects that training of the mind which gives to her who is poor in all else an endless storehouse of wealth from which she can hope to produce treasures for her own delectation and that of those about her, long after the fitful bloom on her handsome sister's cheek has faded with the roses of departed summer.

I count my household treasures heaven-born;
The richness of thy gift I could not scorn;
But sometimes which no mortal eye can see Touches my soul, and I cry out for thee.

DOWN THE NILE.

"Do not worry yourself, my friend," said Seti to him in a low voice; "gather what you can, and add this coin to make the weight good. What has been lost for my sake shall not be loss to you."

The Jew glanced at the coin that had been slipped into his hand, and, catching the gleam of gold, hurried it dexterously to his pouch, at the same time exclaiming.

"May all the patriarchs . . . oh, my beautiful feathers for which I paid . . . may Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob . . . ah, what will become of me!"

And so he went on groping and exclaiming and stuffing handful after handful of his recovered property into his bag amid the merriment of the crowd.

Making a sign to the two friends to follow, the Egyptian led the way to another part of the vessel free from people, where was a single seat. On this he seated himself.

"I take the privilege of age," said he, "and I am by no means sure but that age gives me the only advantage I have over you. I suspect that the eyes of Seti, though aged, have made a discovery."

The two friends glanced inquiringly at each other, but said nothing. They were now moving along the canal that connected the Nile with Lake Mareotis; and for some time they silently watched the agricultural operations and the ever-increasing number of people and dwellings on either bank. At length, emerging into the lake, they saw in the distance the crowded shipping and towers of the city of Alexandria.

Seti roused himself from the mood of intense thoughtfulness, into which he had fallen, and asked:

"Are you acquainted with Alexandria?"

Cimon answered: "With the city, well; with the people of the city, not at all. A generation has passed since I was here."

"Excuse one further question," continued the Egyptian. "Do you stay long in the city?"

"That depends on circumstances," replied Cimon; "but probably our affairs will keep us here for some time."

"This young man has to-day made an enemy, and a powerful one; no less a person than the dissipated son of Flaccus, the Governor of Egypt. But he has also found a friend; and if at any time you should need such aid, in whatever affairs you have in hand, as can be given by a native of the country, and by one well acquainted with things and persons here and not altogether without influence, ask a the Serapeum (a) for the priest Seti, and you will find that I have not forgotten to-day. Do you believe in faces?" looking at Aleph.

"In some faces, as interpreted by circumstances, I do certainly," replied the young man.

"And so do I, at least so far as you are concerned," said the Egyptian; "and it is largely because I do so that I now say what I do. There are two men in Alexandria with whom you should have as little dealing as possible. One is Flaccus, the Roman; the other is Malus, the Jew. The one is violent, the other is crafty, and both are wicked and powerful. Avoid them, if possible; but if it is not possible, then remember Seti, the Egyptian. It is true—what the proverb says, that in this world the worst men often occupy the best places."

As the vessel approached the quay, Seti continued: "I think that, contrary to my expectation, I will ask one more question before we part. Of what faith are you? All sorts are found here; also multitudes with no faith at all. Where do you stand?" looking at Cimon.

"Do you hold with your fathers?"

"With my father," said the Greek; "but not with my fathers. I follow not Zeus, but Jehovah; not the oracles of Delphi and Dodona, but those of the Hebrew prophets. This young man the same."

a. The temple of Serapis, the Egyptian bull-god.

"It is as I supposed," said the old man, after a moment adding, as if to himself, "and it is well. Zeus, Jupiter, Amun Re, and Jehovah, rightly understood, are the same."

Giving them his hand, he stepped ashore, and disappeared in the crowd. Runners from the various khans now came noisily aboard and fought for the customers, as they do now, and have done from time out of mind. To one of these troublesome fellows Cimon delivered certain packages, and then, with his young companion, followed them. In passing the spot where they had left the Roman, they found that he had disappeared. Who had set him free? No matter; he is gone. We hope they have seen the last of him. We hope that returning soberness has made the man so ashamed of himself that hereafter he will carefully keep out of view. But we have our fears. The appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober is not always a success. Besides, Philip was not a Roman.

CHAPTER II.

THE CARAVANSARY.

THE khan to which our two friends were conducted was not far from the landing. It was the chief point, in that part of the city, of arrival and departure for commercial people; and, as evening was now near, the great court within was bustling and picturesque with arrivals. Donkeys were being led through it to stables in the rear, camels were being unloaded, horsemen were dismounting; it was a very Babel of sounds; of costumes, and of movements.

"Is Nathan still the keeper of this khan?" inquired Cimon of their guide, as they were being shown to their quarters.

"He is," said the man; "but he is now out of the city. Do you wish to see his assistant? The master himself will not be at home for, perhaps, some days."

Cimon answered in the negative. Following their guide and parcels into a small sleeping-room, with an ante-room opening on the piazza which surrounded the court, and directing that a simple meal should be sent to them in the evening, they busied themselves for a while in arranging matters for the night. Then they went out on the cooler piazza, and seated themselves on a bench.

"This adventure with the Roman seems unfortunate," said Cimon thoughtfully. "Unless matters have much changed since I was here, the ill-will of any Roman official is not to be coveted; while that of the Roman governor looks like quite a serious matter to people on such an errand as ours."

"My interference, I suppose," said Aleph, "would hardly be considered prudent by most people; but I cannot but think that there is something better than prudence. Shall we never allow our hearts to speak and act without stopping to consider how our interests will be affected? Safety gained in that way seems to me hardly worth the having."

"I think you are right," said the other. "I am far from finding fault with what you have done. Under like circumstances I would have you do it again. Our first thought, no doubt, should be, What is highest and worthiest? If that is not prudence, it is something vastly better. But it is prudence, on the whole; for it will never do for a man to despise himself and offend heaven. God governs. But we must wait for him. A cloud is not always a calamity. A rough wind may help one toward the harbor sought. I know that these are your father's views, and that he would be unwilling to have his son sacrifice even magnanimity to any appearance of present advantage."

"Have you any idea who Seti is?" inquired the young man after a moment.

"I have been trying," answered the other, "to find in my memory something about him. I know that when I was here, the Egyptians as well as the Jews had an official head or alabarch (b) of their own nation, who was the organ of communication between them and the Roman authorities. My impression is that the Egyptian alabarch was of Pharaonic family and a priest of the Serapeum. It may be that Seti is the man. I hope he is."

"I confess," said Aleph, "that the man has quite taken possession of me. It seems to me that I would be willing to venture almost anything on his thorough uprightness and even grandeur of character, although I have known him but such a short time. Did you notice what an aspect he turned on the Roman just after the blow? Had not the fellow been besotted, the surprised majesty of that look alone would have quelled him. But how is it possible for such a man to be a worshipper of brutes, and even act as their priest?"

"That is not a question easily answered," replied the Greek. "But probably Seti, like all superior Egyptian priests from time immemorial, believes in a religion for the few and another religion for the many. The doctrine of One God to be worshipped without sensible figures is for the few elect who are prepared for it; the lower classes in general are not prepared for it, but need to have the various divine attributes shadowed out to them in sensible forms; and as no forms that man can make are equal to even the familiar living creatures with their wonderful mysteries of internal structure, these are offered to assist the feeble thought of feeble men. Of course, this is all wrong; but it is a wrong imbedded in the traditions and prejudices of ages, and so not easily escaped from. Jehovah makes allowances for such people, whether their names be Socrates and Plato or Zoroaster and Seti. Aristotle says that some of our species have gold blended in their composition from the very beginning. Seti seems to me one of these."

By this time the sun was below the west side of the khan, and the open court was quite in the shade. This brought out into it and the surrounding piazzas all the guests. It was a motley sight to see as well as to hear. Almost every nation seemed represented, almost every style of features and costume. There were Romans, Greeks, Phenicians, Egyptians, Persians, Arabs, and even a sprinkling of natives from Gaul, Spain, and other places. Such a variety of faces, dress, and, when one listened attentively of speech! A drag-net of all seas was Nathan's khan.

Aleph was all eyes and ears. The scene was full of novelty and interest to him. At length, turning to his companion, he said:

"This scene reminds me of what I have often heard you and my father say."

"And what is that?" asked Cimon. "Your father, at least, is wont to say wise things beyond any man I ever knew."

"That, wide as is the variety of religious beliefs among men, they believe alike in certain main respects. What differences among the faces before us as to color, size, proportion of parts, expression; and yet they are all faces, all human faces, all faces having the same general plan of structure and location of the various organs."

"Yes," added the elder; "Homines diversi sed homines, (c) as said a Roman before you. And see how various the costume; and yet it is all clothing,—all clothing that recognizes the warm climate, the season of the year, and to a certain extent the time of day and the convenience of travellers."

"And you might add," continued the young man, after a moment of close listening, "that it is just so with the various articulate sounds that come to us. While they differ in tone, in time, in syntax, in dialect, they are all speech, all articulate speech, and, for the most part, speech so much of the Greek pattern as to be intelligible to nearly all of us."

"Yes," said Cimon, "and I suppose that it is very much so with the religious beliefs of these people. Though their creeds differ much themselves, they are alike in many most important particulars. They all recognize a realm of spiritual beings superior to man, a Supreme Deity, his concern in human affairs, messages from him, our responsibility to him, a future state of rewards and punishments, and the main principles of good morals. There may be some exceptions; for these, I understand, are skeptical times in the Roman world. Almost everything is called in question among the philosophers, even the fact that there is something to be called in question; though it is found hard to get men to question that the Romans are masters, that Tiberius reigns, and that Alexandria is the greatest emporium in the world. But the vagaries of the schools make but little impression on the people at large. They never have done so. The more fundamental beliefs have kept a firm hold on all nations and ages. A little pool will show the heavens as well as the ocean. This khan is a little pool; and at the bottom of it, amid many wrinkles and clouds, one can discover

c. Man, though diverse, yet man.

many of the larger stars of religious truth which have shone on the world from the beginning."

"And how do you account for these universal beliefs?" asked Aleph.

"It seems to me that they came from a Divine revelation to the first fathers of the race, and that they were carried forth with them as they gradually dispersed from their original seats, and that they took root so deeply in the needs and reasons of men that no evil circumstances have been able to remove them. It seems to me that as all the routes of trade in our day naturally converge on Alexandria, so the natural highways of thought and need all over the world converge on these fundamental truths."

"No doubt you also think it reasonable to believe that Deity, who made the deposits with the race, has been personally active to preserve it, as a broad ground for responsibility and further enlightenment? In addition to a mighty undertow in human nature itself toward these fundamental truths, there are winds and currents of external circumstance setting in the same direction by the personal agency of the Most High."

"Just so. But look at those men!"

The two persons pointed at had been sitting not far away in the open court, conversing in a low tone. By degrees their conversation had become more animated and loud, until now they were earnestly gesturing and talking so as to be distinctly understood at a distance. It seemed that one of the disputants was a Phenician, and was endeavoring to settle an account of long standing with an Alexandrian dealer in Tyrian dyes, to whom these goods had from time to time been consigned. This dealer claimed that several of the consignments had been short in both quantity and quality; and so offered about half the regular price for the whole lot.

The other protested, called Baal and Ash-taroath to witness that his claim was just; said that he had trusted for so long and for so much, that if his accounts were not now allowed, he would be ruined. He had arrived from Sidon some days before, expressly for the purpose of trying to get a settlement, but had till now been unable to get even an interview with the dealer, who was always too busy to see him, but had at last agreed to have his agent meet him at the khan. This was the meeting.

The Phenician had at first quietly represented the hardships of his case with some hope of softening the agent, but, growing desperate, he hotly rose from his seat and exclaimed in a voice that was almost a wail:

"I shall be undone,—quite undone! Have you no mercy?"

"Not much," said the other, "for some people."

"Thou flint! Before all the gods my claim is just. What shall I do? My children will starve."

"Let them. The fewer such brats the better. Business is business. Take what I offer or nothing. You have only yourself to blame; you shouldn't cheat so."

"Cheat!" exclaimed the Phenician in a transport of wrath that for the moment drank up his tears like a hot blast from the desert. "Cheat! you Cretan rascal! You are a pretty fellow to advise against cheating; you who, I verily believe, never did anything else; nor your fathers either, for that matter. Who does not know what the honesty of a Cretan is worth?"

By this time many had gathered around. Turning to them, the Phenician besought their help to make his debtor do him justice.

"Why not go to the judge?" said a bystander.

"Ah, my friend, I have been imprudent. I cannot prove that my goods were all right; for I was so careless that I took it for granted that I was dealing with an honest man, and so neglected to have them examined and registered at Sidon. Besides, if I had done this, how could I know but what the packages had been tampered with on their way here? I can not swear that they came into this man's hands in as good condition as they were when they left mine. But he could swear to anything."

Why should't he? He told me a little while ago, while we were opening our conference with some general talk, that he did not believe in any God or hereafter; in short he had no religion of any sort. What is to keep such a man from wronging his neighbor out of his dues when it can be done safely?"

HEART-SINGING.

DO you hear that clear and distinct voice, singing above all others, and taking the lead?" said a person to me one day. "Yes, indeed I do, and I know whose it is too. I will tell you about her afterwards." When the meeting was over, the same person came up to me for the promised information about the sweet singer.

"Her singing is wonderful," I said, "and she is a person who seldom speaks without winning souls for Jesus. I will tell you how she began to sing. As she had such a clear voice for speaking, I said to her upon one occasion, 'I wonder you do not sing.' 'That is impossible, she replied, 'I have no voice for singing.'"

"Nay," I said, "excuse me, you have a very clear and melodious voice, which could easily be used for singing." She replied, "No, indeed, I have taken a great many lessons, and I find it is useless for me to attempt that. I must content myself with speaking." I answered, "Yes, you have reason to be content with speaking; but it seems to me, that the same faith in God which has enabled you to do the one, would enable you to do the other." "I would give anything to sing," she added.

"Dear friend," I replied, "this talent is not to be bought; but you may have it as a gift. Look how many verses there are in the Psalms and the Prophets which command us to sing. Mind, sing does not mean to shout, or scream, or speak, but to sing. What God commands he can enable us to do." "No," she said, "I have tried, and I have prayed about it too."

"Listen to me," I said. "My voice is by no means clear like yours, but I can sing in a way, though not artistically or scientifically, still I can and do sing enough for my purpose in God's work. I will tell you how I began. Like you, I first took lessons in singing, for I wanted very much to be able to raise a tune now and then for my meetings. After I had attended some classes, and paid several guineas, I asked the master whether he thought I was getting on. He replied, 'No, I do not think you are getting on at all; I don't believe you will ever sing—you have no voice.'"

"Why did you not think of this before?" I asked. "Oh," said the master, 'if you like to come to me for lessons, it is not for me to send you away.' So I paid off this man, and came home in despair. Yet I could not give up my cherished idea of singing. I then went to the Lord, and said, 'Lord, thou dost command thy children to sing; teach me to do so, if it is only one tune.' Before the week was ended I could sing a long metre and a common one. I thanked the Lord, and went on my way rejoicing, and singing too."

"Several years after this, a lady came forward, who was a great singer. She knew my story, and was standing by me when I gave out a hymn in long metre. Instead of asking her to lead, I quite unconsciously began myself. She at once joined in the singing, at the same time moving her hand. This made me smile, for I knew what she meant, so I stopped, and she took the hymn from me, and pitched it in a higher and more correct key. She afterwards said to me, 'Could not the Lord teach you twenty tunes as easily as two?'"

"Thank you for the hint," I said, "and accordingly I prayed for more tunes. Now I can sing, in my way, almost any hymn tune, and thank God for it."

My young friend said, "I am sure I shall never be able to do that. I expect I am too shy."

"Yes," I said, "and the Lord can take away that shyness or timidity too, as easily as he can make the dumb speak; trust him. I will not ask you to begin here and now to sing; but ask the Lord to teach you, and trust him." "Very well," she said, "I will."

A short time after this, as I stood by her at a meeting, I heard her talking the words of a hymn, though she was keeping time with the tune. This convinced me that she had prayed, and was believing in the answer which was to come. I said to her, "I heard you talking that hymn; you should sing, child, not from your lips and between your teeth, but open your mouth and sing from the throat. The singing voice comes from the throat. Birds may twitter from their beaks, but their song comes from a full throat." The criticism and instruction were effectual, and my young friend found her voice. She very soon learned how to use it aright, and with a little practice was able to give melodious expression to the fulness of her heart.

I am sure that Satan knows the importance of singing, and does what he can to hinder believers.

A SHOEMAKER REPROVED.

WOLTERS DORF once gave an effective reproof to a Christian shoemaker in Berlin who was much given to condemning men of weaker faith and smaller spiritual growth than his own. He had attained to a high degree of spiritual insight after many temptations and conflicts. Now this man imagined that only such as himself were genuine believers, and that others were but half Christians. Spiritual pride and uncharitableness continually increased in his heart. One day Woltersdorf sent for him, and had himself measured for a pair of boots. He then ordered a pair for his son, who was fourteen years old. Then the shoemaker consequently wanted to take his measure also. But the father refused with the words, "There is no need of it; make his boots on my last." And when the shoemaker declared that this would not do, if his boots were to fit, Woltersdorf looked seriously at him, and said, "So it will not do. You insist on making each a pair to fit each person, and yet you want the Lord to fashion all Christians on the same last. That, too, will not do." The shoemaker was startled, but saw the point Woltersdorf intended to convey. He meditated upon it and realizing that so the natures of men, physically and mentally differed from each other some were entitled to more consideration and a more lenient judgment than others.

A GRIP ON A ROPE.

ELEAZAR's grasp on his sword, we are told (II. Samuel 23: 10), was so firm and his fight so persistent that "his hand clave to the sword." A modern illustration of such a grip was cited by a ship's captain who spoke in a mission in Boston, Mass., recently: "A few years ago," said he, "I was sailing by the island of Cuba, when the cry ran through the ship, 'Man overboard!' It was impossible to put on the helm of the ship, but I instantly seized a rope and threw it over the ship's stern, crying out to the man to seize it as for his life. The sailor caught the rope just as the ship was passing. I immediately took another rope, and making a slip noose to it, attached it to the other, and slid it down to the struggling sailor, and directed him to pass it over his shoulders and under his arms, and he would be drawn on board. He was rescued; but he had grasped the rope with such firmness, with such a death-grip, that it took hours before his hold relaxed, and his hand could be separated from it. With such eagerness, indeed, had he clutched the object that was to save him that the rope became imbedded in the flesh of his hands." Would that everyone gripped with like tenacity the rope of salvation proffered to them by Christ from heaven!

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. E. H. Westerly, R. I. Is it Scriptural for ministers of the Gospel to read their sermons?

See answer to Rev. H. P. in No. 41 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Medaugh, New York City. What is taught at Cooper Institute?

The general educational branches are taught in Cooper Institute, New York, including almost every department to be found in the regular schools. Besides, there are classes for instruction in special studies, art, shorthand, music, chemistry, etc.

Subscriber, Corsica, Jefferson Co., Pa. Do we honor the holy Sabbath when we call it by the heathen name "Sunday"? Is Sunday found in the Bible, or did Christ ever call the Sabbath Sunday?

The name Sunday was adopted by the first Christians from the Roman Calendar (Dies Solis or Day of the Sun.) Christians interpret the name, not as the heathens did, but as the day of the Sun of Righteousness. There would therefore appear to be no dishonor to the Sabbath, (which was the old Jewish appellation) in designating it as Sunday, as Christians now universally do.

Subscriber, Philadelphia. What should be done with an elder in a Presbyterian Church who goes to church, gets angry at the Sunday School Teachers, and takes the Sacrament in vain; plays croquet and takes photographs on Sunday? Is it right for those striving to lead Christian lives to have to submit to such an example?

If such a one, after repeated admonition, still prove incorrigible, and especially if his course offend the brethren in the way you suggest, the proper remedy is to apply the methods suggested in the Book of Discipline.

J. E. W., Mars Hill, N. C. Is it wrong for a young minister, who is fond of baseball, to engage in match games of ball with neighborhood teams, the minister not being a pastor but a teacher?

It is not becoming in one who has taken up the holy calling of a teacher of the Gospel to personally indulge in such sports, although he may approve them in others. There are abundant means of exercise and recreation without adopting those that might, even in a remote sense, detract from the dignity and respect of the office of pastor or teacher.

William Mood, Saltsburg, Indiana Co., Pa. What are the doctrines of the Swedenborgians? 2. What do theologians conclude about the acceptance of the Bible story of the translation of Enoch?

1. Emanuel Swedenborg maintained that a secondary or spiritual sense runs through all the books given by divine dictation and that these books are written according to a uniform law of "correspondence" or "universal analogy" between spiritual and natural things. He rejected the doctrine of the Trinity. He held that God opened to the sight of his servants the spiritual world and granted them the privilege of conversing with spirits and angels. This was known as the "Transcendental Philosophy." In other respects the doctrines differed little from those of the Christian denominations. 2. Christian commentators ancient and modern accept the Bible statement that Enoch by faith was translated and did not see death. Josephus records the same conclusion. This subject has at various times been a source of much speculation among philosophic writers.

John E. Duxbury, Northfield, Mass. In Mark 10:11, 12, we find these words of our Saviour: "Whoever shall put away his wife and marry another committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband and be married to another, she committeth adultery." Do Christian ministers marry such as are thus put away and are they justified in so doing?

A parallel passage to the one you quote is found in Matt 5:32, and another in Matt. 19:9. An exception to the law is made in these passages which neither Mark nor Luke reports. That Christ made the exception cannot be doubted, as Matthew would not otherwise have inserted it though the other two evangelists might have omitted it. Eminent scholars have contended that another exception—that of abandonment—is made by the Apostle Paul (1. Cor. 7:10-15) that, however, has been disputed. A Christian minister is clearly justified in marrying a divorced person if that person has obtained a divorce on the ground of the adultery of the other party to the former marriage. If the divorce has been obtained on other grounds, such as incompatibility of temper or trivial causes, then the minister who desires to follow the literal teaching of the Bible will decline to perform the marriage ceremony. The parties should have a civil marriage. They cannot expect the blessing of the Church on a union which the Bible stigmatizes as adulterous.

W. Judson Farley, Valley, N. J. 1. Who did Cain and Abel marry? Where does the Bible speak of who they married? 2. Did Abel's wife marry after Abel's death? I once read a history which said that Cain and Abel married their sisters Susanna and Martha, but cannot find any confirmation of it in the Bible.

Eastern tradition says that Cain and Abel each had twin sisters and that Adam desired to give Abel's sister to Cain and Cain's to Abel in marriage, but Cain preferred his own sister. Adam referred the matter to divine arbitration and the two brothers offered sacrifices. Abel's alone being accepted, Cain resolved to take his brother's life. These and similar traditions are unconfirmed and not even mentioned in the Scriptures. Cain afterward went into the land of Nod and there took a wife. (Genesis 4:16, 17.)

Charles Richards, Leoti, Kan. 1. What countries have not yet been reached by the Gospel? 2. What are the qualifications for a missionary?

1. Probably the only part of the known world where the Gospel has not yet been preached is the centre of Africa. Corea was the latest to hear the Gospel. 2. A practical answer would be supplied on writing to any one of the Mission Training Schools of Yale College, Boston University, Syracuse University, or the different theological seminaries. The education and training for missionary work abroad is a special one, since such an education is designed to procure the means and open ways of access to the people and opportunities of preaching to them. The training necessarily differs according to the nature and location of the work to be undertaken.

Young Subscriber, Des Moines, Iowa. If a soldier engaged in battle for his country kills an enemy, is it to be considered as murder? 2. Why are retail drug stores open on Sunday? 3. Where did the Welsh nation spring from?

1. All nations, including those avowedly Christian, justify a soldier who slays the enemy of his country in battle, and honor him as a hero. Such deeds in righteous warfare are not accounted as sin. (See Joshua 8:1, 2, and 18, 19.) 2. Because, especially in large communities, they are a public necessity in cases of sudden sickness. 3. The earliest reliable historical accounts mention the Brythoni as inhabiting Wales before the arrival of the Romans. They were not called Welsh until the 5th, or 6th, century. Tradition says the first settlers in Wales came from ancient Troy, but this is probably fiction. The name they bore when the Roman general Agricola conquered the country was Cymri, meaning land-holders in common.

J. H. W., New York. Will you kindly inform me where I can find the correct title of a poem, set to music, which begins like this:

The Master walked in his garden among the lilies so fair,
Their heads were sadly drooping for want of water and care
Close by his side in the pathway all broken in pieces small.

Was an earthen vessel lying; it seemed no use at all.
Probably some of our readers may be able to furnish this information.

Ed. Cramp, Erie, Pa. If Noah and his family were all that were saved from the flood, (Gen. 6:17, and 7:22), where did the colored race originate? Why are the latter called the descendants of Ham? What was embodied in the curse pronounced by Noah against Ham? (Gen. 9:25.)

The name Ham signifies swarthy or sun-burnt and Noah's youngest son was undoubtedly so named prophetically as the progenitor of the sunburnt Egyptians and Cushites and all the dark-skinned servile races who are to-day designated sons of Ham. Ham was married when the Deluge occurred and with his wife and four sons, Cush, Mizraim, Phut and Canaan, was saved from general destruction. It is a notable fact that Noah did not curse Ham for his offense (see Gen. 9:25), but he cursed Canaan the youngest son of Ham, and prayed that he might be the slave of Shem and Japheth and their descendants. The punishment involved in the curse was perpetual servitude.

WHEN children gather in delight,
To fill the air with bubbles bright,
Of this let parents all be sure—
The soap they use is good and pure,
For, common grease in some we find
With evil mixtures well combined
That soon with burning sores will tell
On lips and tongue, and gums as well.

Let Ivory Soap, that's made with care
Of purest oils and essence rare,
Be used by those who bubbles blow
And greatest pleasure will they know,
For brighter bubbles will be seen
Where soap is pure and fresh and clean,
While not a fear need cross the mind
Of bad results of any kind.

A LIFE SAVED BY A VERSE.

FROM a missionary in Japan comes a narrative of a providential interposition which probably prevented the commission of a murder. In the course of a report of the American Bible Society the missionary says that a young man living in Yokohama, who had heard of Christianity but had never giving it any special attention, was much exasperated on hearing that his father had been defeated in a lawsuit, and believing that injustice had been done, he determined to take revenge by assassinating the governor, whom he believed to be responsible for the result. While arranging to go home that he might carry out his evil intention he called to say good-bye to a Christian friend, who, not knowing the object of his journey, bade him God-speed and gave him a Bible. He started on the journey, reading the Bible on the way. He happened to turn to the first verse of the seventh chapter of Matthew, and when he read it his conscience was so touched that he gave up his purpose and returned to Yokohama. He continued to read and became a true convert, and gave himself to the study of God's word and is now a faithful worker for the Master in the city of Tokio.

A FAITHFUL WITNESS.

He held the lamp of truth that day
So low, that none could miss the way;
And yet so high to bring in sight
That picture fair, "the World's Great Light."
That gazing up—the lamp between—
The hand that held it scarce was seen!

He held the pitcher, stooping low,
To lips of little ones below;
Then raised it to the weary saint,
And bade him drink, when sick and faint;
They drank—the pitcher thus between—
The hand that held it scarce was seen!

He blew the trumpet, soft and clear,
That trembling sinners need not fear;
And then with louder note and bold,
To raze the wall of Satan's hold.
The trumpet coming thus between,
The hand that held it scarce was seen!

But when the Captain says, "Well done,
Thou good and faithful servant," come!
Lay down the pitcher and the lamp,
Lay down the trumpet, leave 'he camp."
The weary hands will then be seen,
Clasped in those pierced ones—nought between. —From "Faith and Works."

When the late Professor Elmslie preached his first sermon, his mother, unable to be present, wrote to a friend whom she knew would be among his hearers, to know how her boy got on. His text was, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock," and we may guess the character of the sermon from the foregoing beautiful lines, the lady's reply to Mrs. Elmslie's question.

One other thing; this book is not of interest to those only who feel that their case is serious; it contains the witness of many over-taxed and run-down people to the fact that Drs. ## WORKERS FOR CHRIST.

The Great Convention of Practical Christian Laborers to be Held in Washington, D. C., November 5-11.

THE Convention of Christian Workers which assembles next week in Washington, D. C., will be an assembly of a very significant character. It means Continental organization and co-operation in Christian Work. It will prove that Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, and other denominations can act together in the common object for which all are striving.

It will be a recognition of Christian brotherhood, an evidence that Christian men have agreed to put aside for the time their denominational differences and jealousies, and by mutual suggestion, consultation and comparison of methods of work, help each other in the paramount object of Christian endeavor—to win souls for Christ. It is a grand and hopeful spectacle which our fathers longed to see and which must be well pleasing in the eyes of him, who said, "All ye are brethren." Too long has the great enemy of souls rejoiced that in the great battle-ground he has been confronted by a divided host; too long he has exulted in seeing internal dissensions weakening the forces of the army of Jesus, and the leaders wasting their strength in attacking each other, and their time in discussing abstract questions of doctrine, while men were dying day by day in ignorance of the Gospel which was able to make them wise unto salvation. Now at last, learning a lesson from the events of secular life, realizing the power that comes from union and organization, every follower of Christ who is earnestly seeking to save souls, to whatever religious camp he may belong, may meet men with the same object, to help them and be helped by them in his effort.

The most gratifying and hopeful aspect of the Convention is that it is thoroughly practical. It is not called to discuss doctrinal questions. The importance of a right creed, of a clear understanding of the Word of God is not underestimated, but this Convention has another business in hand. Missions have been springing up all over the land; Christian men in our great cities have been striving to reach various classes; some have been laboring among railroad men, others among policemen, miners, car-drivers, newsboys, criminals discharged from prison, and the friendless and fallen. Experience has taught these isolated workers many lessons, it has proved to them what methods of work have been most effective and how slight mistakes in organization have impeded and neutralized sincere effort. The object of the Convention is to obtain the benefit of this experience. Many workers, too, have been confronted by problems which they longed to solve but cannot. All their study, labor and prayer has failed. At the Convention they can state their problem and get practical advice upon it. Some one there may have grappled with the same problem and have been successful in solving it. There is no copyright, no patent in this work and as all are striving to extend the Master's kingdom, not to advance their own interests, every man is glad to help his brother-worker by his own experience.

And this Convention is not an experiment. It will be the sixth of these great gatherings which has been held. Many of our readers have attended one or more of them and have testified to the help they have gained there. They have been cheered by meeting others who are laboring in the same cause, who have the same high motives and are striving for the same end. In this utilitarian world, there are plenty of men ready to discourage them, to regard them as fanatical, to pour contempt on disinterested effort for the benefit of others, and to regard as wasted all labor which brings no return in money or influence; but in the Conventions they have met men likeminded with themselves and have been encouraged, for as "iron sharpeneth iron so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." It is therefore with confidence, and with a well-grounded expectation of help that earnest workers will go from all parts of the United States and Canada to Washington next week.

The Convention is called by the committee appointed at the first of these conventions, which was held in Chicago in June 1886. So profitable was that meeting found, that the duty of calling a second Convention seemed imperative and this duty was made one of the functions of the committee. At the second Convention, which was held in New York in September, 1887, the committee was made permanent and a new sphere of work was added to it. The Convention had been deeply impressed with the necessity of making some effort to gather in the boys who spend their evenings in the streets or in places of amusement. The Secretary of the committee, the Rev. John C. Collins, whose portrait is here given, had been very successful in organizing Boys' Clubs where, by providing wholesome literature, interesting talks and other means, the boys were attracted to the rooms and were brought under Christian influence. This work so highly commended itself to the Convention, that the committee was authorized to extend the work and organize similar clubs in other cities. About twenty of these clubs have now been established in the large cities and rooms hired for meeting in smaller towns. Fourteen thousand boys have by these means been brought into association with the Christian workers who have helped them in temporal matters by establishing Penny Savings Banks, Manual Training Classes, etc., and in spiritual matters by regular religious meetings and by introducing them to Sunday Schools.

MISS BERTHA H. WRIGHT.

Student work in Colleges was also made a function of the committee. This is to arrange for the employment of college students in Mission and Evangelistic work during their vacations. About twenty students promptly volunteered for this work and they have since spent their vacations in that way and their number has increased.

The third Convention was held in Detroit, Mich., November, 1888. There the Society of Christian Workers was regularly organized, on the basis of a plan prepared by the committee. Qualifications for membership were fixed and a small fee was decided upon to form a fund for necessary expenses. The committee especial blessing. Among the papers read were: "The Chicago Evangelization Society" by Rev. R. A. Torrey, President of the Christian Workers Society; "Cottage Meetings," by Hon. W. H. Howland, of Toronto, Vice-President of the Society; "The Mission Sunday School," by Rev. John C. Collins, Secretary of the Society; "The Church and the People," by Rev. B. Fay Mills; "The Burnham Farm Work," by Mr. W. M. F. Round, the noted prison philanthropist; and "Christian Work among Special Classes," by Miss F. E. Campbell. An equally successful Convention was held in November of last year at Hartford, Ct.

The same workers were there with many others, who came to tell of their special spheres of labor. Mrs. J. K. Barney described her experience among prisoners; Mr. J. Ward Childs gave the history of the Bowery Mission in New York City; Dr. A. J. Gordon described the Boston Missionary Training School; Mr. C. H. Yatman, "Winning Forces in Christian Work;" Rev. W. P. son, "Sunday School Work in the Southwest;" Mr. Geo. W. Wheeler, who brought with him the Gospel Wagon, described the "Origin and Growth of the Central Union Mission in Washington, D. C.," and workers was authorized to establish a Bureau of Supplies from which members could obtain at wholesale prices tracts, leaflets and the various articles needed for the Boys' Clubs. The Fourth Convention was held in Buffalo, N. Y., in October, 1889. That was a season of

SAILING UP THE NILE.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon from the text: "The river is mine and I have made it." Ezekiel 29: 9.

AHA! This is the river Nile. A brown, or yellow, or silver cord on which are hung more jewels of thrilling interest than on any river that was ever twisted in the sunshine. It ripples through the Book of Ezekiel, and flashes in the Books of Deuteronomy, and Isaiah, and Zechariah, and Nahum, and on its banks stood the mighties of many ages. It was the crystal cradle of Moses, and on its banks, Mary, the refugee, carried the infant Jesus. To find the birth-place of this river was the fascination and defeat of expeditions without number. Not many years ago, Bayard Taylor, our great American traveller, wrote: "Since Columbus first looked upon San Salvador, the earth has but one emotion of triumph left for her bestowal, and that she reserves for him who shall first drink from the fountains of the White Nile under the snow fields of Kilimanjaro." But the discovery of the sources of the Nile by most people was considered an impossibility. The malarial, the wild beasts, the savages, the unclimbable steeps, the vast distances, stopped all the expeditions for ages. An intelligent native said to Sir Samuel W. Baker and wife as they were on their way to accomplish that in which others had failed: "Give up the mad scheme of the Nile source. How would it be possible for a lady young and delicate to endure what would kill the strongest man? Give it up." But the work went on until Speke, and Grant, and Baker found the two lakes which are the source of what was called the White Nile, and baptized these two lakes with the names of Victoria and Albert. These two lakes, filled by great rainfalls and by accumulated snows from the mountains, pour their waters, laden with agricultural wealth such as blesses no other river, on down over the cataracts, on between frowning mountains, on between cities living and cities dead, on for four thousand miles and through a continent. But the White Nile would do little for Egypt if this were all. It would keep its banks and Egypt would remain a desert. But from Abyssinia there comes what is called the Blue Nile, which, though dry or nearly dry half the year, under tremendous rains about the middle of June rises to great momentum, and this Blue Nile dashes with sudden influx into the White Nile, which in consequence rises thirty feet, and their combined waters inundate Egypt with a rich soil which drops on all the fields and gardens as it is conducted by ditches, and sluices, and canals every whither. The greatest damage that ever came to Egypt came by the drying up of the river Nile, and the greatest blessing by its healthful and abundant flow. The famine in Joseph's time came from the lack of sufficient inundation from the Nile. Not enough Nile is drouth, too much Nile is freshet and plague. The rivers of the earth are the mothers of its prosperity. If by some convulsion of nature the Mississippi should be taken from North America, or the Amazon from South America, or the Danube from Europe, or the Yenesei from Asia—what hemispheric calamity! Still there are other rivers that could fertilize and save these countries. Our own continent is gulched, is ribboned, is glorified by innumerable water-courses. But Egypt has only one great river, and that is harnessed to draw all the prosperities of realms in acreage semi-infinite. What happens to the Nile, happens to Egypt. The Nilometer was to me very suggestive as we went up and down its damp stone steps and saw the pillar marked with inches telling just how high or low are the waters of the Nile. When the Nile is rising, four criers every morning run through the city announcing how many feet the river has risen—ten feet, fifteen feet, twenty feet, twenty-four feet—and when the right height of water is reached the gates of the canals are flung open and the liquid and refreshing benediction is pronounced on all the land.

As we start where the Nile empties into the Mediterranean Sea we behold a wonderful fulfillment of prophecy. The Nile in very ancient times used to have seven mouths. As the great river approached the sea it entered the sea at seven different places. Isaiah prophesied: "The Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian Sea and shall smite it in the seven streams." The fact is they are all destroyed but two and Herodotus said these two remaining are artificial. Up the Nile we shall go; part of the way by Egyptian rail train and then by boat, and we shall understand why the Bible gives such prominence to this river which is the largest river of all the earth with one exception. But before we board the train we must take a look at Alexandria. It was founded by Alexander the Great and was once the New York, the Paris, the London of the world. Temples, palaces, fountains, gardens, pillared and efflorescent with all architectural and Edenic grandeur and sweetness. Apollos, the eloquent, whom in New Testament times some people tried to make a rival to Paul, lived here. Here Mark, the author of the second book of the New Testament expired under Nero's anathema. From here the ship sailed that left Paul and the crew struggling in the breakers of Melita. Pompey's Pillar is here, about one hundred feet high, its base surrounded by so much filth and squalor I was glad to escape into an air that was breathable. This tower was built in honor of Diocletian for sparing the rebellious citizens. After having declared that he would make the blood run to his horse's knees, and his horse fell with him into the blood and his knees reddened, the tyrant took it for granted that was a sign he should stop the massacre and hence this commemorative pillar to his mercy. This is the city to which Omar came after building fourteen hundred mosques, and destroying four thousand temples and thirty-five thousand villages and castles, yet riding in on a camel with a sack of corn, a sack of figs and a wooden plate, all that he had kept for himself, and the diet to which he had limited himself for most of the time was bread and water. Was there ever in any other man a commingling of elements so strange, so weird, so generous, so cruel, so mighty, so weak, so religious, so fanatical? In this city was the greatest female lecturer the world ever saw—Hypatia. But the lessons of virtue that she taught were obnoxious and so they dragged her through the streets and scraped her flesh from her bones with sharp oyster shells and then burned the fragments of the massacred body. And here dwelt Cleopatra, pronounced to be the beauty of all time—although if her pictures are correct I have seen a thousand women in Brooklyn more attractive—and she was as bad as she was said to be handsome. Queen, conqueress, and spoke seven languages, although it would have been better for the world if she had not been able to speak any. Julius Cæsar conquered the world, yet she conquered Julius Cæsar.

But Alexandria, fascinating for this or that thing, according to the taste of the visitor, was to me most entertaining because it had been the site of the greatest library that the world ever saw, considering the fact that the art of printing had not been invented. Seven hundred thousand volumes and all the work of a slow pen. But down it all went under the torch of besiegers. Built again and destroyed again. Built again but the Arabs came along for its final demolition and the four thousand baths of the city were heated with those volumes, the fuel lasting six months, and were ever fires kindled at such fearful cost? What holocausts of the world's literature! What martyrdom of books! How many of them have gone down under the rage of nations. Only one book has been able to withstand the bombardment and that has gone through without smell of fire on its lids. No sword or spear or musket for its defense. An unarmed New Testament. An unarmed Old Testament. Yet invulnerable and triumphant. There must be something supernatural about it. Conqueror of books! Monarch of books! All the books of all the ages in all the libraries outshone by this one book which you and I can carry to church in a pocket. So methought amid the ashes of Alexandrian libraries.

But all aboard the Egyptian rail-train going up the banks of the Nile! Look out of the window and see those camels kneeling for the imposition of their load. And I think we might take from them a lesson, and instead of trying to stand upright in our own strength, become conscious of our weakness and need of divine help before we take upon us the heavy duties of the year or the week or the day, and so kneel for the burden. We meet processions of men and beasts on the way from their day's work, but alas, for the homes to which the poor inhabitants are going. For the most part hovels of mud. But there is something in the scene that thoroughly enlists us. It is the novelty of wretchedness, and a scene of picturesque rags. For thousands of years this land has been under a very damnation of taxes. Nothing but Christian civilization will roll back the influences which are "spoiling the Egyptians." There are gardens and palaces, but they belong to the rulers.

About here, under the valiant Murad Bey, the Mamelukes, who are the finest horsemen in all the world, came like a hurricane upon Napoleon's army, but they were beaten back by the French in one of the fiercest battles of all time. Then the Mamelukes turned their horses' heads the other way, and in desperation backed them against the French troops, hoping the horses would kick the life out of the French regiments. The Mamelukes, failing again, plunged into this Nile and were drowned, the French for days fishing out the dead bodies of the Mamelukes to get the valuables upon their bodies. Napoleon, at the daring of these Mamelukes, exclaimed: "Could I have united the Mameluke horse to the French infantry, I would have reckoned myself master of the world."

This ride along the Nile is one of the most solemn and impressive rides of all my life-time, and our emotions deepen as the curtains of the night fall upon all surroundings. But we shall not be satisfied until we can take a ship and pass right out upon these wondrous waters and between the banks crowded with the story of empires.

According to the lead pencil mark in my Bible it was Thanksgiving Day morning, November 28th, 1889, that with my family and friends we stepped aboard the steamer on the Nile. The Mohammedan call to prayers had been sounded by the priests of that religion, the Muezzins, from the four hundred mosques of Cairo as the cry went out: "God is great. I bear witness that there is no God but God. I bear witness that Mohammed is the apostle of God. Come to prayers. Come to salvation. God is great. There is no other but God. Prayers are better than sleep." The sky and city and palm groves and river shipping were bathed in the light. It was not much of a craft that we boarded. It would not be hailed on any of our rivers with any rapture of admiration. It fortunately had but little speed, for twice we ran aground and the sailors jumped into the water and on their shoulders pushed her out. But what yacht of gayest sportsman, what deck of swiftest ocean queen could give such thrill of rapture as a sail on the Nile? The Pyramids in sight, the remains of cities that are now only a name, the villages thronged with population. Both banks crowded with historical deeds of forty or sixty centuries. Oh, what a Book the Bible is when read on the Nile!

As we slowly move up the majestic river I see on each bank the wheels, the pumps, the buckets for irrigation, and see a man with his foot on the treadle of a wheel that fetches up the water for a garden, and then for the first time I understand that passage in Deuteronomy which says of the Israelites after they had not back from Egypt: "The land whither thou goest in to possess it is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot." Then I understood how the land could be watered with the foot. How do you suppose I felt when on the deck of that steamer on the Nile I looked off upon the canals and ditches and sluices through which the fields are irrigated by that river and then read in Isaiah "The burden of Egypt: the river shall be wasted and dried up and they shall turn the rivers far away and the brooks of defense shall be emptied and dried up; and they shall be broken in the purposes thereof, all that make sluices and ponds for fish." That Thanksgiving morning on the Nile I found my text of to-day. Pharaoh in this chapter is compared to the dragon or hippopotamus suggested by the crocodiles that used to line the banks of this river: "Thus saith the Lord God: Behold I am against thee Pharaoh, King of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said my river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. But I will put hooks in thy jaws and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales, and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales, and the land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste; and they shall know that I am the Lord: because he hath said the river is mine, and I have made it."

While sailing on this river or stopping at one of the villages, we see people on the banks who verify the Bible description for they are now as they were in Bible times. Shoes are now taken off in reverence to sacred places. Children carried astride the mother's shoulder as Hagar's time. Women with profusion of jewelry as when Rebecca was affianced. Gentils shelled into the pottage, as when Esau sold his birthright to get such a dish. The same habits of salutation as when Joseph and his brethren fell on each other's necks. Courts of law held under big trees as in olden times. People making bricks without straw, compelled by circumstances to use stubble instead of raw. Flying over or standing on the banks as in Scripture days are flamingoes, grebes, eagles, pelicans, herons, cuckoos and bullfinches. On all sides of this river are sepulchres. Villages of sepulchres. Cities of sepulchres. Nations of sepulchres. And he is tempted to call it an empire of tombs. I never saw such a place as Egypt is for graves. And now we understand the complaining sarcasm of the Israelites when they were on the way from Egypt to Canaan: "Because there are no graves in Egypt hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" Upon the river bank come the buffalo and the cattle or kine to drink. And it is as the ancestors of these cattle that inspired Pharaoh's dream of the lean kine and the fat kine.

Here we disembark a little while for Memphis, off from the Nile to the right. Memphis founded by the first king of Egypt and for a long while the capital. City of marble and gold. Home of thearaohs. City nineteen miles in circumference. Vast colonnades through which imposing processions marched. Here stood the Temple of the Sun, itself a brilliancy a sun shone on by another sun. Thebes in power over a thousand and a hundred years, or nearly ten times as long as the United States have existed. Here is a recumbent statue seventy-five feet long. Bronzed gateways. A necropolis called "the haven of the blest." Here Joseph was Prime Minister. Here Pharaoh received Jacob. All possible honors were built up into this royal city. Hosea, Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Isaiah speak of it as something wonderful. Never did I visit a city with such lofty anticipations and never did my anticipations drop so flat. Not a pillar stands. Not a wall is unbroken. Not a fountain tosses in the sun. Even the ruins have been ruined and all that remains are chips of marble, small pieces of fractured sculpture and splintered human bones. Here and there a letter of some elaborate inscription, a toe or ear of a statue that once stood in niche of palace wall. Ezekiel prophesied its blotting-out and the prophecy has been fulfilled. "Ride on," I said to our party "and don't wait for me." And as I stood there alone, the city of Memphis in the glory of past centuries returned. And I heard the rush of her chariots and the dash of her fountains and the conviviality of her palaces and saw the drunken nobles roll on the floors of mosaic, while in startling contrast amid all the regalities of the place I saw Pharaoh look up into the face of aged rustic Jacob, the shepherd, saying: "How old art thou?"

But back to the Nile and on and up till you reach Thebes, in Scripture called the City of No. Hundred-gated Thebes. A quadrangular city four miles from limit to limit. Four great temples, two of them Karnac and Luxor, once mountains of exquisite sculpture and gorgeous dreams solidified in stone. Statue of Rameses II, eight hundred and eighty-seven tons in weight and seventy-five feet high but now fallen and scattered. Walls abloom with the battlefields of centuries. The surrounding hills of rock hollowed into sepulchres on the wall of which are chiselled in picture and hieroglyphics the confirmation of Bible story in regard to the treatment of the Israelites in Egypt so that, as explorations go on with the work, the walls of these sepulchres become commentaries of the Bible, the Scriptures originally written upon parchment here cut into everlasting stone. Thebes mighty and dominant five hundred years. Then she went down in fulfillment of Ezekiel's prophecy concerning the City of No, which was another name for Thebes: "I will execute judgment in No. I will cut off the multitudes of No." Jeremiah also prophesied: "Thus saith the Lord, I will punish the multitudes of No." This city of Thebes and all the other dead cities of Egypt iterate and reiterate the veracity of the Scriptures, telling the same story which Moses and the prophets told. Have you noticed how God kept back these archaeological confirmations of the Bible until our time, when the air is full of unbelief about the truthfulness of the dear old Book? He waited until the printing press had been set up in its perfected shape, and the submarine cable was laid, and the world was intelligent enough to appreciate the testimony, and then he resurrected the dead cities of the earth, and commands them, saying: "Open your long sealed lips and speak! Memphis and Thebes! Is the Bible true?" "True!" respond Memphis and Thebes. "Babylon! Is the book of Daniel true?" "True!" responds Babylon. "Ruins of Palestine and Syria! Is the New Testament true?" "True!" respond the ruins all the way from Joppa to the Dead Sea, and from Jerusalem to Damascus. What a mercy that this testimony of the dead cities should come at a time when the Bible is especially assailed. And this work will go on until the veracity, and divinity of the Scriptures will be as certain to all sensible men and women as that two and two make four, as that an isosceles triangle is one which has two of its sides equal, as that the diameter of a circle is a line drawn through the centre and terminated by the circumference, as certain as any mathematical demonstration. Never did I feel more encouraged than when after preaching a sermon on evidences of the truth of the Bible drawn from Oriental lands, a distinguished Senator of the United States, known and honored everywhere, but now deceased, came up to the platform and said: "I was brought up in the faith of Christianity, but I got speculating on all these subjects, and had given up my faith in the Bible, but those facts and arguments archaeological take me back to my old faith in the Bible, which my father and mother taught me." The tears rolling down his cheeks evinced the depth of his emotion. When I read of the Senator's death I was comforted to think that perhaps I may have helped him a little in the struggle of his life, and perhaps given him an easier pillow on which to die.

Two great nations, Egypt and Greece, diplomatized and almost came to battle for one book, a copy of Æschylus. Ptolemy the Egyptian king discovered that in the great library at Alexandria there was no copy of Æschylus. The Egyptian king sent up to Athens, Greece, to borrow the book and make a copy of it. Athens demanded a deposit of seventeen thousand seven hundred dollars as security. The Egyptian king received the book, but refused to return that which he had borrowed and so forfeited the seventeen thousand seven hundred dollars. The two nations rose in contention concerning that one book. Beautiful and mighty book indeed! But it is a book of horrors, the dominant idea that we are the victims of hereditary influences from which there is no escape, and that fate rules the world, and although the author does tell of Prometheus who was crucified on the rocks for sympathy for mankind, a powerful suggestion of the sacrifice of Christ in later years, it is a very poor book compared with that Book which we hug to our hearts because it contains our only guide in life, our only comfort in death, and our only hope for a blissful immortality. If two nations could afford to struggle for one copy of Æschylus, how much more can all nations afford to struggle for the possession, and triumph of the Holy Scriptures?

But the dead cities strung along the Nile not only demolish infidelity, but thunder down the absurdity of the modern doctrine of evolution which says the world started with nothing and then rose, and human nature began with nothing but evolved into splendid manhood and womanhood of itself. Nay; the sculpture of the world was more wonderful in the days of Memphis and Thebes and Carthage than in the days of Boston and New York. Those blocks of stone weighing three hundred tons high up in the wall at Karnac imply machinery equal to, if not surpassing, the machinery of the nineteenth century. How was that statue of Rameses, weighing eight hundred and eighty-seven tons transported from the quarries two hundred miles away and how was it lifted? Tell us, modern machinists. How were those galleries of rock, still standing at Thebes, filled with paintings surpassed by no artist's pencil of the present day? Tell us, artists of the nineteenth century. The dead cities of Egypt so far as they have left enough pillars or statues or sepulchres or temple ruins to tell the story—Memphis, Migdol, Hierapolis, Zoan, Thebes, Goshen, Carthage—all of them developing downward instead of upward. They have evolved from magnificence into destruction. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is the only elevator of individual and social national character. Let all the living cities know that pomp and opulence and temporal prosperity are no security. Those ancient cities lacked nothing but good morals. Dissipation and sin slew them, and unless dissipation and sin are halted, they will some day slay our modern cities, and leave our palaces of merchandise and our galleries of art and our City Halls as flat in the dust as we found Memphis on the afternoon of that Thanksgiving Day. And if the cities go down, the nation will go down. "Oh," you say, "that is impossible; we have stood so long—yea, over a hundred years as a nation." Why, what of that? Thebes stood five hundred years; Memphis stood a thousand years. God does not forget. One day with the Lord is as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day. Rum and debauchery and bad politics are more rapidly working the destruction of our American cities than sin of any kind and all kinds worked for the destruction of the cities of Africa, once so mighty and now so prostrate. But their gods were idols, and could do nothing except for debasement. Our God made the heavens and sent his Son to redeem the nations. And our cities will not go down, and our nation will not perish because the Gospel is going to triumph. Forward! all schools and colleges and churches! Forward! all reformatory and missionary organizations. Forward! all the influences marshalled to bless the world. Let our modern European and American cities listen to the voice of those ancient cities resurrected, and by hammer and chisel and crow-bar compelled to speak.

I notice the voice of those ancient cities is hoarse from the exposure of forty centuries, and they accentuate slowly with lips that were palsied for ages, but all together those cities along the Nile intone these words, "Hear us for we are very old, and it is hard for us to speak. We were wise long before Athens learned her first lesson. We sailed our ships while yet navigation was unborn. We sinned and we fell. Our learning could not save us: See those half-obliterated hieroglyphics on yonder wall. Our architecture could not save us: See the painted columns of Philæ. Our heroes could not save us: Witness Menes, Diodorus, Rameses, and Ptolemy. Our gods Ammon and Osiris could not save us: See their fallen temples all along the four thousand miles of Nile. Oh, ye modern cities, get some other God: a God who can help, a God who can pardon, a God who can save. Called up as we are for a little while to give testimony, again the sands of the desert will bury us. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust!" And as these voices of porphyry and granite ceased, all the sarcophagi under the hills responded, "Ashes to ashes!" and the capital of a lofty column fell grinding itself to powder among the rocks, and responding, "Dust to dust!"

WORK OF THE SPIRIT.

S. S. Lesson For Nov. 8. By Mrs M. Baxter:
John 16: 1-15. Golden Text, John 16: 13.

HOWBEIT, when he the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will show you things to come. When he is come! Where? To whom? Surely into our hearts and lives, to make us a temple of the Holy Ghost. God the Father, came near to man, and spoke with Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden. God the Son, came nearer still, he was born as man; "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." He was, indeed, our Brother and Fellowman, and then, in our nature, he died for us. But the Holy Ghost comes nearer still. He takes up his abode within us. It must have been blessed indeed to talk with God in the days of Eden, when man was still unfallen; it must have been inestimably precious to have seen and spoken with, to have known the pressure of the hand, and hung upon the lips of Jesus, the Son of Man, when he was here on earth. But to have God indeed dwelling in us as his chosen habitation, to be inseparable from him, guided by him, moved by him, willing, intelligent, consenting instruments all day long to carry out in a human life the very thoughts of God—this is above all blessedness; it is, or it may be, the very life of Christ himself on earth, repeated in our lives. For this the Holy Spirit came, for this we are crucified with Christ.

Since the days of Pentecost, the Church of Christ is expected

To Know the Holy Ghost,

and to know him by his presence. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (1 Cor. 3: 16.) How do we answer this question? Have we so yielded ourselves unto God as those that are "alive from the dead," that our members have become consciously, instruments of righteousness unto God? Is it true that we are no longer under our own control, but under that of our God, no longer at our own disposal, but at our Lord's? Is the Holy Ghost to us a real living Person with whom we are acquainted, whose guidance and teaching we rely upon, who has taken the direction of our thoughts, words, and actions, with our own free consent? Or do we rather look upon the Holy Ghost as an engine driver looks upon steam, as a certain power which man can control and utilize as he will? Oh we need to draw nigh with as much reverence to God the Holy Ghost as to God the Father or God the Son.

"He shall guide you into all truth," but he will guide no unwilling follower. In the Old Testament, he came as an impelling power, and "holy men of old spake as they were moved (literally driven along) by the Holy Ghost" (1 Pet. 1: 21), but he who impelled under the Old Covenant guides under the New. A guide is no police constable whose conduct is per force, a guide implies willingness on the part of the one who accepts his guidance. We want to go in a certain direction, our will is made up to go thither, but we do not know the way. We want to do the will of God, to have our own way no more; how shall we know it? how shall we do it? God's answer is most explicit—"What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God: that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God" Is it true that we have yielded up the government of our lives into his divine keeping? Then it is also true that we have and as we quietly and definitely wait upon him without worry, without anxiety, in the blessed consciousness that it is his joy to make known to us the will of God, we shall experience how true and blessed is the indwelling guidance. Nothing is so sure, nothing so calming as the guidance of the Holy Spirit in the hearts and lives of those who are wholly yielded up to God. But it is possible to know the will of God, and yet to be reluctant to do it; we may seek to master ourselves, may struggle, and try and make strenuous efforts to force our wills, and yet in vain. If we are trying to do the work of the Holy Ghost, we may well fail. "It is God which worketh in you," God the Holy Ghost who dwells in us, "both to will and do of his good pleasure." (Phil. 2: 13.) There is no need to attempt any great effort, the Holy Ghost is mightier than we are, and as we trust him, and yield to him, he masters and subdues us. His work is to bring us

From the False to the True.

He guides into all truth. Our hearts by nature are "deceitful above all things," but the Holy Ghost shows us the truth about ourselves, as well as about our God. Our deceitful hearts measure everything by ourselves, by what we are, by what we know, by what we are able to do, by what we have of power or talent, of strength or other resources; and it is easy for hearts with such a limited horizon to complain of the will of God, and to think it hard when seeming impossibilities lie before us. The Spirit of God opens our eyes upon the almightiness and the love of our God, and puts all things in a new light to us; he guides us out of the region of self into the reality of God with us, and the same things which would otherwise lead us to despair are seen to be glorious opportunities for the intervention of our God. "All these things are against me," says poor self-centred Jacob. (Gen. 42: 36.) "All things are for your sakes," says the man full of the Holy Ghost. (11 Cor. 4: 15.)

The Holy Ghost is our Guide in prayer: "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he which searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." Just as long as we think we can pray, and that we have power by our prayers to prevail with God, we resemble those who "think they shall be heard for their much speaking." The Holy Ghost, when we pray in the Spirit, takes our thoughts away from ourselves and our prayers and fastens them upon God, and upon his mind in the matter. While we behold God, the Spirit makes intercession, and fills us with a holy quiet satisfaction that God is in charge of the matter. The true ground for answered prayer is that God and we have come to be of one mind through Christ, and this can only be by the Holy Ghost.

In speaking, it is the same thing. Oh if the chaff could be separated from the wheat in speaking for the Lord, how much there would be to be driven away, how few words comparatively would be spoken! The Lord Jesus never spoke of himself (John 14: 10), and the Holy Spirit "shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear that shall he speak." How then can we take upon us to speak of ourselves? Shall we be more competent than God the Son or God the Holy Ghost? Paul would not speak "with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power" (1 Cor. 2: 4), and therefore the Holy Ghost dictated words which Paul spoke and wrote which still leave their mark on hundreds of thousands in every generation. Eternal life is in those words. The Lord Jesus said to his disciples, and he has left the word for us: "When they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak, for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak; for it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you." (Matt. 10: 19, 20.)

There are some of the children of God who are conscious of their great lack of love to God. Again it is the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, who is our Power to love, even as he is our Power to will, to do, to pray, to speak. "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." (Rom. 5: 5.) And although, it may be, we are little conscious of his presence as the Spirit of love, because there may be still so much of our own spirit within us; yet, as we steadily and quietly recognize him, he will prove himself to be in us that love of God of which the Bible speaks. Again, we may be wanting in wisdom, especially heavenly wisdom, which is very different from the earthly wisdom which hurries to get the best of everything for itself. Divine wisdom waits for the Lord, and reckons him equal to all and everything. "He shall take of mine, and shall shew it unto you." Divine wisdom sees the Christ-side of everything in time and in eternity, and measures all things by him.

But the same blessed Spirit who is thus the guide of the Church of Christ is

The Reprover of the World:

"When he is come, he will reprove (or convince) the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." When he is come to dwell in the children of God, he will convince the world. Christ-like Christians, God-filled men, are to convince the world. Men born selfish who have become by grace unselfish, are God's instruments to convince a selfish world. Men who were untruthful and who by grace have become truthful, are God's instruments to convince the world of untruth. Men who by nature are full of malice and the spirit of retaliation, and who by grace have become in spirit like lambs, are God's instruments to show the world what Jesus Christ is like, who "answered not a word," and to convince them how unlike him they are. "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify (or bear witness), of me, and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning." "The testimony of two men is true;" the Holy Ghost needs his temples, and the Church of Christ needs the Holy Ghost, that the witness of Jesus Christ in the world may be proved true!

LESSON POINTS,

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

THESE things have I told you that when the time shall come, you may remember them. Christian laborers like their blessed Master must sow the seed in faith, believing that in due time God will cause it to take root and bear fruit. Not always have we the privilege of gathering the harvest, but in God's own time will our labors be blessed and the words of our lips be brought as a savor of life unto life to the remembrance of our loved ones.

A poor Christian mother died leaving an only son, the idol of her heart. Alone and destitute, the orphan found no smiles to welcome him, and few hands to aid him. But a sacred agency had appealed on high for him—the forethought of a devout mother's love. Often had she spoken to him of Jesus and his love, and when at last she felt that she must go, on her dying bed she committed him to God's keeping and pledged him so to live as to make sure of meeting her in heaven. God opened a path for the lad and gave him opportunities and friends. By the time he came of age he was in a successful business. He was not a Christian, but he had not forgotten his Christian mother. His thoughts went back to her loving life, and lingered around her humble grave.

He was not satisfied that her remains should rest so far away, and he determined to remove them to the handsome cemetery in which he had bought a lot for his family. He himself superintended the disinterment. The coffin had crumbled. Dust had almost returned to dust. The sad duty he had undertaken filled him with solemnity, and when it was over he could not shake off the thousand memories it awakened.

"My good mother! How truly she loved me, how faithfully she toiled for me! She was anxious for my earthly future, but her heart's great wish was that I might live, not for this world, but for heaven. The first part of her prayer is answered. Why is not the last?"

The thought melted him. The Holy Spirit strove with him and he yielded. He sought his mother's God, whom he had so long neglected, and in penitence, consecration, and love, found acceptance with him. A voice of former days had called the rich man to a new life and nobler duty. It was the voice of a mother twenty years buried in the ground.

He will guide you into all truth. What the heart is to the body, what the eyes are to the head, what the mainspring is to the watch, what the steam is to the locomotive, and what the rudder is to the ship—all this and more is the Holy Spirit to us in helping us to live for God and making sure of Heaven. We cannot understand rightly the Scriptures unless by the illumination of the Holy Ghost. We could not derive much pleasure from the finest paintings, the most exquisite statuary, or the most beautiful drapery if the light were excluded nor can we derive comfort or enlightenment from the word of God unless we have the help of the Divine Comforter. He, and he alone can guide us into the truth, and without him all teaching and all preaching must be in vain. Strive all you will to make the Celestial Port unless you invite and accept the guidance of the Holy Spirit, you are bound to be shipwrecked at last.

A party of gentlemen were traveling through Switzerland a few years ago. They were stopping at an inn in the beautiful valley of Interlachen, and had made arrangements to go on foot the next day over a high mountain to the valley that lay beyond. There was an English traveler staying at the same inn. He was traveling alone and wanted to take the same journey. He spoke to one of the guides about going with him, but he thought the man asked too much money. They could not agree about the price, so he refused to take the guide, and said he was sure he could find the way himself. He started alone the next morning a good while before the others. When the others had gotten about half way the guide stopped. He pointed to a dark-looking little object far off from the path in which they were walking, and said:

"There's the gentleman who would not take a guide; he has lost his way. He never can get out of the mountains in that direction if he doesn't come back he will lose his life." Then the guide climbed up on a higher elevation, and putting his hands to his mouth he called out as loudly as he could: "Come back, come back, or you will be lost." But the man could not hear the voice, and in the following year a little mound in the village graveyard marked the spot where the English man lay who lost his life in trying to scale the mountains without a guide.

HOW TO DECIDE.

A Story of the S. S. Text for Nov. 8. "He will guide you into all truth." John 16: 13

LOOKING up from a book he was reading in the corner of her father's library, Arthur Clarkson, a boy of some twelve years of age said to his father, "Papa, are you a Republican or a Democrat?"

Two gentlemen had just quitted the room after laboring with the Rev. Mr. Clarkson for nearly an hour. Election day was only two weeks off and they were anxious to secure his vote and influence. They were the second deputation he had received. On the day before, two other gentlemen had been with him, urging him to vote for the candidates of the opposite party. The little boy had been a silent witness of both interviews and now, in some bewilderment, he put his question, "Are you a Republican or a Democrat, Papa?"

"Why do you ask, my boy?"

"Because those gentlemen said you must be a Democrat and yesterday the two men who were here said they were convinced you were a Republican at heart. You cannot be both can you, Papa?"

"Did you never read, Arthur, of that dispute about a shield in which one man insisted that the shield was of gold and the other that it was of silver? When the shield was examined it was found to be gold on one side and silver on the other. I like to examine the shield before I give an opinion. These politicians can see no good in their respective opponents, yet I believe they are all estimable men, but human, and being human they have their faults. These gentlemen concluded that I was not of their party, as those did yesterday, because I wanted to get them to recognize the good in their opponents and to moderate the language they use about them."

"How do you decide questions like these, Papa? When you see good on both sides and faults on both sides, it must be difficult."

"Yes, it is sometimes, and there are other questions which are still more difficult than political questions. You know how a judge decides the cases which come into his court. He hears the arguments on both sides, and then having studied the question from an impartial standpoint, gives his decision. Some-

THE AMERICAN BOARD.

The Great Missionary Organization Holds its Eighty-second Annual Meeting and Re-Elects Dr. Storrs to the Presidency.

ITTSFIELD, Mass. has had the honor of entertaining the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, which held its eighty-second annual meeting there October 13-16. An unusual interest attaches to this meeting because it signalizes a triumph over difficulties and troubles which a few years ago seriously impeded the work of the Board and threatened still more momentous consequences. The controversy between what are known as the old and new schools of theology entered the Board and the attitude taken by its officers and members on the subject alienated many churches. In the crisis of the conflict, four years ago, Dr. Richard S. Storrs, of Brooklyn, N. Y., whose portrait appears in this column, was elected to the Presidency of the Board. Members who did not know him personally, but knew that he was the nominee of the majority, regarded his election as an omen of continued strife and apprehended a disruption of the Board. Their apprehensions have, however, happily proved groundless. His administration has been characterized by so much moderation, tact and Christian kindness that the crisis has happily passed and the Board is now in the enjoyment of increased prosperity.

The Secretary reported that the total donations for the year had been $484,463, a gain over last year of $66,542, and of $92,715 over the average for the last five years. The legacies also had been above the average, amounting to $206,458. The total of donations and legacies for 1891 is $690,222, and that, with the income from the general permanent fund, makes $824,812 which the committee has this year had at its disposal. The balance on hand is $765.05. The Board has now in the field 538 missionaries, seconded by a force of 2648 native preachers and teachers, including 410 churches with 38,226 communicants.

When the time came for the election of officers, a letter was read from Dr. Storrs asking that another name should be substituted for his in nomination for the Presidency. The Board, however, would not listen to the request and he was unanimously re-elected. Dr. Storrs accepted the office on condition that all the other officers were retained and this was done.

Dr. Storrs is seventy years of age. He was born at Braintree, Mass., on Aug. 20, 1821. He studied at Amherst College and Andover Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1845. The same year he became pastor of the Harvard Congregational Church, Brookline, Mass., but after one year's labor there he accepted an invitation from the Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he has remained to the present time. The congregation, small at first, and composed chiefly of New England people, grew rapidly under Dr. Storrs' preaching. His scholarly sermons and polished eloquence attracted educated people and as the city grew, Dr. Storrs gathered around him a band of earnest aggressive workers who made the Church of the Pilgrims a centre of Christian influence. His pastorate has now reached the phenomenal length of forty-five years and the respect in which he is held, not only by his own church, but in the city and the Congregational churches throughout the country, attests the value of his services to the cause of Christ.

HELD BY A FOOT.

ON October 15, an accident of a peculiarly distressing character occurred on the Pennsylvania Railroad at Philadelphia. A freight conductor was just finishing his night's work when he found it necessary to switch his train. It backed down a short distance, and the conductor walked up to the switch, giving a signal to the engineer at the other end of the train to come back. His foot caught in a frog, and held him fast. The train moved back slowly. It was perhaps 500 feet away, but no one saw him, and his cries were drowned by the rattle of the cars and the puffing of the engine. He must have thus faced death for fully two minutes before the back bumper caught him and threw him under the wheels, killing him instantly. There are many who lose their souls as this man lost his life. Some evil habit entangles them and holds them fast, and though they know that their eternal interests are at stake they are unable to extricate themselves. It is the sins that are as dear as a right hand that lead to eternal death. (Matt. 5:30.)

A HOME TROUBLE.

SEARCH is being made for a man who recently left his home at Woodside, N. J., under the stress of mental worry. He had an attack of gripe in the spring and was a long time recovering. Since then he has acted strangely. He would sit in his chair in a listening attitude and after a time would declare that he had heard someone talking against him. He would speak pitifully to the passers-by or to the neighbors, declaring that he had never done them any harm and asking why they abused and spoke ill of him. They replied that they had not spoken of him at all, but the man would not believe them. He could, however, get no rest. All day he persisted that he could hear people saying something against him, he could hear the buzzing of conversation and, though he could not distinguish the words, he knew it was derogatory of him. The doctor assured him that the buzzing was in his own ears and that if he would have patience it would soon pass away. But the man would not believe it and at last, driven to a frenzy by the conviction that everybody is his enemy, he has left his home, and his family and friends have sought him in vain. Though his delusion is not a common one it has often happened that men have imputed to others evil that existed only in their own minds. It is one of the evidences of conversion that a man begins to love everyone and think well of them. (1 Cor. 13:5).

A CITIZEN CLAIMED.

In an obituary notice of Commodore Ingraham, who died at Charleston, S. C., on October 16th, there appears a story of a remarkable adventure in which he took the chief part. It appears that in 1852, he was in command of the sloop of war St. Louis, then cruising in the Mediterranean. While off the coast of Smyrna he was notified that an American citizen of Austrian birth had been seized and held for trial for a political offence committed four years before. The man had been engaged in the rising in Hungary in 1848, but had made his escape to the United States. Having occasion in 1852 to visit Austria on business, he had been recognized and arrested. He therefore appealed to the United States consul for protection. The consul visited him in prison and found that the man had no naturalization papers. He had simply declared his intention of becoming a United States citizen, but the period of residence required by law before granting the papers had not elapsed. While the inquiries as to his status were in progress the prisoner was put on an Austrian vessel for conveyance to a fortress. The consul thereupon called upon Commodore Ingraham to prevent the removal. The Commodore promptly brought his ship alongside the Austrian vessel, and clearing his decks for action, notified the Austrian captain that he should open fire if the man were not given up within twenty-four hours. After some parley the man was surrendered and the Commodore sailed away in triumph. The question involved was whether a man who had only declared his intentions and had not received his papers, was legally a citizen of the United States. The Consul and the Commodore held that he was, and carried their point. Unhappily it is not so with citizenship in Christ's kingdom. Too many who declare their intentions of becoming his subjects never fulfil their intentions and perish with the subjects of Satan. (II. Pet. 2:20-22.)

NEW LIGHTHOUSE SIGNALS.

A REPORT is to be submitted to Congress at its next session from the Lighthouse Board and an appropriation asked for to effect a change in the system of signalling. The object is to prevent Captains being in doubt as to whether the lights they see are the lights of a lighthouse or not. Captain Mahan the Engineer Secretary of the Lighthouse Board, who has prepared the report, says that all lighthouse lights should have such distinguishing characteristics as to make it impossible for any mariner suddenly coming to a light to be uncertain whether it belongs to the lighthouse establishment or not. A ship running for four or five days without being able to catch a glimpse of sun or stars, may easily find herself several miles out of the way. If, under these circumstances, a light should be made out unexpectedly, the mariner should be able to tell at once whether it be a light of the lighthouse establishment, and, if it be so, he should have the means of knowing immediately what light it is. The present system, founded on time intervals, is not wholly satisfactory. In its place is proposed a system of numeral characteristics, or the assignment of a number to each light, this number being given by groups of flashes. It may be hoped that Congress will make the necessary appropriations for this improvement, if, as seems probable, it will effect the object sought. As was seen in the recent wreck of the U. S. S. Despatch a mistake as to a light may easily cause the loss of a vessel. Such a mistake has often caused the loss of a soul. The lights of man's wisdom, have been mistaken for the light of heaven and the voyager on the ocean of life has been misled and suffered eternal shipwreck. (1 Tim. 6:20, 21.)

A DOG'S APPEAL.

A REMARKABLE story of a dog's sagacity comes from the village of Sturmerville, Pa. A press dispatch says that an aged widow whose husband and son were killed in the war and who is in receipt of a pension, resides there. She has lived the life of a hermit for many years. Every winter she would collect a store of provisions, shut herself in the house with a Newfoundland dog as her only companion and remain secluded until spring. About the middle of September she told a store-keeper that she was going to shut herself up as usual. Nothing more was seen of her until October 10. The windows of the house were tightly closed and no one entered or left the dwelling. But on that day the old lady's dog forced his way out. He went to the nearest house and barked loudly and incessantly. When the residents came out, the dog started toward the house of his mistress whining pitifully, then he would go back and start again toward his home. The dog was evidently inviting them to follow. Concluding that some trouble had occurred, the neighbors went to the house, the dog manifesting his joy that they had understood him. Breaking down a door they effected an entrance. They found the old woman in a critical state. She had been stricken with paralysis. Marks on the floors showed that the dog had dragged food to where she lay and had thus kept her alive. Finally he must have concluded that human help was necessary, so went out to fetch in the neighbors. A physician was summoned and all is now being done that can be done for the sufferer's comfort and recovery. A lesson may be learned from the dog's sagacious conduct. When he saw that the case was beyond his power he called for help. This the Christian worker may do, for he who can save to the uttermost has his ear ever open to the cry of all who trust in him. (Luke 9:40-42.)

times it does not fully satisfy either of the suitors, but is pronounced just by disinterested parties. The judge has had experience and knows that it is not safe to trust the statements of partisans. An inexperienced judge once said that he could easily decide when he had heard one side of the case, but when he listened to the other side he was 'bothered.' That is how we make our mistakes in life. We are apt to be content with seeing only one side of a subject. It saves thinking and the trouble of deciding."

"Can you always get knowledge on both sides?"

"It is easier to do that than to decide between them. Do you remember how that great King, William III. of England, acted? When he became king he knew but little of the country, and could not understand the people. The leaders of one party warned him against the leaders of the other party, and assured him they were traitors. The so-called traitors warned him against their traducers as men who were untrustworthy, and the poor king, anxious to do what was right and to act so as to save the country from ruin, did not know whom to believe or what to do. At last he concentrated all his efforts on a search for one honest, sagacious man, and found him. From Lord Somers he obtained a just estimate of public men and public questions and then trusting his experience and his honesty acted on the information he received. He trusted his adviser and made few mistakes. England owes much of her present liberty and power to the honesty and impartiality of the adviser the king had at that critical juncture."

"But is there always some one to advise as well as that?"

"Ah! that is where our strength lies. God as promised us an infallible adviser; or rather guide, who is to be always with us. Jesus and the Holy Spirit would guide us into all truth and abide with us forever. That is what we all need. We seek the truth, but sometimes we do not know where to find it. When we ask God, and the Holy Spirit guides our footsteps to the place where it is. But we have to trust him. When you wanted some jewels the other day and did not know where they grew, and I told you that I had seen some growing, you did not go to look for them yourself you were glad to let me take you to the place. That is how you accept the Holy Spirit's guidance in difficulties whether in your studies or your conduct. If you trust him he will lead you, and Jesus said, 'guide you into all truth.'"

TWO YOUNG MULETEERS.

IN a letter from Rev. E. W. McCowell, the American Presbyterian Missionary who is laboring in Mosul in Kurdistan on the borders of Persia, which he sends to the Church at Home and Abroad, he thus describes the fruit which has come from the conversion of two muleteers.

In one of our villages there is an interesting church, remarkable for its spirit of brotherly love and for its zeal. It is the growth of only a few years and sprang from a seed of God's own planting. The village was Catholic, the people very ignorant and bigoted. There lived there two men, K— and T—, no better, worse perhaps, than their neighbors. Being muleteers their business took them occasionally to a neighboring city where, in some way, they came into contact with a native evangelist. This man not only preached to them, he took them by the hand and talked with them of Christ.

The New Testament was a new book to them. They had never heard such truths before. Fear, sorrow, surprise, joy, were intermingled in their hearts day after day. As they did, their interest deepened. They were ridiculed, then threatened, finally were persecuted, and, worst of all, their chief enemies were those of their own household—father, wife, sister, and brother. This led to their meeting to read in secret in a secluded place among the hills, where, under the impulse of the Spirit, they learned to pray.

The change in their character could not long be seen without bearing fruit. The first convert was K's sister; then his wife who, once usually abused and beaten, now finding herself treated with consideration and love, did not but appreciate the change in her husband. Next the old mother, who had been devoted to her church as to mourn for her dead, was united to him again by a common faith. T. fell sick and died, but not without first giving evidence of the power of the Gospel to give peace and support in death. His last request was that the usual mourning, banish in its nature, be omitted at his funeral. His calmness and peace impressed all who witnessed it.

RUTS AND ANTI-RUTS.

THE Church is divided into two parties,—the Ruts and the Anti-Ruts. The former are in favor of driving along in just the way that all the preceding religious vehicles have gone. They want ministers to run their sermons along the same established grooves, and their prayers. Anything new in manner or modes is frightful. They say, "Who ever heard of such a thing? My father and my grandfather and my great-grandfather never did. These young fellows are disorganizers and iconoclasts. Their front wheels have gone out of the ruts. Pull these innovators off of the box. They are not fit to drive. By some strong ecclesiastical pry let us get the clerical wagon down up to the hubs in the old crevices."

But the Anti-Ruts would rather be out than in the old grooves. Yet they want to be sure that they are on the right road. It is the terminus they are looking after, not so much the way of reaching it. They have rougher riding than those who keep in the ruts. The vehicle sometimes bounces fearfully. Obstacles are apt to be thrown in their way. These persons get now and then a sound jolt; but that is good for dyspepsia. Besides, roughness in the road are apt to keep a man wide awake and observant of the scenery. The University of Hard Knocks graduates the best scholars. The Anti-Ruts can more easily change their course if they desire so to do. We like them better than their antagonists. We see no reason why a sermon should have the stereotyped three heads when one head, or ten heads, would be more convenient and effective; nor why they should begin with an exordium preparing an audience for a discourse, if they happen to be already prepared; nor of postponing the application of a sermon to the close, if you feel like making a running application: nor of sticking to stale modes of illustrating truth, when you know of something else that will shake the people up more effectively; nor why a Church should be conducted like all other Churches, when you think you have a better plan. Three cheers for the Anti-Ruts.

Let us say to young men that their safety depends in never starting in the old grooves. Get once in the regular ruts, and you cannot get out without breaking the shafts, or twisting the tire off the wheel. We have seen teamsters by the quarter of an hour trying to get the carts out of the old track; and the horses sweated, and the drivers lost his patience. If a young man starts in the rut at eighteen, he will be in the rut at eighty. An old foggy at twenty-one is fearful. He is an Egyptian mummy, fit only for the shelf of a museum and to be laid away amid fossiliferous specimens.

GREAT REVIVALS.

HOW hard it is to acknowledge that men are doing good if they do not work in our way and by our methods! The tendency is even among Christians to depreciate that which goes on independent of themselves and in a way repugnant to their personal taste. People do not like those who do a thing which they themselves have not been able to accomplish. When through especial effort a large number of people are converted the cry is, "They will not hold out." Time only will show that. They are doing all they can. You cannot expect them to hold out ten years in six weeks. The most faithful Christians we have ever known were brought in through revivals, and the meanest, stingiest, dullest, hardest-to-get-on-with Christians have joined when the church was dead. When a candidate for admission comes before our church officers in revival times, I ask him only seven or eight questions; but when he comes during a cold state of religion, I ask him twenty questions, and get the elders to ask him as many more. In other words, I have more faith in conversions under special religious influence than under ordinary. The best luck I ever had in fishing was when I dropped the net in the bay and brought up at one haul twenty blue-fish, with only three or four moss-bunkers, and the poorest luck I ever had was when, after standing two hours in the soggy meadow with one hook on the line, I felt I had a bite, and began to pull, more and more persuaded of the great size of the captive, until I flung to the shore a snapping-turtle. As a gospel fisherman I would rather run the risk of a large haul than of a solitary angling. I can soon sort out and throw overboard the few moss-bunkers. Oh for great awakenings all over Christendom! We have had in many parts of this country a drought so long we can stand a freshet. Let the Hudson and the Thames and the Susquehanna rise and overflow the lowlands, and the earth be full of the knowledge of God as the waters fill the seas.

RELIGIOUS CONVERSATION.

IF ten or fifteen of us should happen to come into a circle to spend the evening, we would talk about the autumnal elections or the recent flurry in Wall street, and about five hundred other things, and perhaps we would not talk any about Jesus Christ and our hopes of heaven. That is not Christianity; that is heathenism. Indeed, I have sometimes been amazed to find Christian people actually lacking in subjects of conversation, while the two persons knew each of the other that he was a Christian. You take two Christian people of this modern day and place them in the same room (I suppose the two men may have no worldly subjects in common). What are they talking about? There being no worldly subject common to them, they are in great stress for a subject, and after a long pause Mr. A. remarks: "It is a pleasant evening."

Again there is a long pause. These two men, both redeemed by the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, eternity before them, the glorious history of the Church of Jesus Christ behind them, certainly after a while they will converse on the subject of religion. A few minutes have passed and Mr. B. remarks: "Fine autumn we are having." Again there is a profound quiet. Now, you suppose that their religious feelings have really been dammed back for a little while; the men have been postponing the things of God and eternity that they may approach the subject with more deliberation, and you wonder what useful thing Mr. B. will say to Mr. A. in conversation.

It is the third time, and perhaps it is the last that these two Christian men will ever meet until they come face to face before the throne of God. They know it. The third attempt is now made. Mr. A. says to Mr. B.: "Feels like snow!" My opinion is, it must have felt more like ice. Oh, how little real, practical religious conversation there is in this day! I would to God that we might get back to the old-time Christianity, when men and women came into associations, and felt, "Here I must use all the influence I can for Christ upon that soul, and get all the good I can. This may be the last opportunity I shall have in this world of interviewing that immortal spirit." But there are Christian associations where men and women do talk out their religion; and my advice to you is to seek out all those things, and remember that just in proportion as you seek such society will you be elevated and blessed. After all, the gospel boat is the only safe boat to sail in.

LAYMEN TO THE FRONT.

I HAVE a sly suspicion that the layman who has for seven years given the most of his time to the study of the truth is better prepared to preach the Gospel than a man who has given that length of time in theological seminaries to the study of what other people say about the Bible. In other words, we like water just dipped from the spring, though handed in a gourd, rather than water that has been standing a week in a silver pitcher. After Calvin has twisted us one way, and Arminius has twisted us another, and we get our head full of the old and new theological fights, and the difference between Ante-Nicene Trinitarianism and Post-Nicene Trinitarianism, it is a luxury to meet some evangelist who can tell us in our common mother tongue of him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. I say let our learned institutions push theological education to its highest excellency, preparing men for spheres which none but the cultured and scholarly are fit for, but somehow let us beat the drum and gather a battalion of lay-workers. We have enough wise men to tell us about fishes, about birds, about rocks, about stars—enough Leyden jars, enough telescopes, enough electric batteries; but we have not more than one man where we ought to have a hundred to tell the story of Christ and the soul.

Some cry out, "It is dangerous to have laymen take such prominent positions in the Church." Dangerous to what? Our dignity, our prerogatives, our clerical rights? It is the same old story. If we have a mill on the stream, we do not want some one else to build a mill on the same stream. It will take the water off our wheel. But, blessed be God! the river of salvation is deep and strong enough to grind corn for all nations. If a pulpit is so weak that the wave of religious zeal on the part of the laity submerges it, then let it go under. We cannot expect all other shipping to forsake the sea lest they run down our craft. We want more watchmen on the wall, more sentinels at the gate, more recruits for the field. Forward the whole Christian laity! Throw up no barrier to their advancement. Do not hang the church until dead by the neck with "red-tape."

A PROMISE OF BETTER THINGS.

THE land is full of prophets, and I have as much right to prophecy as any one. I prophecy that we are coming toward the grandest temporal prosperity we have ever witnessed in this country. Mechanics are going to have larger wages. Capitalists are going to have larger dividends. The factories that are now closed are going to run day and night to meet demands. Stores are going to be crowded with customers, jostling each other and impatient to get waited on. Amid the rapid strides of business attorneys will be called in to interpret legalities, and merchants overworked will want medical attendance, and the churches are going to be abundant with men and women anxious to consecrate their gains to the Lord.

BRIEF NOTES.

Bishop Williams, of Connecticut, president of the Church Temperance Society, has requested the Episcopal clergy to preach of Temperance on Nov. 15.

Evangelist E. W. Bliss is conducting revival meetings at Greenfield, Mass. His services last month in Nova Scotia resulted in a large number of conversions.

Rev. Francis E. Smiley has just closed series of services at Berwick, Pa. There are already indications that a large accession of membership to the churches will result from them.

The McAll Mission in France now has 12 stations and twenty-five schools. Sixty mothers' meetings are held every week at the stations in Paris. The schools have an average attendance of 400 children each.

Rev. B. Fay Mills will commence a series of union evangelistic services in Chicago on November 3. About twenty churches have united in the invitation to the famous evangelist, and their pastors and members will aid him in the work.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the famous Wesleyan minister of London, who has been taking part in the proceedings of the Methodist Ecumenical Council, preached for Dr. Talmage in the Brooklyn Tabernacle on Sunday evening October 18.

Dr. Phillips Brooks was consecrated Bishop of Massachusetts, on Oct. 14, in Trinity Church, Boston, of which he has been so long Rector. Among the Bishops who took part in the ceremony were Bishops Williams, Potter, Clark, Whipple, and Littlejohn.

Rev. E. P. Marvin of Lockport, N. Y., whose articles on prophecy have frequently appeared in this journal has decided to give all his time to Evangelistic work. He has been holding services at Springfield, Ill., and is now commencing an Evangelistic tour in Kansas.

The number of persons who went to Treves to see the so-called Holy Coat during the weeks it was on exhibition was 1,925,133. On October 4th it was removed from its case and put back in its shrine of cedar and mahogany and walled up in the Cathedral Treasury Chamber.

A farewell meeting to Rev. Willis P. Elwood was held at the rooms of the West-side No Day Prayer Meeting on October 23. Mr. Elwood was converted by the blessing of God on his attendance at that meeting some years ago. He and his wife are now going out missionaries to Madura, India.

The School for Christian Workers at Springfield, Mass., reports a large increase in students this year and applications for admission are continually coming to hand. Applications are also numerous for graduates of the school to fill the offices of Superintendents and Secretaries of Sunday Schools, Bible Readers and Home Missionaries.

Dr. Spining, of the Phillips Presbyterian Church, New York, announces a series of Sunday evening sermons on the Twelve Commandments—the ten of Sinai, the Golden Rule and the New Commandment. It may be hoped that they will be well attended for the preacher is powerful and earnest and he has chosen a subject which is too much forgotten in the present day.

A new translation of the Bible into Chinese is projected. The Committee appointed by the Missionary Conference recently held in Shanghai have selected a corps of translators who will have their first meeting early next month. It is expected that the cost will be defrayed by the Bible Societies of the United States, England and Scotland in the proportion of two-fifths each by the former two and one-fifth by the latter.

President Harrison paid a visit on October 17 to the Methodist Ecumenical Council. He was enthusiastically received and made a fitting address. In the course of his remarks he observed, in reference to the question of disarmament and the settlement of international disputes by arbitration: "There is unity of the church and of humanity, and the lines of progress are the same. It is by the great Christian sentiment, characterized only by a high sense of justice, but by a spirit of love and forbearance, mastering the institutions and governments of the world that we shall approach universal peace and adopt arbitration methods of settling disputes."

RECORD OF THE WEEK

Our New Territory—Chicago's Monument to Grant—Free Mail Delivery—European War Rumors—American Sailors Killed in Chili—Sir Edwin Arnold's Visit—General Notes.

GOVERNOR STEELE, of the new Territory of Oklahoma, has just issued his first report which is a most interesting document in some respects. He regrets that Congress made no provision for the establishment of public schools. The settlers, who are mostly poor, have to provide for the education of their children at a great disadvantage. Besides, there are many Indian children in need of education, and these attend the schools opened by the white settlers, although the Indians pay no taxes on their lands. Gov. Steele deprecates the present method of opening up town sites and suggests that hereafter these sites be carefully selected, surveyed, platted and published before being thrown open to settlement. At the recent opening in Tecumseh and Chandler, there were at least 5,000 people waiting the signal to rush in and claim sites containing only 2,400 lots, and one man was killed and several injured in the rush. The desirable class of settlers are frequently crowded out by this riotous system of entering new lands.

Justice Gray's Illness.

A number of the most important cases now before the United States Supreme Court have been postponed in consequence of the absence of two justices, one of whom—Justice Gray—is prostrated with typhoid fever, while the Chief Justice is absent on account of the serious illness of his daughter in Chicago. Justice Gray is a native of Massachusetts, where he was born in 1828. From 1864 to 1882 he was a member of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, and from 1857 to 1860 he practiced law. He has been a prolific author, and is regarded as an authority on constitutional law, "Gray's Reports" being well known to the profession. He was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States by the late President Arthur, in December, 1881.

Mr. Balfour's Appointment.

The most important piece of news from London during the week is the appointment of Hon. Arthur James Balfour, the present Secretary for Ireland, as government leader in the House of Commons. This post has been lately an object of intrigue, and it was understood at different times that Mr. Goschen and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach had been chosen. The new appointee is the cousin of Lord Salisbury. He is, moreover, the only man who has succeeded in establishing a firm administration of Irish affairs. In Parliament this position has at all times been a specially trying one, but Mr. Balfour's course has been marked by the greatest fairness to the Irish members while at the same time properly conservative of the government's interest. As Secretary for Ireland, he has proved himself the strongest man who has ever held the position, which proved so disastrous to Foster, Cavendish and others. He is yet a comparatively young man. Whether his masterful character will make him as successful as a leader as he has been as member of Lord Salisbury's Cabinet, remains to be seen.

Chicago's Monument to General Grant.

The $65,000 monument erected in Chicago to the late General Grant, which was recently unveiled, is one of the grandest testimonials yet raised to the nation's hero. The unveiling was made the occasion of a great military display, which included a procession of 20,000 soldiers, ex-soldiers and militia, besides a number of patriotic orders and other organizations. Seen from the lake, the monument presents a most imposing appearance. Over two hundred vessels, headed by the U. S. S. Michigan, saluted as the statue was unveiled. Bishop Newman presided at the opening ceremony and Miss Mary Strong, daughter of the late General W. E. Strong, pulled the cord and disclosed the beautiful equestrian figure on top of the monument. President Goudy of the Lincoln Park Commissioners accepted the statue in the name of the Park Commissioners and Mayor Washburn followed in behalf of the city. Mrs. Grant was present accompanied by a distinguished party. This is the second statue erected to Gen. Grant in Illinois, the first being at Galena which honored its old townsman some time ago.

Mail Delivery for Farmers.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL WANAMAKER is considering the advisability of introducing the private mail-box system. The idea is to reduce the force of mail-carriers by having every household furnish his front door with a private mail box. An effort is being made to secure from Congress free mail delivery in country towns, and the Farmers' Alliance, Patrons of Husbandry and similar organizations are urging Congressmen to press the matter. It is claimed by farmers that a daily mail delivery at their doors will add to the value of their lands and help to make agricultural life less isolated and monotonous. Mr. Wanamaker, too, seems to look upon the proposition with some favor, and has stated lately that the experiment of free delivery, which his department made in a few districts, shows that the increased revenue from that source will more than pay the expense. He believes that universal free delivery would soon be self-sustaining.

European War Rumors.

The character of the rumors from Europe during the week has been somewhat ominous, as affecting the continued peace of that continent. Russia, with an eye to future possibilities, recently sent its ablest and most experienced diplomat, Mons. de Giers, Minister of Foreign Affairs, to King Humbert of Italy, with the view of negotiating an arrangement that would have the effect of neutralizing Italy's connection with the Triple Alliance. Under the present agreement of the Dreibund, Italy consents to come to the aid of Germany only if the latter power should be simultaneously attacked by France and Russia. An attack by either singly, or a movement by Russia from Constantinople, or an offensive demonstration by the Czar's armies affecting Austria's interests, would not be considered sufficient to warrant Italy in involving its tax-burdened people in an expensive war. Italy and England have a secret understanding whereby, in the event of Italy's coast being threatened, England will defend it with her navy, and in return Italy promises to sustain English interests in the Mediterranean and to co-operate in maintaining the neutrality of the Bosphorus. In other words, Italy and England together will keep Russia's fleet from passing the Dardanelles. King Humbert and Premier Rudini, while impressed by the mission of Mons. de Giers, are believed to have declined the implied offer of French naval protection along the Italian coast in place of English, involving as it would have done, the breaking of faith with England. The Triple Alliance thus stands intact and Russia must look elsewhere for support. Meanwhile the massing of Russia's troops along the Austrian frontier continues, and there are indications that the Czar is meditating an attack on Constantinople. Simultaneously Russia is menacing the Afghan frontier, and is apparently anxious to create a pretext for war with that country. The Ameer is friendly to England and will depend on English co-operation should war ensue.

American Sailors Killed in Chili.

SOME excitement was caused in Washington last week by the news that several American sailors had been killed in the streets of Valparaiso, Chili, and a number wounded, by Chilean marines. Later information showed that the unfortunate affair sprang out of a brawl among the men themselves and had no international significance. It is, however, unquestioned that there is a very bitter feeling in Chili against Americans, and this has been more marked than ever since the triumph of the Junta. The blue-jackets belonged to the United States cruiser, Baltimore. A number of Chileans were badly wounded in the melee. It has been ascertained that the Chileans were the aggressors in the disturbance and were armed with knives, while the Americans had but few weapons. The better class of Chileans condemn the outrage and the Valparaiso authorities are making an investigation.

Annexation Sentiment in Canada.

A GREAT revolution in sentiment concerning annexation is taking place in Canada. Premier Abbott is naturally anxious, more particularly in view of the fact that some of the most ardent supporters of the late Sir John Macdonald have gone over to the side of the annexationists. Some of the later accessions to the annexation ranks, in their new-found enthusiasm, go so far as to declare that political union alone can save Canada from bankruptcy and ruin. There are more than one hundred seats in Parliament protested, and from fifty to seventy-five elections will be held during the next six months, in all of which the question of political union with the United States will be made a prominent issue.

A Distinguished Visitor.

ONE of the best-known men in the world of letters, a leading London editor, and a famous Sanskrit scholar, has arrived in this country, and Americans will have the opportunity of forming the acquaintance of Sir Edwin Arnold during the next few weeks. Sir Edwin is perhaps best known as the author of The Light of Asia, an exquisite poem giving the life and teachings of Gautama, the sacred apostle of the Buddhists. Sir Edwin was born in England, in 1832. Always a close student from boyhood, his first business in life was teaching school at Birmingham. Subsequently he was President of a Sanskrit College in India. From time to time he issued volumes of poems and prose, always of a philosophic character, and including translations from the Greek and Sanskrit. He has, besides, contributed a variety of articles to periodical literature and history. He was in this country as a correspondent during the war, and was a staunch Union man. Knighthood was conferred on the famous author in 1887. In addition to a multitude of other duties he finds time to write much for his paper, The Telegraph. Since the death of his wife, several years ago, the greater part of his summers have been spent in Japan. His house at Azabu, near Tokio, is a charming hermitage and there he has passed several seasons with his daughter, who inherits many of her father's literary gifts. A portrait of Sir Edwin is given above.

Russia's Starving Millions.

WHATEVER Russia's intentions may be as to disturbing the peace of Europe, it is certain that the Czar has at present a more urgent problem to deal with than that of conquest. How to succor the starving millions is the question of the moment. The government has taken a most active share in the work of relief, and the Czarina, it is said, has appropriated ten million dollars from the Privy purse, for that purpose while all the higher officials are contributing liberally. Officers, students, and wealthy citizens are renouncing fashionable luxuries for the sake of the poor peasants. The sufferers have appealed to the Emperor as their "Father," having been rendered desperate by the inattention of subordinate officials. What has been done thus far, however, amounts to little in comparison with the extent of the famine.

Death of a Noted Diplomat.

Few men representing foreign governments have been better known in Washington than Count Ludwig von Arco-Valley, the German Minister to this country, who died in Berlin last week. For several years his health has been failing, and he lately put himself under the care of the famous Professor Bergmann, of Berlin; his stomach having absolutely refused to receive food. Medical science was of no avail, however and death supervened. For three years, Count von Arco-Valley represented Germany at the National Capital where he was a great social favorite, and ranked high as a diplomat. Born in Bavaria, in 1845, he studied law, but abandoned it in 1867 for the diplomatic service. He was not only an able statesman but a brave soldier. During the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, he was captured by the French, and only saved from being shot as a spy by the intervention of President Thiers. He served his country successively as its representative at Madrid, Paris, London, and Rome before coming to the United States. A portrait of Count von Arco-Valley is given above.

COUNT ARCO-VALLEY.

NEWS NOTES.

The whole Russian loan has now been taken, France been the largest of the investors.

The Negus of Abyssinia has repudiated the Italian Protectorate. This is believed to be due to Russian interference.

Italy and Germany have both reconsidered their prohibition of American pork and France is about to take a similar step.

All the representatives of the Foreign powers except the United States have broken off diplomatic relations with China.

By the bursting of a fly-wheel in the Amoskeag Mills, at Manchester, N. H., an engineer and three operatives were killed and six others injured.

The Nationalist party at Hawaii are agitating for the establishment of a Republic, this being apparently the only means of escaping English domination.

The New York Board of Education's budget for the coming year asks $4,627,832.30 for the public schools. French and German are to be taught in the schools hereafter.

A train on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad left the track at Hicksville, Ind., a few days ago, and two persons were killed and several injured, including Vice-president King among the latter.

Nearly fifty members of the W. C. T. U. Convention at Bradford, Pa., were suddenly taken sick, after eating a lunch which is supposed to have contained some poisonous ingredient. After considerable suffering, all recovered.

Andrew Carnegie, the millionaire philanthropist, will construct a tower higher than the Eiffel as an adjunct to the World's Fair. It will be 1,120 feet high and will accommodate 25,000 people at one time. It is to cost $1,500,000.

A Socialist Congress has been in session at Erfurt the past week. It was stated that during the year, sentences of imprisonment aggregating seventy-seven years had been imposed upon Socialists in Germany.

A fast train on the Chicago and Eastern Illinois Railroad ran into a switch at Crete, Ill., a few days ago, wrecking the engine and killing the engineer and three newspaper men who were riding on the locomotive. The latter were there for the purpose of writing a descriptive illustrated story of the "Midnight Ride."

Among the noted persons who have passed away recently are Mrs. Allen G. Thurman (whose life was sketched in these columns lately) and James Parton, the author and biographer of Horace Greeley. Mr. Parton was a prolific writer and published many biographical works that are now regarded as standard.

ALMOST SAVED.

"Remember Lot's Wife." Luke 17: 32.

IT was the purpose of God always to maintain a testimony for truth and righteousness in the midst of this ungodly world. For this end of old he set apart for himself a chosen family with whom he had fellowship. Abraham was the man whom God chose, that in him and in his household the witness might be preserved. Abraham, being called, obeyed and went forth, not knowing whither he went. With him was his nephew Lot, who also left Haran at the divine call, and shared with the patriarch his wanderings in Canaan and in Egypt. He was not a man of so noble a soul, but was greatly influenced by the stronger mind of his uncle Abraham. He was sincere, no doubt, and is justly called righteous Lot, but he was fitter to be a follower than a leader. He also sojourned in tents, and led the separated life, until it became necessary for him to become an independent chieftain, because the flocks and herds of the two families had so greatly multiplied that they could not well be kept together. Then came out the weak side of Lot's character. He did not give Abraham the choice in selecting a sheep walk, but like all weak natures he selfishly consulted his own advantage, and determined to go in the direction of the cities in the plain of Jordan, where well watered pastures abounded. This led to his dwelling near the cities of the plain, where crime had reached its utmost point of horrible degradation. We read that "he pitched his tent toward Sodom;" he found it convenient to be near a settled people, and to enter into friendly relations with them, though he must have known what the men of Sodom were, for the cry of them had gone forth far and wide.

Being still a man of God, he could not be allowed to die in such society; it was not to be endured that "just Lot" should lay his bones in the graveyard of filthy Sodom. If God would save a man he must fetch him out from the world. And so it came to pass that Lot was forced out; he was placed in such a strait that he must either run for his life or perish in the general burning.

But the text saith, "Remember Lot's wife," and therefore I must let the husband go, and call your attention to her who, in this case, is "his worse half." When the time for separation arrived Lot's wife could not tear herself away from the world. That is the subject of our discourse. The love of the world is death. Those who cling to sin must perish, be they who they may.

I. Our first call is—remember that

She Was Lot's Wife.

She was the wife of a man who, with all his faults, was a righteous man. She was united to him in the closest possible bonds, and yet she perished. She had dwelt in tents with holy Abraham, and seemed to be a sharer in all the privileges of the separated people, and yet she perished. She was dear to one who had been dear to the father of the faithful, and yet for all that she perished in her sin. This note of warning we would strike very loudly, for, commonplace as the truth is, it needs often to be repeated that ties of blood are no guarantees of grace. You may be the wife of the most saintly man of God and yet be a daughter of Belial; or you may be the husband of one of the King's daughters and yet be yourself a castaway. You may be the child of a prophet and yet the curse of the prophet's God may light upon you.

Being Lot's wife, remember that she had since her marriage

Shared With Lot

in his journeys and adventures and trials. We cannot tell exactly when she became Lot's wife, but we incline to the belief that it was after he had left Haran, for when Abraham left Haran we read that he took "Sarai, his wife, and Lot his brother's son," but we do not read of Lot's wife. The name of Abraham's wife is given, but of Lot's wife there is no mention whatever. Again, we read, "Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the south." "And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents," but nothing is said about his having a wife. Probably, either in Canaan or in Egypt, Lot married a Canaanite or an Egyptian woman, a person utterly unworthy to be taken into the holy household, and therefore the marriage is not recorded. Whether it be so or no, it is certain that she had shared with Lot in the capture of the city of Sodom; she had seen the ruthless sword slay the inhabitants, and she herself with her husband had been among the captives, and she had been delivered by the good sword of Abraham. So that she had been a partaker of her husband's trials and deliverances and yet she was lost. It would be a sad, sad thing if there should come between those united by marriage bonds: that we should live together, and work together, and suffer together, and should be delivered by the providence of God many a time together, and should see our children grow up together, and yet should be torn asunder at the last never to meet again: this is a prospect which we dare not think upon. This makes the remembrance of Lot's wife a very solemn thing to those who are allied by ties of kindred to the people of God.

An Eternal Severance

Lot's wife had also shared her husband's privileges. Her husband had not forgotten his association with Abraham, and he could not have failed to communicate his knowledge to her. Even in Sodom her husband kept up such separateness as he could in such an evil place, and she saw the goodness of the man with all his mistakes. When Sodom must be destroyed the angels came to their house, and she herself helped to entertain them. She received the merciful warning to escape as well as her husband, and she was urged as much as he to flee from the wrath so near at hand. Thus is it with many of you who are enjoying Christian privileges and are yet unsaved.

A Worldly Woman.

Lot's wife had shared in her husband's errors. It was a great mistake on his part to abandon the outwardly separated life, but she had kept to him in it, and perhaps was the cause of his so doing. He was a man of weak mind, and while his uncle had him under his wing he was right enough, except that even then he had what a writer calls "a lean-to religion"; he did not stand alone, but leaned upon Abraham. When he was married it is probable that his wife assumed the ruling place, and guided the way of his life. She began to think that it was a pity that the family should live in such separation, so unfashionable, so rigid, and peculiar, and all that. She tossed her head, and cried, "Really, people must mix with society, and not keep up old-fashioned, strait-laced ways. You might as well be dead as be shut out from life." When her husband had an opportunity of getting out of that rigid style by leaving his uncle she said she would like to go down Sodom way, because it would be nice for the girls, and give them a taste of something liberal and refined.

The Old Style

was all very suitable for such an antiquated couple as Abraham and Sarah, but Lot and herself belonged to a younger generation, and were bound to get into a little society, and find eligible matches for their young people. It would be well for them to dress better than they could learn to do if they always kept roaming about like gypsies. By some such talk Mistress Lot gained her husband over to her way of thinking.

They did not mean actually to go into the worst society of Sodom, but they intended to make a careful selection, and go only a little way. Surely they could be trusted to know where to stop. So they pitched the tent towards Sodom, where it was within an easy walk of the town, a little separated, but not far. Very sweet the city life became. The free and easy ways of Sodom came to be enjoyable. Not the gross part of Sodom life, that Lot could not bear, and it made Mistress Lot uncomfortable at times, but the liberal spirit, the fine free bearing of the people, their gaiety and artistic culture, were quite to her mind; and so she was right glad when her husband put away the old tent, had a sale of the sheep, and lived as a retired grazier in the west end of the city.

The City Home.

I think I am not mistaken in the conjecture that Mistress Lot's influence brought her husband there, and when there introduced him to the best families, and found suitors for the daughters, who had been fully imbued with the liberal ideas of the place. At any rate, whatever were his faults she was a partaker in them: she was with him in the choosing the plain of Jordan, with him in the pitching of the tent towards Sodom, with him in settling in Sodom, yet at last she was separated from him for ever. Oh, you that are Christian people because your friends are Christian people, you that associate with us because it happens to be the way in which you were brought up, the time will come when the secret attachment of your hearts towards a giddy world will show itself more clearly, and in a fatal moment you will give a love look towards sin which will prove you not to belong to the people of God. Then will it happen to you according to the word of the apostle, "It had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them."

II. And now, secondly, "Remember Lot's wife," and recollect that towards being saved. Mistress Lot so far believed the message that came to her about the destruction of the city that she was aroused. She rose early as her husband did, and she prepared to leave the house. There is one very solemn thought and that is, that the angels' hand had pressed her wrist. When they said, "Up, get you gone," and Lot lingered,—the men laid hold upon his hand, and the hand of his wife. So it is expressly said. An angel's hand had pressed her wrist to draw her forth in safety, and she had gone a little way under that sacred constraint; and yet she perished. Some of you may have had spiritual touches upon the conscience and heart, which you will never be able quite to forget, and the responsibility of this will cling to you, though you have drawn back from godliness and your heart crieth after vanity, and lusteth after its idols.

She Went Some Way

This woman was actually out of Sodom, and she was almost in Zoar, the refuge city, and yet she perished. How near she was to the little city of escape I cannot tell, but she was certainly almost there, and yet she perished. Almost saved, but not quite. Let me repeat those words, for they describe some of you who are present at this hour, and they may be your epitaph if you do not mind what you are about: "Almost saved, but not quite." Escaped from the vilest form of sin, but not truly in Christ; the mind not weaned from its idols, iniquity not given up in the soul, though perhaps given up in outward deed. O you who are almost saved, but not quite, "Remember Lot's wife."

III. This brings me to a third point of remembrance, which is this: remember that though she went some way toward escape

She Did Actually Perish

through sin. The first sin that she committed was that she lingered behind. Moses tells us "Lot's wife looked back from behind him." That is the good old man was making such haste as he could; but she, though she had run with him side by side, lingered in the rear. That is the first sin with most people who profess religion, but are not true to God: they begin to backslide by creeping along very slowly, they are not half so earnest as they used to be, they lag behind. One service a day is sufficient, a very little reading of the Bible contents them; they do not quite give up the appearance of prayer, but still there is very little of it; they do not see the good of being in such a fury over religion; they do not see why they should exercise any sacred violence to take the kingdom by force. They linger. It is because after all the world is master of their hearts; they would if they dare be as worldly and as ungodly as others, and they prove their true character by

Slackening Their Pace.

Having slackened her pace, the next thing she did was she disbelieved what had been told her. You must remember that their flight out of Sodom was to be an act of faith; for the angel said, "Look not behind thee." Lot's wife saw the sun rising, so we are told: "the sun had risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar." She saw the bright dawning and everything lit up with it, and it came across her mind—"It cannot be true, the city is not being destroyed. What a lovely morning! Why are we thus running away from house, and goods, and friends, and everything else on such a bright, clear morning as this?" She did not truly believe, there was no real faith in her heart, and therefore she disobeyed the law of her safety and turned her face towards Sodom. What if some of you that have mingled with the godly, and have been numbered with them, and have participated in their worship, should, nevertheless, come short because of unbelief!

Having got so far as lingering and doubting, her next movement was a direct act of rebellion,—she turned her head: she was bidden not to look, but she dared to look. Rebellion is as much seen in the breach of what appears to be a little command as in the violation of a great precept. Take care of little things. There is life in a look, and here is a case in which there was

Death in a Look.

That glance betrayed which way her soul was going: a little thing in professors may show what they are, and we may readily betray the inward turning of the soul by an act as simple as that of turning the neck to look towards Sodom. This was her sin.

Now, dear friends, let us remember Lot's wife each one of us by learning a personal lesson. Here is a hard thing; we must go without the camp, or utterly fail. Can you maintain the life of God and walk with Christ, and be

Separate From the World?

Many of you apparently cannot; you may pretend to do so, but you cannot, it is beyond you. I fear that the number of true Christians in the world is very much less than we suppose. We are encumbered with a host of people who call themselves Christians, but are as much of the world as other people, whose inheritance is in the world, whose pleasure is in the world, whose speech is worldly, and who are altogether of the world; and because they are of the world the world loves its own; and therefore there is little or no strife between them and the world. You will be judged according to the going of your heart. If your heart goes toward the mountain to escape, and if you hasten to be away with Christ to be his separated follower, you shall be saved: but if your heart still goes after evil and sin, his servants ye are whom ye obey, and from your evil master you shall get your black reward.

IV. Hence comes our remembrance of Lot's wife in the fourth and most solemn place, and that is—remember that

Her Doom was Terrible.

"Remember Lot's wife." Remember that she perished with the same doom as that which happened to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, but that doom befell her at the gates of Zoar. Oh, if I must be damned, let it be with the mass of the ungodly, having always been one of them; but to get up to the very gates of heaven, and to perish there, will be a most awful thing! To have lived with God's people, to have been numbered with them, to have been joined to them by ties of blood, and then after all to perish, will be horrible indeed! To have heard the Gospel, to have felt the Gospel, too, in a measure, to have amended one's life because of it, to have escaped from the filthiest corruption of the world, and to have become moral, and amiable, and excellent, and yet still not to have been weaned from the world, not to have been clean divorced from sin, and so to perish,—the thought is intolerable.

The worst point, perhaps, about the perishing of Lot's wife lay in this, that she perished in the very act of sin, and had no space for repentance given her. In the instant she turned her head she was a pillar of salt. It is a dreadful thing to die to be caught away by the justice of God while the sin is being perpetrated. Yet such a thing may happen, and let those who profess to be Christians and yet parley with sin "remember Lot's wife," and how swift God is to deal out his judgment against professors who betray his holy name and cause.

I cannot help going back to the text I started with, which was one of my own making, and that is, "Remember Lot." Though Lot himself was a righteous man and escaped from the doom of the wicked city, yet I cannot help tracing the death of Lot's wife in some degree to her husband. It was partly Lot's own doing that his wife became what she was. If Lot had never gone to Sodom his wife would not have perished near it. Look to yourselves lest ye lead others astray. Keep near to God and you will be blessed and become a blessing to others. Abraham did not have this trouble with Sarah, nor Isaac with Rebekah, for they walked with God, and their influence was felt in their tents. Live near to God, and let your own life be according to the command which God gave the patriarch—"Walk with me and be thou perfect," and you shall see that he will bless your household, and your children after you; but if you do not thus walk before the Lord you will have to "remember Lot's wife." May God add his blessing on these words, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE RIOTS IN CHINA.

Ichang the Scene of the Disturbance.—Missionaries at Wu-Chang and Chungking in Danger.

ALREADY stated in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the situation of the American and European Missionaries in China is extremely critical. The rioting at Ichang, which was referred to in these columns, seems to have been temporarily suspended; but there is little prospect of a lasting peace, as the Hunan soldiery—a lawless and undisciplined body—are not controlled by the government and are indeed encouraged by the mandarins in their excesses.

In this column we give an illustration showing the scene of the recent disturbance at Ichang. On the bank of the river are seen the Mission buildings that were attacked by the rioters, and several of which are now in ashes. From the elevation in front of the Franciscan Mission, seven of the Sisters belonging to the Mission were hurled into the river Yang-tze-Kiang, from which they were rescued with great difficulty by some friendly boatmen and conveyed on board the steamer Paihou. A short distance from the Mission buildings, on the same side of the river, is the British Consulate which was attacked and burned. The houses of Messrs Cain and Alldridge, connected with the American Mission, were also burned, while that of Mr. Cockburn, of the Scottish Mission, was looted by the fanatical mob. Several of the Franciscan Sisters and one of the priests were badly hurt while endeavoring to save some of their belongings in the Mission buildings from the plunderers. Investigation has shown that the rising in Ichang was planned at Kalashui, and executed by disguised Hunan soldiers, who acted under the orders of secret leaders.

The scenes of almost all of these riots have been upon the great Chinese water-way, the river Yang-tze-Kiang. On this river are the five cities known as "the Treaty Ports"—the only places in the interior of China where Europeans and Americans other than missionaries are permitted to live. In the treaty between China and the European powers, it was agreed that this river should be open to European vessels from Shanghai at the mouth, as far up as Ichang. There are in China numerous secret revolutionary societies that obstinately oppose foreigners at every point, and they specially object to religious proselytizing. Indeed, the pretext offered for the recent uprising at Ichang was the alleged stealing of a child by some of the Sisters at the convent there—a matter that has not been explained. The town is 200 miles above Hankow, and 800 from Shanghai, and the river at that point is only navigable by small vessels and river steamers.

There are signs of a revolt at Wu-Chang, the seat of the Viceroy, opposite Hankow, and also at Wuhu, still further down the river. There are several American Missionaries of the Protestant Episcopal Church located at Wu-Chang, one of them being Mr. S. C. Partridge. Letters received in this country from the American Missionaries at Wu-Chang indicate that they are preparing for an outbreak there. Mr. Partridge is in charge of a Mission school, with about 200 scholars, and in the event of trouble he believes they will prove loyal to the mission and side with its defenders.

All the foreign powers have brought pressure to bear upon China to repress further attempts at outrage by sending a strong force to the province of Hunan. Should China fail, there is little doubt that a formidable naval demonstration will take place, which must have the effect of bringing about the desired condition of peace and security for the foreigners. It is absolutely necessary that some decisive step should be taken, as there are twenty Missions at Chungking, several hundred miles above Ichang. These missionaries are making that place a centre for Gospel work in the great western province of Sze-chuen. Their peril is imminent, and should a rising take place at Chungking, it might be even a more serious matter than at Ichang.

PARIS IN 1789.*

WHAT a varied spectacle! What a tragic comedy! What diverse figures! What contradictory emotions! What an amalgam of ideas and passions, of vices and virtues! Here marquises and dukes; there people of the faubourgs and insurgents. Red heels here; red bonnets there. Here the language of the courts; there the jabber of the market-place. In the Tuileries, elegance still, and politeness and the chivalrous manners of the old regime; and a stone's throw distant, in the pestilent streets neighboring the Carrousel, the threats and hatred of a populace in rags; a little beyond, in the galleries of the Palais Royal, speech-making agitators and the abandoned women who played such a leading part in the October days; beside the garden of the Tuileries, the riding school wherein the National Assembly holds its noisy sessions, its bitter discussions, and the stormy eloquence of Mirabeau, the thunderer; on every street, in every square, colporteurs shouting forth their lies, news-mongers, Paul Prys, gossips who delight in calumny and the unhealthy emotions of sedition, who play at being soldiers in the National Guard, at Politics in the cafes, at demagoguery in the clubs, mischief-makers who amuse themselves by rekindling everywhere badly extinguished firebrands; in the outskirts of Paris the principal soldiers of the insurrection, the future Septembrists, the future furies of the guillotine. What blows! What shocks! This old regime which is dead—this new regime which is still unborn. What a chaos!

The revolution is everywhere. Even in the salons of the Faubourg Saint Germain there is a left and a right who dispute as bitterly as they do in the National Assembly. What is most striking in the scene is its extreme variety. Count de Segur, coming back from his embassy at St. Petersburg, shows us the different aspects presented by the capital in a single day. In the morning he goes to see Baron de Besenval who is shut up in prison for having resisted the riot when commanding the troops of the Parisian garrison at the beginning of the revolution. Some madmen accusing the judges of delay, and the authorities of treason, are shouting loudly for the prisoner's head. . . . An hour later, M. de Segur is on the Place de Greve. There he sees many assemblages which the National Guard is painfully endeavoring to disperse. From there he goes to the Market, where he has before him a great public mart in full activity, as in the midst of the profoundest peace. Then he goes to the Palais Royal. He enters that famous garden, the centre of industry, the focus of corruption, an arena always open to the seditious, who make it the rendezvous of their machinations. A curious crowd is surrounding a man who, mounted on a table is declaiming vehemently against the perfidy of the court, the pride of the nobles, the cupidity of the rich, the inertia of the legislators, and who concludes, applauded by some and criticized by others, by proposing incendiary motions. Disgusted by this scene, Count de Segur goes away and enters the garden of the Tuileries. The weather is splendid. The terrace and the alleys are filled with peaceful promenaders. One would think it was a holiday. In the evening to banish the memories of the day M. de Segur goes to the opera. Here he is tempted to imagine that up to now he has been dreaming. Over the volcano, around the crater whence flames and lava are about to pour, there are still greensward, fields and flowers. . . . And yet, shaken as it is, royalty, with an abler monarch, would still have great resources. Betrayed by itself, rather than by the feebleness and incapacity of its defenders, it still sustains itself, and Louis XVI. needs three years more to consummate a downfall wrought chiefly by himself.

A TRANSPARENT WORLD.

THE clear vision of childhood becomes gradually dimmed by earthliness, but beauty and truth remain within all forms, and the poet sees them, "through a glass darkly," by signs and similitudes. St. Paul was giving utterance to the deepest poetic reality when he said that "the invisible things of him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived through the things that are made." Nature is one vast metaphor, through which spiritual truth may be read. As our hearts harden with worldliness, we must be spoken to in parables. But to the children of the kingdom, the hidden mysteries around them are continually unveiled. In nature, as in all things and everywhere, the pure in heart see God.

And the pure in heart not only see God themselves, but they become a medium for transmitting his thoughts to others. It is at last as if God were thinking through every look and movement of the purified soul. And two souls, whose vision has grown clear with his purity, scarcely have need of speech when they meet. The crystal between them is without a film. They "know as they are known." All living things bear their messages from heart to heart, as from heaven to heaven.

The Three-fold Chord.

No two imperfect beings can form a perfect friendship. But let them be united in the love of another, a perfect Being—there is but one such—and their friendship is as firm as eternity. This is the three-fold chord which is not easily broken. Two lives which depend only upon each other, will always be loosening their hold and slipping apart; they must feel themselves interwound with a stronger, invisible Life, before they can be really sure of each other, with an indestructible, uniting substance, which penetrates their mutual affection, and makes it enduring. That Substance, that Being, is God.

All love is of God. Every true friend is a glimpse of God. The affection that leaves him out, loses its divinest sweetness. No friend is truly known or loved, until known and loved in God.

Earth a School-room.

Earth is a school-room; and Heaven will be a school-room also for us who, through all eternity, must aspire to know more of God, and to penetrate truth which is forever deepening into the impenetrable. When we learn as they do in Heaven, we shall learn not merely "for knowing's sake," not from curiosity or pride of acquisition, but for love; for the sake of giving what we have received. We can never comprehend the Infinite Love except through loving infinitely. We are only then aware of our own greatness, when we feel the Divine Life flowing through ours. This, then, is the grandeur of living, the power of our immortality, "the power of an endless life," to receive and radiate the life of God. To know Christ, through sharing in the spirit of His sacrifice, is to have entered into eternal life. We count our lives no longer by minutes or seconds, by days and years and seasons, but by his infinite heart-throbs, pulsating through every fibre of our being, and so keeping the world warned for its desolate and wandering children, our Father's family, for whom he lived and died. The one true satisfaction of our souls, on earth or in Heaven, is the awaking ever more and more perfectly into His likeness.

THE TWO WITNESSES.

The Execution, Exposure, and Rapture of Those Who Protest Against Anti-Christ.

BY D. N. LORD.*

HOW gigantic will be the struggle of the Two Witnesses against the coming Anti-christ is distinctly foreshown in Revelation 11, and intimations are there given of the great question that is to be the subject of the conflict. It is to be—not whether the Scriptures are a Divine revelation: not whether men owe a homage to the Creator: not whether subjects are bound to render obedience to rulers in their proper sphere—but the far higher question, Who is God? Who is the rightful law-giver and ruler of the Church? Jehovah? The Lord Jesus Christ who has all power in heaven and on earth? Or the imperial chief of the ten kingdoms, and the Roman Catholic pope and hierarchy?

For the arrogation of authority over God's worshippers, and over his laws, by the civil rulers and the hierarchy of Antichrist's spiritual ally the False Prophet, implies that their prerogatives in that sphere are higher than God's—that they have a right to dictate the faith and worship of those of his creatures who are their subjects; to set aside his appointments, and instituted a false method of redemption and a false worship in place of his; and to force those under their control to yield submission to their will; or else to punish their refusal by

Torture and Death.

This question will, therefore, become invested at that crisis with the highest significance; will fill the whole sphere of vision, and will be debated with the utmost fullness. It is to be for the Word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus, like the prophet (Rev. 1:9), that they are to be arraigned: and it is to be for their inflexible adherence to that Word and testimony, and rejection of the impious claims of their persecutors, that they are to be condemned and put to death.

A total revolution is to be wrought in the views of God's own children, who have previously assented to the dictation of rulers and ecclesiastics of their faith, their rites, and their worship, to their subjects: that will require, with many with prepossessions, party prejudices, cherished friends, and worldly interests, ere they reach the truth in its greatness and sacredness, and are prepared to give their adhesion to it at the price of their lives. Some will fall, some will falter; but the true people of God will at length see and embrace the teaching of His word with untrembling hearts, and will be ready for the consequences that may result from their fidelity.

The Witnesses who are to be put to death are to die in the full expectation of being, at the end of three years and a half from their martyrdom, raised from death to immortality and glory. That they and their associated believers are to cherish and avow that persuasion, and that it is to be fully understood by their persecutors, is clear from the care those who put them to death are to take, to conform all their measures to the prophecy of their death, their non-burial, their exposure to the gaze of spectators, and their resurrection at the end of three years and a half. At length comes. The Spirit of life from God enters into their dead bodies and they stand on their feet. A great fear falls upon those who see them; and they hear a great voice from heaven saying unto them, "Come up hither. And they ascend into the sky in a cloud, and their enemies behold them" (5: 11, 12.) Who can paint the impressions that amazing spectacle will make on those who witness it? What other deliverance of his children of which the world has ever been the scene, carried with it so resistless and sublime an expression of God's approval? What other seal set on the brows of those whom he redeems, ever indicated with such strength and resplendence that they are his? No bosom will be untouched: no spirit will remain unawed. No one will doubt the reality of the resurrection. No one will persuade himself that the revivification of the martyrs, and their assumption to heaven, are not the work of God. And none will fail to see how majestic a vindication it forms of the martyrs; and with what terrific emphasis it speaks the condemnation of their murderers.

The testimony, the death, and the resurrection of the Witnesses are thus to form an epoch in the annals of the earth. They are to have the greatest conspicuity. The knowledge of them is to be carried to every bosom in the civilised world, and to thousands and millions of the Pagan and Mohammedan races.

They are to work the most radical, the most comprehensive, and the most momentous revolution in the views of the true worshippers themselves, that ever took place in respect to the incommunicableness and sanctity of God's rights, and the guilt of the arrogation of his place and prerogatives by human rulers, and ecclesiastics: and are to give rise to a train of consequences of the greatest significance; prompting in a degree on the one side, the dragon, the wild beast, and the false prophet, to the measures they are to take to retrieve their cause from the shock it will have received; and exciting the multitude on the other, in defiance of their will, to make the war on Babylon the great in which she is to fall from nationalisation and perish.

MR. MOODY'S APPEAL.

THE Christian public, to whom Mr. D. L. Moody appeals through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to-day, needs no words from us to commend the eminent Evangelist's statements to practical consideration. No people know better than the wide circle of our readers, living as they do, in all our States and Territories and in foreign lands, how urgent is the need which is pressing on Mr. Moody's heart for more laborers in the great harvest field.

Mr. Moody writes:

How shall the call be answered? How shall the increasing demand for laborers be met? The Lord has put his spirit upon many young men and women, some of them but recently converted, most of them without early advantages, a majority of them poor, but with valuable discipline and experience of hard labor, privation, and struggle; and these men and women are standing before the churches, as if in answer to the prayers for laborers, waiting for some Christian hand to help them into the field of service. They must have some preparation, some training, to do the work which the Lord has laid on their hearts. Where shall they get it?

For the training of just such persons provision has been made in the schools which have sprung up under the hand of the Lord at Chicago. The Chicago Bible Institute provides for thorough instruction in the Word of God, in music, and in methods of Christian work, training the students through actual experience of city mission work and use of the Bible for such service as they seek. The school thus serves also as a testing-place where all students can satisfy themselves and others, by actual experiment, as to whether they are fitted for the particular calling which they may have chosen. In this school there might and should be a thousand students in course of training. The rates for tuition and board have been put as low as possible, far below the real cost, or only $150 a year.

But what can be done for the young men and women, of the very class most desired and needed, who cannot enter the institute even at such a low rate, because they have no means? How can they enter? In this way: Christian people who realize that they are stewards of God can supply the means, thus enabling such persons to prepare for a life-work of Christian service in schools, mission fields, churches, homes, and places of business. Can money be put to better use than thus to transmute it into Christian character, life and service?

Many are doing this. Many more ought to do it. Many more will do it when they begin to realize the privilege and the joy of it. Here is an open door of great usefulness. Will you not come to the help of some young man or woman who longs for a chance to prepare for more efficient Christian work, but cannot provide the necessary means?

May I make this letter so personal as to ask if you could not undertake the support of a student for a single year?

The reports of that student's work during the year will, I believe, amply repay the investment. Only eternity can reveal the good that you may thus do by a little timely help, working on in other lives to the end of time. The work is great; the time is short; what we do we must do quickly. Let us do it: I shall be glad to hear from any friends who may be moved to help in this great work. Your fellow-servant in Christ,
D. L. Moody.

LED BY THE SPIRIT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 8. Isa. 44: 3; John 14: 15, 16; Acts 5: 32.

SOCRATES is represented by Plato as having led his disciple to admit that happiness consists in virtue, and that vice is ignoble and slavish, and then asking him why, if he really did believe that fact, he was not always virtuous. The same problem confronts every man as to himself and others. Intellectual assent to a doctrine does not insure a life in accord with the doctrine. The hearer in the pew assents to all that the preacher advances, accepts his premises, finds no fault with his logic, and agrees in his conclusion; yet goes away and acts contrary to it. The trouble is that correct thinking is not followed by corresponding action. One of the greatest philosophers and logicians of the day has said that if the offer were made to him that he should be assured of always doing what he believed to be right, on condition of being turned into a sort of clock and wound up every morning, he would accept the offer. Every man who has made a good resolution has had reason to lament that he has not kept it. When he broke it, he did not lose his intellectual faith in it. That remained, but the will and the power failed him. It is always as the Apostle said: "The good that I would I do not: the evil that I would not, that I do." What we need is some power that will affect the springs of action. This power is our "Topic."

Led by the Spirit. That is the power of which we are in search. The child with his hand clasped in the hand of his father goes safely through the crowded thoroughfare, crosses the roadway among rapidly moving vehicles, escapes this peril and that one, avoids wrong turnings and arrives unharmed at his destination. Let him loose that guiding hand and he becomes bewildered and may fall into mischief, or may be hurt. The Spirit is the father's hand. He is called the finger of God. He leads to right acting as well as right thinking. He takes of the things of Christ and shows them to us. He enables us to see and love the ineffable beauty of righteousness. He raises our ideal and gives perception to the spiritual eye. He causes us to will and to do. He inspires to right action and sustains the flagging energies. He is the Comforter, cheering the way-worn traveller, encouraging him under scorn and contumely, inciting him to renewed effort, making duty easy and filling the heart with love and joy.

But leading implies willingness on the part of the led. There is no force used by this gentle, though mighty Power. The heart opened to him he enters, the will yielded up to him he moulds and directs, but when he is resisted and disobeyed he departs. It is a law of surrender, of utter self-annihilation. Where the Spirit is, all life is in him. Voluntary abdication of all rule is essential to full occupation and complete direction. The sovereignty handed to him, he subdues rebellious passions, eradicates sensual appetites, restrains erratic impulses; but he expects our constant allegiance. He will rule if we wish him to rule; but he will leave us to anarchy if we ally ourselves to the enemy within. If we desire to be led of the Spirit, he is ready to lead, and "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."

A NEW Y. M. C. A. BUILDING.

Our friends of the Young Men's Christian Association of San Francisco are to be congratulated on the commodious edifice now in course of erection for their use. As will be seen from the accompanying picture of it, the building is to be a substantial five story structure well adapted to Association work. Its site is on the corner of Ellis and Mason Streets and is eighty-seven feet front on the former, and one hundred and eighty-seven on the latter. The material is brick, stone, and terra-cotta, and the building exclusive of the site will cost $220,000. The ground floor will be rented out for stores, but the basement below will be used by the Association for the elevator machinery, a large swimming bath, shower baths and lavatories. The chief offices of the Association will be arranged on the second floor, the central room, as is proper, being a large reception-room. From this, access is gained to the other rooms on the same floor, among which will be the Library, Reading-room,

Secretary's office and a hall with a seating capacity for two hundred and twenty persons. On this floor also, but two stories in height, will be the large hall, the floor and galleries of which will hold an audience of one thousand. On the third floor the German branch will be accommodated and five rooms are appropriated to its use. The fourth floor will be mainly devoted to educational classrooms, one room to be given up to the Deaf-Mute branch, and a few rooms will be for rent as offices. On the fifth floor will be the dining-hall, kitchens, pantries etc., and a laundry and lavatory. It is gratifying to learn that seven-eighths of the entire cost of the building and land has already been secured.

A USEFUL REMINDER.

SOME very good reasons for wearing the Christian Endeavor badge on week days as well as Sundays are given in a letter which Dr. F. E. Clark publishes in the Golden Rule. The writer says: "I've been stopped on the street and shaken by the hand by young men who wore the same badge. In fact, my experience has led me to examine all the vast array of badges, buttons, pins, etc., I meet on the street. What a multitude there are! G. A. R., Royal Arcanum, National Union, Y. M. C. A., and the beautiful and busy cross of the King's Daughters. The Christian Endeavor badge, ought not to be relegated to the 'Sunday clothes' to do its duty. It should grace the every-day garments, even if it is necessary to have two pins. Mine is worn right under my eye on the lapel of my vest, and as I am of a somewhat fiery and sanguinary disposition it has occasionally saved me from an outburst of hasty words and angry looks, by the remembrance that a man who wears a Christian Endeavor badge should not give way thus. In other words, it acts as a silent peacemaker. I spoke to a young man in relation to wearing it, and he replied that he did not like the badge. Why not? We are soldiers of the King; why not wear his colors? Why not remind ourselves in every possible way of the pledge we have taken and are trying to keep? The badge does not keep us good, but I believe it is a quiet and ever present helper. I have found it so in my case."

EVENING BRINGS US HOME.

UPON the hills the wind is sharp and cold,
The sweet young grasses wither on the wold,
And we, O Lord, have wandered from thy fold;
But evening brings us home.

Among the mists we stumble, and our feet
Are cut and bleeding, and the lambs repeat
Their pitiful complaints. Oh, rest is sweet
When evening brings us home.

The darkness gathers. Through the gloom no star
Rises to guide us. We have wandered far Without Thy lamp we know not where we are;
But evening brings us home.

The clouds are round us, and the snow-drifts thicken;
O Thou, dear Shepherd, leave us not to sicken
In the waste night, our tardy footsteps quicken,
As evening brings us home.

A PIOUS MOTHER'S WISH.

She Tells why She has Named Her Little Twin Sons after Two Famous Preachers.

NO one else exerts so great an influence as a mother in the formation of character. It is probably safe to assert that almost every man or woman who has achieved success in life, in the highest sense, owes it very largely to the maternal inspirations received in early childhood, when the mind was most impressionable and the impulses as yet undeveloped. The power of motherhood for good or evil (and, we thank God, almost invariably for good) is one that the whole world recognizes.

It has afforded THE CHRISTIAN HERALD much pleasure to receive the following interesting letter from a Michigan mother, quite lately, and we believe we violate no confidence in permitting our readers to share its perusal. It is a letter written right from the heart and one that every mother—and every father also, we think—will read with appreciation:

"BANCROFT, Mich., Oct. 5, 1891.

"DEAR EDITOR,—I am a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and we look for it every week. The children are disappointed if it is one day late for we all enjoy it very much.

"I know you are very fond of children and I take the liberty of sending you the photographs of my little twin boys. They are five years old the 7th of November. We have called one Harvey Talmage and the other Harry Spurgeon. They have often looked so much alike, we have frequently made mistakes, and at times, unless they were together, we could not tell one from the other. But they are now changing somewhat in their looks as they grow older.

"They are much like other boys, and they like fun. They learn their lessons very quickly, and always say they will be preachers. They like Bible stories, and go to Sunday school.

"I always tell my little lads that I want them to be good Christian boys and not disgrace the names of Talmage and Spurgeon, so when they act naughty we call them plain little Harvey and Harry.

"MRS. SUSIE HUNTER,

"Bancroft, Shiawassee Co., Mich."

The portrait accompanying this letter shows two manly little fellows, with frank, open faces. Sturdy lads they are and sunny-natured apparently, if one may judge from a picture. Very soon, in spite of the closest similarity of training, their tastes will diverge and each will reveal, even in his child-time thoughts and feelings, an individuality of character and an independent outlook. There are thousands of mothers all over the land who are just now watching with eager eyes and hearts the development of the men of the future in their own children. How much depends upon their vigilance, their judgment, their Christianity! The training of the younger generation in self-control, in kindness, in courtesy, in companionships, in temper, in faith, are all due to the mother.

"The grasp which the child has over the parent's heart," writes Dr. Talmage, "is seen in what the parent will do for the child. Storm and darkness and heat and cold are nothing to you, if they stand between you and your child's welfare. Their sorrow is your sorrow, their joy your joy, their advancement your victory. Every child is a bundle of tremendous possibilities; and whether that child shall come to its life, its heart attuned to eternal harmonies, and after a life of usefulness, shall go to a life of joy in heaven; or whether across it shall jar eternal discords, and after a life of wrong-doing on earth, it shall go to a home of impenetrable darkness, is being decided by nursery song, and Sabbath lesson and evening prayer, and walk, and ride, and look, and frown, and smile. God grant that all parents may have the great satisfaction of seeing their children grow up Christians."

Home Life in Corea.

COREA, that strangest of countries, the latest to feel the influence of the Gospel, has many peculiarities in its domestic life. A traveler writes to the Nashville Christian Advocate this. In religion she believes Buddhism which recommends idol-worship.

The husband is the ruler of the house. He enforces domestic discipline; conducts ancestral worship and is, in his little sphere, a king, a lawgiver, and a priest. Over the children the authority of the parents is absolute. Obedience is the first principle of filial piety. Sewing, reading, and writing in the native alphabets make up a girl's education. Boys are sent to schools kept by private teachers. The well-to-do folks employ tutors for the education of their sons. The curriculum goes no higher than the study of Confucian classics, penmanship, history, composition, and simple arithmetic—all taught in Chinese characters, the Latin of the East. Here we have all the elements that go to make a home—wife and husband, parents and children. But the cheer and joyfulness that brighten a Christian home are painfully absent in a Corean family. But where authority alone reigns there may be weeping children, but no domestic happiness. There is, however, the hope that the children of Corea may soon come to know the Gospel, now that the country is open to the missionaries and that the fathers and mothers of the future may cast out their idols and austerities and train their little ones in the light of Jesus' example.

Active Kansas Women.

PROBABLY the busiest women in any State of the Union to-day are those of Kansas. Hundreds of instances might be mentioned where Kansas ladies run stores, mills, bakeries, banks and even factories. Mr. Ewing Herbert, writing in the Hiawatha World, says: "There are a number of women ministers and physicians. In several towns and cities they have served as Mayors and members of Council, and one woman lawyer was the Assistant Attorney-General of the State. Several widows have taken up the business of the husband and carried it on with great success. One woman took other fields. Indeed they are a most active and potent factor in the churches. Many are church office-holders, and a great majority are church workers. But they do not overlook the humbler home tasks, and their households are models of order, purity and attractiveness, their children illustrations of Christian training and their servants patterns of neatness and efficiency. Above all, they are households where the fear of the Lord and the hunger for his loving-service prevail. These brave Kansas women make the best of their lives.

TABLE-TALK TRAINING.

ONE father has been accustomed to treasure up the best things of his experience or studies for each day, writes Mr. Trumbull, in Hints on Child Training, with a view to bringing them attractively to the attention of his children at the family table, the day's close, or at the next day's beginning. Another has had the habit of selecting a special topic for conversation at the dinner-table a day in advance, in order that the children may prepare themselves, by thinking or reading, for a share in the conversation. Thus an item in the morning paper may suggest an inquiry about Bismarck, or Gladstone, or Parnell, or Henry M. Stanley; and the father will say, "Now let us have that man before us for our talk tomorrow at dinner. Find out all you can about him, and we will help one another to a fuller knowledge of him." In this way the children are being trained to an ever-broadening interest in men and things in the world's affairs, and to methods of thought and study in their search for knowledge.

There is no end to the modes of conducting table-talk as a means of child-training; and there is no end to the influence of table-talk in this direction, however conducted. Indeed, it may be said with truth, that table-talk is quite as likely to be influential as a means of child-training when the parents have no thought of using it to this end, as when they seek to use it accordingly. At every family table there is sure to be talking; and the talk that is heard at the family table is sure to have its part in a child's training, whether the parents wish it to be so or not.

There are fathers whose table-talk is chiefly in complaint of the family cooking, or in criticism of the mother's method of managing the household. There are mothers who are more given to asking where on earth their children learned to talk and act as they do, than to inquiring in what part of the earth the most important archaeological discoveries are just now in progress. And there are still more fathers and mothers whose table-talk is wholly between themselves, except as they turn aside, occasionally, to say sharply to their little ones, "Why don't you keep still, children, while your father and mother are talking?" All this table-talk has its influence upon the children. It leads them to have less respect for their parents, and less interest in the home table except as a place of satisfying their hunger.

Table-talk ought to be such, in every family, as to make the hour of home meal-time one of the most attractive as well as one of the most beneficial hours of the day to all the children. But in order to make table-talk valuable, parents must have something to talk about at the table, must be willing to talk about it there, and must have the children lovingly in mind as they do their table-talking.

Be a Brother to a Brother.

THE way to do hard things easy is to do them for Christ. There was a little boy who never found the weather very cold when he was sawing wood for his poor mother, while she was watching him from the window. A smile from her always seemed to make the wind go down, and when the work was done and he got into the house with her and heard her say what a brave little man he had been, it made him wish that the day had been a little colder, and the sticks bigger and more knotty.

Many duties may appear hard, thankless, and of no very great importance now, but they will appear glorious when we come to hear the Master call attention to them from heaven. Nothing that is done for Christ is little, and everything done for him has much to do with making us like him. The one to whom we render the service may never thank us for it, but Jesus will. There may be many a Judas who will take what we will do as a matter of course, and care no more for our acts of love than the swine for pearls trampled under foot, but Jesus sees it all and has it written down in the Books of God as something that was done for him.

some interesting facts concerning the Coreans. Among the better class, the wife lives in close seclusion. No man she ever sees except her nearest relatives. No visits she ever makes except to the most intimate friends of her own sex. Her authority over the servants is supreme. As the mother, she commands the implicit obedience of her children. On the other hand, her duties are numerous and important. Housekeeping, in all its details, is under her charge. She looks after the comforts not long of her husband, but also of her father-in-law and mother-in-law. These persons she must reverence, obey, and serve as if they were her own. Religion enjoins and custom requires a farm heavily mortgaged, paid all the debts, and raised a large family and greatly improved the farm and increased its value.

"The schools have about been given over to the women. They are county school superintendents, city school superintendents, principals, teachers, tutors. Teaching is woman's work. She is devoted to the scholars, and they mind her, too. Kansans want women to watch over their boys and girls and teach them love, purity, kindness, gentleness and knowledge.

But it must not be imagined, from this vivid picture that these Western women are oblivious of the duties of the home or the Church, because they are so energetically occupied in

"This man speaks the truth," said a substantial-looking man hard by; "for, as I was passing here some time ago, I overheard this atheist sneering at all religion. Said I to myself, that man is a rogue. Is cheating too bad a thing for such a fellow to do? Hassan thinks not."

On this another cried out: "Some of us know Hassan. His word is good. I think as he does: that a man who has robbed himself of his conscience would not hesitate to rob a Phœnician of his goods."

"Exactly so," said another just behind, as he gave his neighbor a push toward the Cretan. "A man who does not believe in anything good believes in everything bad."

"Oh, the fellow is an imitation philosopher, is he? The genuine is bad enough, but an imitation is worse—mere husks. And husks are thrown away. Let's throw him away;" and the speaker drew his girdle a bit tighter.

"And I would not trust the rascal with a fig," cried another, as he shied a rather sorry specimen of the fruit at the Cretan.

"Hustle him out—hustle him out," cried several at once, throwing up their hands.

The crowd seemed on the point of doing it. The Cretan turned pale as he saw them moving upon him, and began to retreat toward the gate. Seeing this, some of the people ran and planted themselves in the way. Finding himself intercepted, the man jumped on a bench and cried in a frightened voice:

"Friends, do not harm me. I am only an agent in this matter. I do what I am bid. My principal is Malus."

Malus, Malus—the word passed from mouth to mouth in a low tone. It seemed magical. At once the outcry ceased. The billow of angry faces and hands that was rushing toward the Cretan suddenly stood still, and then slowly broke into many little whispering, murmuring whirlpools. The way to the gate was no longer barred, and the Cretan made his way to it precipitately, and disappeared. There was no danger of pursuit.

The Phœnician sat down again, and covered his face with his hands. Our two friends talked together for a few moments in a low tone. Then Aleph rose and went to the man; and, after exchanging a few words with him, conducted him to Cimon. A long conversation followed. At last Cimon came forward to the edge of the piazza, and beckoned for attention. He already had it—had indeed been having it for some time; but seeing the gesture, the people came nearer.

"I do not express any opinion," said the Greek, "as to the justice of this man's cause. We have not at present the means for judging that. But, unless all the usual marks fail, this is a case of genuine distress; and one that is not likely to be helped by a resort to the courts. The man confesses that he has been imprudent. Besides, the man is too poor to bear the expense of a suit. And if he could, a suit would probably be in vain. When the weak contend with the powerful, the weak must go to the wall. So, rightly or wrongly, the poor man will lose his debt; his family will suffer, and he will be in danger of losing all heart by losing in his old age the labor of years. I propose that we help him. The sum lost, though large to him, would not be large to us. A small contribution from each of us will set him on his feet again. Who of you will join me in making it, perhaps in righting a great wrong?"

And, stepping forward, he laid a piece of gold on the bench where the Phœnician had sat. Aleph rose and put another by the side of it. Hassan promptly came up and did the same. The example was followed by others, until at last Aleph, coming forward and examining the amount contributed, pronounced it quite sufficient to cover the loss. He handed the sum to the Phœnician.

The man seemed for a moment almost bewildered as he received it. He then fell on his knees and thank his gods in a few trembling words; then springing to his feet, he lifted up his voice and wept. At last he found words and composure enough to say to the people:

"My friends, you have saved me. I was ready to die; would gladly have died a few moments ago; but now I can live, because my family can. I bless you in the name of my little children. You may be sure that you have not helped a rogue; the facts are as I have given them. Before the gods I am an honest man, though I could not prove it before your judges. Again I thank you; and," turning to Cimon and Aleph, "especially these two friends, who, though strangers to me, have this day stood between me and ruin. If Sansciano ever forgets them, may . . ."

Here he fairly broke down, and suddenly turning to one of the pillars that supported the piazza, buried his face in his hands.

The sudden night of Egypt was now upon them, and the torches began to flame. After exchanging a few more words with the Phœnician, the two friends withdrew to their rooms; but not before they had caught a glimpse of a Roman uniform entering the little office near the gate of the court. Did it give them any uneasiness? I hope not. Borrowing trouble is poor business. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. And then, is there not a shield broad as the heavens above the good? Trust it, ye strangers, and go to sleep—if ye are indeed good.

Are they good men? For one, I am inclined to believe in them. Not so much because of their good looks, as because they look good. Not so much from what they have said and done during the few hours of our acquaintance with them, as from a certain—well, let the word be written, though deservedly somewhat unpopular of late—intuition. There is something wonderfully prepossessing in the look of both these strangers. It is hard to say what that something is that speaks confidence, but that it exists and speaks mightily there is no denying—at least by me. I seem to look right through those frank and fearless eyes into noble souls. It may be only a seeming. I shall not attempt to justify myself to the philosophers. If they choose to remind me that appearances are sometimes deceptive; that virtue is often very cleverly imitated; in short, that old proverbs declare that "All is not gold that glitters," and that "Fair outside often have foul insides," I have nothing to say against it. I shall not argue the case with them. They would have the best of it from the arguing stand-point. Intuitions cannot be defended. So I will do nothing but express a modern opinion that such well-appearing people will turn out as good as they look. Even this, no doubt will look sufficiently foolish to some; and should they conclude to suspend judgment as to the character of Cimon and Aleph till they have seen more of the progress of the narrative, I shall not complain. They are acting sensibly—as the world goes. They certainly are on very safe ground. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is a maxim whose authority cannot be controverted. And if, in the application of this maxim, they shall discover that the two strangers are no better than they should be, or as bad as the worst, I can only hang my head in confusion, and confess that experience is better than intuition.

CHAPTER III.

THE BANKER.

Whether Cimon and Aleph slept the sleep of the just we must leave to be settled in the progress of the narrative. I am, I again confess, prepossessed in their favor. At any rate, they slept so soundly that most of the guests of the khan had gone off on their various affairs before the two friends made their appearance.

Perhaps, too, they were delayed by a cause that did not delay many of their fellow-guests morning worship. It seems that they acknowledged Jehovah and a revelation from him; and it is to be presumed that such people began their day in the reasonable and old-fashioned way. When have devout believers not acted on the principle that prayer and provender hinder no man's journey. Besides, they breakfasted in their own room; whereas most inmates of the kahn patronized the cook-shops that abounded in the neighborhood.

After the meal they went out and seated themselves on the bench they had occupied the evening before.

"The first thing to be done," said Cimon, "is to find a suitable banker and open an account with him for such Alexandrian funds as we may need. As one of our objects requires that we be unknown, and especially that our connection with your father should not reach the ears of Malus, we cannot use our draft on him except in case of absolute necessity. We must depend on the jewels. And they are far too valuable to be trusted to any but the best hands. If the Jewish family that had the alabarchate when I was here last is still in business, this would be the one to apply to. They were as noted for their integrity as for their immense wealth and influence at Rome. I will go and ask our deputy host whether they have now any representative in Alexandria."

After a short absence, the Greek returned with two canes in his hand, and with the information that the old banking house was flourishing more than ever in the person of Alexander, the son of the old Alabarch; that the son had succeeded to all his father's honors and more than his father's wealth; and that, as the imperial banker, his influence at Rome was supposed to be even greater than among his own people for whom he had lately enriched the nine gates of the temple at Jerusalem with gold plates of enormous value. It was generally understood in that city that he had lately prevented certain oppressive measures against the Jews of Antioch by threatening to withhold a loan. Some went so far as to tell how many million sesterces (a) each minute brought him, and even supposed that he had discovered the art of turning base metals into gold.

"I am sorry that we did not ask Seti about the present Alabarch," said Cimon; "but I have no doubt from what I know of the family that he is the person to whom we should apply."

"I have also learned two other facts," he continued. "One is that the greatest galley in all the three harbors is Malus himself, and that the Cretan of last night is one of several small tenders that wait on the great ship and do its meaner work—which means that the oversight of the harbors and of the import trade has mainly fallen into the hands of Malus and his agents, and that the fear of him is on all small dealers, whom he could easily crush, especially as he is on the best of terms with the Roman authorities of the city. The other fact is that a Roman soldier was at the khan-office last night to inquire whether two men (describing us) were staying here. The deputy said that he managed not to enlighten the man much—as it was always safe to assume that what a Roman wanted to know ought not to be known."

"Would it not be well for us," said the young man, "to make some changes in our dress so as to embarrass such inquiries? . . . I am glad to see that you have brought in your hand something to help us discourage unpleasant recognitions," he added with a smile and a glance at the canes. "They have a tough and serviceable look."

"They certainly may be useful on occasion. But every gentleman in Alexandria is in the habit of carrying a cane; for us to do the same will help ward off notice as well as assault. Dogs and donkeys abound; and some of them walk on two legs. A stout stick, with your skill at fence and trust, will be almost as good as a sword. . . . As to making some changes in dress, I think your suggestion a good one. I also think that it would be well for you, at least, to dress somewhat more richly to-day, inasmuch as you must be the one to do our business with the banker. Till one is known appearance goes far. Meanwhile I will brush up my knowledge of the city and its people."

Cimon then produced his tablets and drew on them a rough plan of the city—one central street, two hundred feet broad, running between the lake and the sea from the gate of the Moon to the gate of the Sun, and called Emporium Street; this crossed in the middle at right angles by another street of similar breadth, but of much less length, called the street of Canopus, ending on the west of the gate of Necropolis, and on the east gate of Canopus; these two main streets cut at right angles by all the rest; here, in the south-east, the Jews' quarter, occupying two of the five divisions of the city; there, north of this quarter and extending to the two harbors Eunostus and Kibutus, and including all the frontage on these harbors called Bruchium, the Greek and Roman quarters. These latter also include a narrow section of the city lying along the whole length of Emporium Street on the west. Just west of this section is Rachotis or the Egyptian quarter, in the southern part of which, on the highest ground in the city, stands the Serapeum, the famous temple of Jupiter Serapis.

"Entering at the gate of the Moon," continued Cimon, "you are to pass up Emporium Street till you come to the street of Canopus; here turn to your right, and after a short walk, you will find by inquiry the palace of the great banker."

Surely, the way was so plain that no guide would be needed. So, after making some changes in his dress, Aleph took his cane and set forth.

By this time the whole Alexandrian world, the most industrious and bustling world known in ancient times, was in full movement. Such tides of men surging from sea to lake and from lake to sea—such tides of donkeys and horses and camels going and coming—such a menagerie and roar of sounds from the tramp of thousands, the shrill call of traders hawking their wares, the cries of the animals and their drivers, the infinite clatter from the tools of artisans of every name pouring out from the open shops far and near! Slowly on went the young man, with eyes full of grave interest, along the splendid thoroughfare for two miles, till he came to the ornate square, half a league in circumference, from the centre of which one could, without changing his place, see the lake on the south and the harbors with their dividing mole (Heptastadium) and the Pharos on the north, as well as the sands of the desert at both ends of the street of Canopus. Turning down this street to the east under one of the magnificent colonnades that skirted it on either hand, he noticed as he advanced not only that the leading places of business were held by Jews (a fact that he had noticed on the other street), but that the farther he went the more people he saw with Jewish features.

Before he had gone very far, two young men with caps and black gowns, something like the present English university dress, hurried by him, one saying to the other as they passed:

"The earlier at the Alabarch's the better. First come, first served, you know."

Aleph quickened his pace so as to keep near them. They soon came to what seemed a fortress rather than a private dwelling or place of business—solid stone, no windows on the first story, length on the street several times that of an ordinary dwelling. Solidity and strength rather than show was the impression given—no elaborate carvings, no pillars of porphyry and cornelian, but plain, massive, mob-defying marble, in short an architectural safe. This structure was on a corner. Turning the corner, the young men came by a few steps to a small door. Aleph followed closely; and when the door opened to the others, he entered with them and was ushered into a reception-room close by, where many others were already waiting their turn to be called into the presence of the financial magnate.

Soon a servant presented on a silver salver tablets to the new-comers, on which each should write his name. When the tablets came to Aleph he noticed that the names of the two young who had just written were P. Cornelius, Serapeum, and Q. Metellus, Museum. What did he write? After a moment's hesitation he wrote Aleph, the Chaldean, khan near the gate of the Moon.

There were several academic uniforms in the room (each with a conspicuous gold badge in front) that seemed well acquainted with one another, and not disposed to lose the time of waiting, possibly long, in silence. Some talked together with great enthusiasm of a boat-race that had come off the day before on the lake; others discussed the merits of various recent performances in the palaestra, especially those of a certain noted athlete and trainer who had just arrived from Rome. A knot of dudes were comparing breast-pins and finger-rings and experiences at the last fashionable party; or boasting of the successful tricks they had played on the lecturers at the Museum, and how they managed to evade many of the lectures and delude their parents with the idea that they were hard at work digging into all the sciences and philosophies and living like hermits on crusts and water. Some were ready to burst with merriment over some practical jokes they had played on some citizen or new-comer at the Museum.

THE CHRISTIAN'S LIGHT.

(For The Christian Herald.)

THE day and night were meeting,
The shades were slowly deepening
And faintly, glimmering far, appeared the light:
Amid the daylight lingering,
Along the West still clinging,
It paled and scarcely reached the searching sight.

But as the shade grew denser,
The light became intenser,
And gleamed with fixed, unwavering bril - liancy:
Though storm and gloom surrounding
The battered voyager bounding,
It shone and marked the way from danger free.

When many lights combining,
Around the Christian shining,
Pour forth a glorious flood of graceful light;
The cheerful, meek and ready,
With lamp all trimmed and steady,
Shines out his beams unnoticeably bright,

But when the life consistent,
From friends and home run distant,
And sin its shadows o'er the pathway throw;
Then, like the lighthouse gleaming,
The light of life is streaming,
And doth the narrow way the sinner show.
REV. H. S. BAKER.

TAKE IT TO GOD.

HAST thou a care within so deep
It chases from thine eyelids sleep?
To thy Redeemer take thy care,
And change anxiety to prayer.

Hast thou a hope with which thy heart
Would almost feel it death to part?

Entreat thy God that hope to crown,
Or give thee strength to lay it down.

What'er the care that breaks thy rest,
What'er the wish that swells thy breast,
Spread before God that wish, that care,
And change anxiety to prayer.

THE SOWER.

For the Sunday School Harvest-Home.
(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

LISTEN to the sweet old story
Told by Jesus long ago—
How one day in early seed-time
Went a sower forth to sow.

As he sowed, some seed were scattered
By the wayside, hard and dry,
And on eager wing to snatch them
Came the birds from far and nigh.

Others fell on soil so stony,
That their sprouting, soon begun
In the scanty earth, soon ended,
Scorched and withered by the sun.

When the thorns were thickly rooted,
Others yet their places found,
And the thorns sprang up and choked them,
Shut them in and closed them round.

But on goodly ground and fertile,
Some fell also, we are told:
Rooting, growing, ripening, yielding
Thirty, sixty, hundredfold.

May our hearts, O Lord of harvest,
Soil of worth and fruitful be;
May Thy word take root within us,
Grow and bring forth fruit for Thee.

WORKERS FOR CHRIST.

from all parts of the United States and Canada were present and gave their experience. One of the most useful features of this Convention was the Question Box, in which any worker could deposit his question and have it answered in the Convention.

At all these conventions perfect harmony prevailed and so valuable were the suggestions thrown out and so practically useful the lessons conveyed by the experienced workers whose methods were described by themselves and discussed by the Convention that we are justified in anticipating even better results this year.

On another page are portraits of four of the leaders in the Society of Christian Workers and a picture of the First Congregationalist Church, the commodious edifice in which the Convention will be held. The first portrait is that of Rev. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago, the Chairman of the Committee. Mr. Torrey is well known as the Superintendent of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute in Chicago. The Hon. W. H. Howland, the Vice-Chairman, whose portrait we also publish, is a prominent business man of Toronto, and has been three times mayor of that city. He is a zealous Christian laborer, active in mission work and in philanthropic enterprises of various kinds. A third portrait is that of Rev. John C. Collins, the indefatigable Secretary of the Society whose work in organizing boys' clubs has been already mentioned. The fourth is that of Miss Bertha H. Wright, a member of the Committee and founder of the Young Women's Christian Institute of Ottawa, Canada, which grew out of an effort to improve the condition of young women in offices and stores, and has proved of inestimable value to that class. She is also at the head of other societies for the benefit of the friendless and fallen.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Harry C. Webb, Rock Hall, Kent Co., Md. We have an Adventist in our village who says we are keeping the wrong Sunday? Is he right?

See answer to F. F. Milwaukee, in No. 28 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

J. E. Gregg, Chicago, Ill. Does the Bible say anywhere that the soul is immortal, or does it contain anything that leads to that belief?

See 1. Cor. 15: 52, 53, 54; 1. Timothy 6: 16; Romans 2: 7 and 2. Tim. 1: 10.

Teacher, Pittsburg, Pa. How long did Lazarus live after Christ raised him from the tomb?

According to Epiphanius he was 30 years old when restored to life and lived thirty years afterward.

Edith Miller, Brooklyn, N. Y. Is there any school where ladies can go who wish to study the Bible?

Yes; the Moody Institute at Northfield, Mass., is such a place. Write to the Manager for particulars.

A. J. Campbell, Reinbeck, Iowa. Where can I find a brief history of Missions in India?

The Encyclopædia of Missions, by Rev. Edward Munsell Bliss, published by Funk & Wagnalls, N. Y., gives all the data on the subject.

G. Clarkson, Jacksonville, Fla., writes as follows:

In your paper of Sept. 16th, I notice a reply to Mrs. —, Lisbon, Ga. If the lady wishes experience testimony of the most Biblical kind, she should procure Dr. Asa Mahan's "Out of Darkness into Light." It can be had of Garrigues Bros., Philadelphia.

Old Settler, Milwaukee, Wis. Why should there be a mobilized standing army in a civilized country like this? I believe that if we had none, other countries would be more afraid of us and of God.

A small standing army, such as we now have is a necessity for the protection of our borders. It is not kept for the purpose of inspiring awe in the breasts of European sovereigns.

H. Thompson, Lone Tree, Johnson Co., Iowa. How many Popes have there been since A. D. 538, and up to 1798, and how many since 1800?

From Pope Vigilius (538) to Pope Pius VI. (1798), both inclusive, there were 197 Pontiffs. There have been six since 1800, including Pius VII., the successor of Pius VI., and the present Pontiff, Leo XIII.

A. C. Stephenson, Williamsville, Va. Why was Dan left out by the angel that was sent to seal the servants of God? (Rev. 7.)

It is surmised that the portion of the tribe which remained south was in time amalgamated with the tribe of Judah (as appears in the cities enumerated after the exile, Neh. 11: 35), while the northern section joined the Confederacy and shared in its dispersion.

R. Green, Kanakee, Ill. In II. Kings, 13, 21, it is stated that when burying a man, and as he was being let down into the sepulchre of Elisha, he touched the bones of the prophet and revived, and stood upon his feet. Does that justify Roman Catholics in trying to perform miracles with dead men's bones?

Certainly not. Scripture does not justify us in expecting any such result to follow.

C. B. E., Philadelphia. Was Simon the Leper the father of Lazarus? If not, is any mention made of his father? Is there any authority for saying that the young man who came to Jesus, to whom the Saviour said: "Go sell that thou hast and give it to the poor," was Lazarus?

There is no reliable authority for any of these assertions, although we know that some of them have been made.

A Subscriber, Freeman, Ont. Is it right for a Christian to sell tobacco?

This, like many other similar questions sent us by correspondents, must be wholly relegated to the individual conscience. Paul lays down a generous rule, when he says (Romans 14: 2, 3, 4), that the moderate likes and dislikes of our fellow-men must be borne with and not hastily condemned.

Ida E. McDonald, Morrisville, Md. Is it right to take a corpse in the church and hold the funeral services? Is it wrong to hold the funeral services in the church of one who was a member of a secret lodge?

As we have already explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there is no special sanctity about the four walls of a church. It may be and frequently is put to a variety of social purposes. This being the case, we see no reasonable objection to holding funeral services in church, with the remains there. As to the propriety of holding the funeral services in church of one who has belonged to a secret lodge, it depends wholly on whether the deceased is entitled, by reason of his church membership and moral life, to this privilege. While we do not believe that Christianity is advanced by the influence of secret associations, which are too often simply a cloak for social excesses, still we should hesitate to declare any member of such an organization unworthy of being accorded the privileges of Christian funeral.

Mrs. B. D. McC., Norwich, Ct. How often did the Saviour appear after his resurrection?

Eleven times, according to the Scripture records, viz., to Mary Magdalene, to the women returning from the sepulchre, to Peter, to the two men going to Emmaus, to the apostles at Jerusalem, to Thomas and the others, to the seven at the sea of Tiberias, to the eleven on a mountain in Galilee, to over five hundred brethren at once, to James, and, lastly, to the eleven at Mount Olivet.

Elizabeth H. Germond, Houston, Tex. Is it wrong for professing Christian women to wear birds on their hats and bonnets?

There has at different times been considerable agitation on this matter among the ladies. While it is cruel and un-Christian to slaughter birds for such a purpose, there are circumstances under which it would be no more wrong to wear the plumage of birds than the silk of the cocoon, or the fleece of the sheep. This, like many other matters, must be relegated to the individual conscience. If your conscience tells you it is wrong, then obey the inward monitor unhesitatingly.

S. S. Hauser, Winston, N. C. Do angels visit people and talk with them as they did in ancient times?

Not visibly or audibly. The reference to angels in Hebrews 1: 14, implies that God still employs them to minister to his children. Our not seeing them does not prove that they are not around us. Elisha's servant was at first unaware of their presence though the mountain was full of them (II. Kings 6: 17). In the Christian dispensation, however, the Holy Spirit is the recognized channel of communication between God and man. Jesus said that he would be our guide into all truth (John 16: 13) and he is to abide with us forever. (John 14: 16.)

J. W. M., Kan. 1. Did Jacob really see God face to face when at the brook Jabbok? 2. Why were the Levites a special favorite of the Lord? 3. In what form was the serpent when he tempted Eve? 4. Why did not John write with "paper and ink" and what did he write with?

Jacob's mysterious wrestling has been a fruitful source of difficulty and misinterpretation. Jacob had left the land of Canaan, full of guilt and liable to wrath, and he was to enter it amid sharp contending, such as might lead to great searchings of heart, deep spiritual abasement and renunciation of all sinful and crooked devices. This was the conflict he had to undergo with "the angel of the Lord's presence." Jacob's inquiry for the name of his antagonist was unanswered. But he called the place Peniel, ("the Face of God,") in token of his nearness to Jehovah while the great struggle was going on. He had been overcome, yet, through the strength of his faith, he had prevailed and got the blessing. 2. Up to the time of the Exodus, the Levites had no special prominence over the other tribes. The work accomplished by Aaron and his greater brother, Moses, would naturally give much prominence to the family, however. Formerly, the system of priestly office had been for the eldest son of each family to be dedicated to the service of the Lord as a priest. The Levites were chosen by election to take the places of these elder sons in the priesthood. 3. Commentators conclude that it is reasonable to consider the story of the serpent as blending both the literal and symbolical. (Gen. 3: 4; 2. Cor. 11: 3; Rev. 12: 9; Rev. 20: 2; Gen. 3: 15; Col. 2: 15; Rom. 16: 20; 1. John 3: 8.) The most learned German interpreters take a similar view, Martensen and Lange both holding that the story is a historical fact, to be taken as a religious ideal or a symbolical form. Bishop Newton and others hold that the serpent represented the criminal principle which opposed itself to man in the temptation. 4. He meant that instead of writing a letter, he would come in person.

Dealers who claim that their preparations are "as goods as Hood's Sarsaparilla," by so doing admit that Hood's is the standard and possesses peculiar merit which they try in vain to reach.

JOHN ANDERSON, MY JO.

JOHN ANDERSON, my jo John,

When first I was your wife,

On every washing day, John,

I wearied of my life.

It made you cross to see, John,

Your shirts not white as snow,

I washed them with our home-made soap,

John Anderson, my jo.

Ah! many a quarrel then, John,

Had you and I together,

But now all that is changed, John,

We'll never have another;

For washed with IVORY SOAP, John,

Your shirts ARE white as snow,

And now I smile on washing day,

A SINFUL HARVEST.

How the Lord Rebuked the Desecration of the Sabbath Day.

IN the fertile valley of Emmen-thal, in Switzerland, lived a farmer, who cared for neither God nor man, and who wished in everything to have his own way. One Sabbath afternoon, having a large quantity of cut grain in his field, and observing the clouds gathering round the tops of the mountains, and the spring becoming full of water, he called his domestics, saying, "Let us go to the field, gather and bind, for towards evening we shall have a storm. If you house a thousand sheaves before it rains, you shall be well rewarded for so doing."

He was overheard by his grandmother, a good old lady, of eighty years of age, who walked supported by two crutches. She approached with difficulty her grandson. "John, John," said she, dost thou consider? As far as I can remember, in my whole life, I have never known a single ear of corn housed on the holy Sabbath day, and yet we have been always loaded with blessings; we have never wanted for anything. Granting that it might be done if there were a famine, John, or appearances of a long continuation of bad weather; but thus far, the year has been very dry, and if the grain get a little wet, there is nothing in that very alarming. Besides, God who gives the rain, gives the grain also, and we must take things as he sends them. John, do not violate the rest of this holy day, I earnestly beseech thee." At these words of the grandmother, all the domestics came around her; the oldest understood the wisdom of her advice, but the young treated it with ridicule, and said to one another, "Old customs are out of date in our day; prejudices are abolished; the world now is altogether altered."

"Grandmother," said the farmer, "everything must have a beginning, there is no evil in this, it is quite indifferent to our God whether we spend the day in labor or in sleep, and he will be altogether as much pleased to see the grain in the corn-loft as to see it exposed to the rain; that which we get under shelter will nourish us, and nobody can tell what sort of weather it will be to-morrow." "John, John, within doors and out of doors, all things are at the Lord's disposal, and thou dost not know what may happen this evening; but thou knowest that I am thy grandmother; I entreat thee, for the love of God, not to work to-day; I would much rather eat no bread for a whole year." "Grandmother, doing a thing for one time is not a habit; besides, it is not a wickedness to try to preserve one's harvest, and to better one's circumstances." "But, John," replied the good old lady, "God's commandments are always the same, and what will it profit thee to have the grain in thy barn, if thou lose thy soul?" "Ah! don't be uneasy about that," exclaimed John, "and now, boys, let us go to work! time and weather wait for no man." "John, John," for the last time, cried the good old lady; but alas! it was in vain; and while she was weeping and praying, John was housing his sheaves; it might be said that all flew, both men and beasts, so great was the despatch.

A thousand sheaves were in the barn when the first drops of rain fell. John entered his house, followed by his people, and exclaimed with an air of triumph, "Now, grandmother, all is secure; let the tempest roar, let the elements rage, it little concerns me, my harvest is under my roof." "Yes, John," said the grandmother solemnly, "but above thy roof spreads the Lord's roof."

While she was thus speaking, the room was suddenly illuminated, and fear was printed in every countenance.

A tremendous clap of thunder made the house tremble to its foundations. "Oh!" exclaimed the first who could speak, "the lightning has struck the barn!" All hurried out of doors. The building was in flames, and they saw through the roof the sheaves burning which had scarcely been well housed.

The greatest consternation reigned among all the men, who, but a moment before, were so well pleased. Every one was dejected and incapable of acting. The aged grandmother alone preserved all her presence of mind; she prayed, and incessantly repeated, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Oh Heavenly Father, let thy will, and not ours be done!"

The barn was entirely consumed, nothing was saved.

The farmer had said, "I have put up my harvest under my roof." "But above thy roof is the Lord's roof," had said his grandmother.

This teaches us the lesson, that all is in the hands of God, whether in the fields or in the barn; and what we endeavor to preserve from the rain can be reached in any place by him who commands both the rain and the thunder.

UNDER THE SHADOW.

UNDER the shadow of Thy wing
Thy sorrowing children hide,
Who, robbed of love's rare treasure here,
Alone—near Thee abide.

Lonely they are, yet friendless not;
For Thou their friend tho' seeming far,
To Thee they turn their yearning hearts—
In Thee they see their leading Star.

They never can such anguish know,
But Thou dost feel Thy children's pain;
For Thou hast felt the pangs of woe,
And know when love and faith were slain.

O hide them, Blessed Lord, we pray,
In holy place their spirits keep;
O may no sin tempt them to stray—
Thy trembling, weary, wand'ring sheep.

So may they lay the weary hand
As on the arm of loved one dear;
Too tired to think, too weak to pray—
They know and feel the Lord is near.

And so in shadow they do rest
Protected from the world's rude glare;
Securely on the Saviour's breast—
Encompassed by his angels fair.

And tho' the torrents rage and swell
And sorrow's bolt is falling near;
Yet sad, they answer, "He does well—
With love and trust we will not fear."

Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass" lamp-chimneys are made of tough glass that costs four times as much as common glass; and the work on them costs a good deal more than the work on common chimneys, just as the work on a dress is proportioned to cost of stuff.

The dealer is right in saying he can't afford to sell them at the prices of common glass chimneys.

And what will become of his chimney trade if his chimneys never break? He is apt to be wrong there. He can afford to charge a fair price and give new chimneys for all that break in use.

Have a talk with him.

Take water and a little Pearline, and you have the best preparation in the world for washing and cleaning. It will do everything except harm. Use it on your clothes, your dishes, your paint, and your person. Try it on something that you think is too delicate or too difficult. It will silence your doubts in the one case, and save your strength in the other.

Send it Back

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as" Pearline. IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, do the honest thing—send it back.

A WOMAN'S ENTERPRISE FOR WORKING WOMEN.

Woman's Canning and Preserving Co., Capital $1,000,000.

SHARES $25 EACH, FULL PAID: SUBJECT TO NO ASSESSMENTS.

4,000 SHARES Only Now Offered $25 PER SHARE to the Public at . .

AND WHEN SOLD PRICE WILL BE ADVANCED $10 PER SHARE.

CHECKS for the annual dividends mailed in March to all stockholders of record Feb. 1st.

It is the policy of the management to distribute the stock among as many ladies as possible, who will, by their interest in the success of the company, influence their friends to buy our canned goods, and thus furnish a market for all our factories can turn out. To do this we offer stock at par, $25 per share, fully paid and non-assessable, for which you can pay in monthly installments of $2.50 for each share.

OUR PLAN is to establish, with the money derived from the sale of our capital stock, one hundred or more factories in the United States. Then we can easily employ 5,000 women, who will earn for us a NET PROFIT OF $1,180,000 annually, assuming that 75 cts. per day will be the net profit for each employee, which is a very low estimate, considering that the average profit per employee is now $6.00 per day. Our stock, which we offer at $25 per share, figured on this basis at the rate of eight per cent per annum will then be worth about $365.00.

FACTORIES being distributed over the country we save the enormous sum that otherwise would be paid for freight charges. TWO FACTORIES are now running, another under contract, and others will be built as rapidly as money is received from the sale of stock now offered.

WE OWN the inventions of AMANDA T. JONES, for canning and preserving fruits, berries, etc., without cooking and without the use of chemicals. Briefly: Air (sole producer of decay) is completely taken out of the product, which is then hermetically sealed. Goods thus put up may be kept for years. Some advantages are:

Perfect safety from Poison, no chemicals being used.

The fruits are preserved in their own juice, without fermentation, retaining natural flavors.

No loss from shrinkage of fruit, as cooking is unnecessary; a given quantity results in a larger amount of finished product.

The communion wine question is solved by furnishing the pure juice of the grape unchanged at all seasons.

ONLY WOMEN EMPLOYED IN OUR FACTORIES.

They are surrounded with Christian Influences and their wages are fixed at such rates as to insure their comfortable and honorable maintenance, with a reasonable and, so far as consistent with business success, a generous margin of profit.

Many prominent ladies are identified with this movement. The officers and managers are EXCELLENT BUSINESS WOMEN, demonstrated by their individual successes, and who will, with the aid of every Christian woman in the country, make this the GREATEST FINANCIAL SUCCESS ever accomplished by women.

STOCK SOLD ONLY TO WOMEN.

Subscriptions will be received if desired in monthly payments of $2.50 for each share.

The sale is limited to 4000 shares, and all money sent after these are sold will be returned to the sender and the price advanced to $35 per share.

ADDRESS ALL ORDERS FOR STOCK, AND MAKE CHECKS, DRAFTS OR MONEY ORDERS PAYABLE TO THE COMPANY.

THE HOMES OF EGYPT.

The Seclusion of Orientals Somewhat Relaxed—Mothers and Daughters—The Training of Children—Egyptian Music.

Land in the world has exercised such a fascination for the inquiring mind as the home of mystery and magic, of arts and idols, of science and sorceries—the land of Egypt.

Through out the Scriptures, the name of Egypt runs like a thread upon which much of the sacred narrative depends. Nor is modern history less indebted to Egypt than ancient, for the story of its greatness and its wonders is interwoven with the experiences of almost every nation under the sun.

It was a singular and fortunate coincidence that almost simultaneously with the publication of a new series of sermons by Dr. Talmage, the editor of this journal, dealing with Egypt and the recent discoveries there, regarded in the light of Bible revelation, there should also appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the first chapters of the entrancing and beautiful story of "Aleph, the Chaldean," giving a vivid portraiture of Alexandrian society in the time of Christ. These are all the more timely and interesting in view of the great struggle that is now going on for the control of the land of the Pharaohs, which is apparently to pass out of the hand of its Moslem rulers who have held it for centuries.

Comparatively little is known of the domestic and social life of Egypt at the present day. Travelers, for the most part, have satisfied themselves with describing its ruined cities and temples, while explorers and archæologists have dug deep into its ancient soil to resurrect the antiquities that have illuminated its past. But the sons and daughters of the "Land of Misraim"—as it was known in Bible times—are passed over with so little notice that they are rarely considered. Yet they furnish a most interesting study in their present condition, as the descendants of what was once the most potential race on the globe. Probably no people in the world have retained so much of their ancient characteristics. In their indoor life and domestic arrangements, their clothing and adornments, their food, amusements and social relaxations, the Egyptians of to-day are almost the counterpart of their Coptic ancestors who lived and flourished a free and sovereign people thousands of years ago. In the cities of Cairo and Damietta, and even the much modernized Alexandria, we find, despite the large admixture of foreign population, those ancient traits still preserved in native households. Its rulers gone, its temples in ruins, the worship of its gods almost a memory, its people are yet as thoroughly "Children of the Nile" as in those days when Cleopatra sat enthroned in Alexandria, the last and worst of a wicked, royal line.

Egyptian women, except those of the very lowest class, dress in a highly picturesque fashion, the principal garment being a long, loose robe, reaching from the neck to the ankles and fastened at the throat with a silken cord or "draw-string." Wealthy ladies add to this a gown fastened at the waist by a bright-colored sash, made of ribbons. This gown is frequently of some richly-colored stuff. They are extremely fond of jewelry and display the inherited vanity of their ancestors, who were noted for their personal adornments and thus fell a prey to the spoilers. (Ex. 3:22.) Mummies are frequently found upon whose necks and wrists are beads, rings and armlets, the counterparts of those now worn in Egypt. In the portrait on this page—that of a typical "Daughter of the Nile," the prevailing style of garment for home-wear is shown. The figure is one that is familiar to most travelers who have been so fortunate as to be accorded the hospitality of an Egyptian home, where the daughter of the family, or it may be a favored slave, amuses the guest with her singing and playing. Besides the harp, the flute, the guitar, and a variety of stringed instruments that are believed to have originated in Egypt, there were also instruments of percussion like the drum, the cymbal, the tim-sounded by the Israelites to celebrate their triumphant passage of the Red Sea and the submergence of Pharaoh's hosts, are among the Egyptian musical inventions that have come down through the generations. The tambourine is a favorite instrument on both festive and sacred occasions and is of three kinds, each rendering a different quality of sound. One is circular (as shown in our illustration) another square, and a third consists of two squares, separated by a bar. All are played by the hand and used as an accompaniment to the harp. From the Egyptian confirmations of the Bible. The faces on the sculptures and death-masks, and those upon the papyrus envelopes of the mummies, all bear the same racial characteristics that are found in the portrait. Such a face might have been seen in Memphis or Thebes in the days of the pyramid builders, or graven on the broken walls and shattered temples of Karnac and Luxor, identical in every feature and like no other face in the world. The Egyptians are not negroes but a branch of the great Caucasian family, slender in frame and of great strength. The women are well-formed and many are beautiful, with oval faces, small foreheads, almond-shaped eyes, long, crisp, black, wavy hair and warm, olive-tinted skin.

Socially, Egyptian women have suffered through Mohammedanism, which has robbed them of the high respect they formerly enjoyed. They are now, like all women in Moslem countries, regarded as little better than slaves. • This is one of the many evil results of the domestic system which the celebrated Turkish statesman, Fuad Pasha, so eloquently denounced as the principal barrier to the moral and intellectual elevation of Moslem women, and it also the chief obstacle to the progress of Christianity in the homes of Egypt. But all are not slaves of the harem system, although, unfortunately, all have been degraded by its effects on the nation. In the large cities, where the humbler classes form a majority of the population, there are many women who enjoy a good deal of freedom and among these much Christian progress has been made by earnest missionaries, who have established schools for the children. To those schools the mothers, too, frequently come, and there they drink in the first sweet draughts of that Gospel which declares the soul of woman—neglected by the Moslem faith—to be equally precious with that of man; and which would place her on a social equality with man and "let her own works praise her in the gates." (Prov. 31:31.)

Even the houses are unchanged. In the large cities and at the stopping-places along the Nile—whose sluggish yellow stream is now stirred by the modern steamboat—are seen low flat-roofed dwellings of every variety, shape and quality, ranging from the white villas and palaces of the rich, to the mud hovels of the poor. It is upon the housetops of the inferior dwellings that one sees most of native life from the outside. Built of mud bricks, they stand so low that even the goats find no difficulty in sauntering on the roofs, which are made receptacles for all sorts of odds and ends, palm branches, pitchers, and the like, from among which emerge numbers of pigeons or perhaps a flock of turkeys. These roofs are reached by a series of mud steps which serve to light and ventilate the apartments below. The streets, as a rule, are damp and unwholesome, the rooms musty and anything but fragrant and it is only on the housetops that fresh air can be obtained. In these old Coptic houses, it is not uncommon to find the wall unplastered, the windows mere apertures in the side of the building, guiltless of a glazier, and the doorways vacant. Still, bare as they are, they are homes, and careful Egyptian housewives can make them clean and inviting.

With few exceptions, the daughters of Coptic families grow up to young womanhood almost uneducated, their moral and intellectual natures undeveloped. They are mostly secluded and taught to sew, to sing, to play, and to perform the usual household tasks. Of the real purpose of life, the soul and the hereafter they are painfully ignorant. Their highest ambition is for a life of luxury, for skill in music, for personal decoration; the higher, nobler, sweeter traits of womanhood are neglected and stifled. Child at ten, woman at twelve, wife at fourteen, is the too familiar experience. When the light of the Gospel dispels the darkness of the ancient land, then the "Daughters of the Nile" will come to their true estate.

A DAUGHTER OF THE NILE.

bral, and the tambourine. The drum was confined almost exclusively to military uses; the maces—a pair of cylindrical instruments with handles—were employed only where a number of performers played together, and the timbral and cymbals were used in chorus music. These latter instruments, which were models have been derived the tambourines of Spain and Italy.

Brugsch, Prof. Piazza Smith, the late Prof. Schliemann and other distinguished investigators, in the course of their excavations, have brought to light much of the marvelous history of ancient Egypt and many remarkable

BRICKS WITHOUT STRAW.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon, the Third of the Series on "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis." Text: "The burden of Egypt." Isaiah 19 : 1.

WHAT is all this excitement about in the streets of Cairo, Egypt, this December morning in 1889? Stand back! We hear loud voices and see the crowds of people retreating to the sides of the street. The excitement of others becomes our own excitement. Footmen come in sight. They have a rod in the hand and tasseled cap on head, and their arms and feet are bare. Their garb is black to the waist, except as threaded with gold, and the rest is white. They are clearing the way for an official dignitary in a chariot or carriage. They are swift and sometimes run thirty or forty miles at a stretch in front of an equipage. Make way! They are the fleetest-footed men on earth, but soon die, for the human frame was not made for such endurance. I asked all around me who the man in the carriage was, but no one seemed to know. Yet as I fell back with the rest to the wall, I said, This is the old custom found all up and down the Bible, footmen running before the rulers, demanding obedience, as in Genesis before Joseph's chariot the people were commanded, "Bow the knee," and as I see the swift feet of the men, followed by the swift feet of the horses, how those old words of Jeremiah rushed through my mind: "If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee, how canst thou contend with horses?"

Now, my hearers, in this course of sermons I am only serving you as footman, and clearing the way for your coming into the wonders of Egyptology, a subject that I would have you study far beyond anything that can be said in the brevity of pulpit utterance. Two hundred and eighty-nine times does the Bible refer to Egypt and the Egyptians. No wonder, for Egypt was the mother of nations. Egypt, the mother of Greece; Greece, the mother of Rome; Rome, the mother of England; England, the mother of our own land. According to that Egypt is our great-great grandmother. On other Sabbaths I left you studying what they must have been in their glory; the Hypostyle Hall of Karnak, the architectural miracles at Luxor, the Colonnade of Horemheb, the cemeteries of Memphis, the value of a kingdom in one monument, the Sphinx, which with lips of stone speaks loud enough to be heard across the centuries, Heliopolis and Zoan, the conundrum of archaeologists. But all that extravagance of palace and temple and monument was the cause of an oppression high as heaven, and deep as hell. The weight of those blocks of stone heavier than any modern machinery could lift came down upon the Hebrew slaves, and their blood mixed the mortar for the trowels.

We saw again and again on and along the Nile a boss workman roughly smite a subordinate who did not please him. It is no rare occurrence to see long lines of men under heavy burdens passing by task-masters at short distances, lashing them as they go by into greater speed and then these workmen, exhausted with the blasting heats of the day, lying down upon the bare ground, suddenly chilled with the night air, crying out in prayer: "Ya! Allah!" "Ya! Allah!" which means Oh! God! Oh! God! But what must have been the olden times cruelty shown by the Egyptians towards their Israelitish slaves is indicated by a picture in the Beni-Hassan tombs, where a man is held down on his face by two men and another holds up the victim's feet while the officials beat the bare back of the victim, every stroke, I have no doubt, fetching the blood.

Now you see how the Pharaohs could afford to build such costly works. It cost them nothing for wages, nothing but the tears and blood of the toilers, and tears and blood are a cheap drink for devils. "Bricks without straw" may not suggest so much hardship until you know that the bricks were usually made with "crushed straw," straw crushed by the feet of the oxen in the threshing, and this crushed straw denied to the workmen, they had to pick up here and there a piece of stubble or gather rushes from the water-side. This story of the Bible is confirmed by the fact that many of the brick walls of Egypt have on the lower layers brick made with straw, but the higher layers of brick made out of rough straw, or rushes from the river bank, the truth of the book of Exodus thus written in the brick walls discovered by the modern explorers.

That governmental outrage has always been a characteristic of Egyptian rulers. Taxation to the point of starvation was the Egyptian rule in the Bible times as well as it is in our own time. A modern traveller gives the figures concerning the cultivation of seventeen acres, the value of the yield of the field stated in piastres:

|                      |         |
|----------------------|---------|
| Produce, - - - -     | 1802    |
| Expenses, - - - -    | 993 1-2 |
| Clear produce, - - - | 808 1-2 |
| Taxes, - - - -       | 493     |

Amount cleared by the farmer, 315 1-2

Or, as my authority declares, seventy per cent. of what the Egyptian farmer makes, is paid for taxes to the government. Now, that is not so much taxation as assassination. What think you of that? You who groan under heavy taxes in America? I have heard that in Egypt the working people have a song like this: "They starve us, they starve us, they beat us, they beat us, but there's some one above, there's some one above, who will punish them well, who will punish them well." But seventy per cent. of government tax in Egypt is a mercy as compared to what the Hebrew slaves suffered there in Bible times. They got nothing but food hardly fit for a dog, and their clothing was of one rag, and their roof a burning sky by day and the stars of heaven by night. You say, "Why did they stand it?" Because they had to stand it. You see along back in the world's twilight there was a famine in Canaan, and old Jacob and his sons came to Egypt for bread. The old man's boy Joseph, was Prime Minister, and Joseph—I suppose the father and the brothers called him Joe, for it does not make any difference how much a boy is advanced in worldly success, his father and brothers and sisters always call him by the same name that he was called by when two years old—Joseph, by Pharaoh's permission gave to his family, who had just arrived, the richest part of Egypt, the Westchester farms or the Lancaster farms of the ancients. Jacob's descendants rapidly multiplied. After awhile Egypt took a turn at famine, and those descendants of Jacob, the Israelites, came to a great store-house which Joseph had provided, and paid in money for corn. But after awhile the money gave out and then they paid in cattle. After awhile the cattle were all in possession of the government and then the Hebrews bought corn from the government by surrendering themselves as slaves.

Then began slavery in Egypt. The government owned all the Hebrews. And let modern lunatics, who in America propose handing over telegraph companies and railroads and other things to be run by government see the folly of letting government get its hand on everything. I would rather trust the people than any government the United States ever had or will have. Woe worth the day when legislators and Congresses and administrations get possession of anything more than it is necessary for them to have. That would be the revival in this land of that old Egyptian tyranny for which God has never had anything but red-hot thunderbolts. But through such unwise processes Israel was enslaved in Egypt, and the long line of agonies began all up and down the Nile. Heavier and sharper fell the lash, hungrier and ghastlier grew the workmen, louder and longer went up the prayer, until three millions of the enslaved were crying, "Ya! Allah! Ya! Allah!" Oh! God! Oh! God!

Where was help to come from? Not the throne, Pharaoh sat upon that. Not the army, Pharaoh's officers commanded that. Not surrounding nations, Pharaoh's threat made them all tremble. Not the gods Ammon and Osiris, or the goddess Isis, for Pharaoh built their temples out of the groans of this diabolical servitude. But one hot day the princess Thonoris, the daughter of Pharaoh, while in her bathing-house on the banks of the Nile has word brought her that there is a baby afloat on the river in a cradle made out of big leaves. Of course there is excitement all up and down the banks, for an ordinary baby in an ordinary cradle attracts smiling attention, but an infant in a cradle of papyrus rocking on a river arouses not only admiration but curiosity. Who made that boat? Who made it water-tight with bitumen? Who launched it? Reckless of the crocodiles who lay basking themselves in the sun, the maidens waded in and snatch up the child, and first one carries him and then another carries him, and all the way up the bank he runs a gauntlet of caresses, till Thonoris rushes out of the bathing-house and says: "Beautiful foundling, I will adopt you as my own. You shall yet wear the Egyptian crown and sit on the Egyptian throne." No! No! No! He is to be the emancipator of the Hebrews. Tell it in all the brick-kilns. Tell it among all those who are writhing under the lash, tell it among all the castles of Memphis and Heliopolis and Zoan and Thebes. Before him a sea will part. On a mountain top, alone, this one will receive from the Almighty a law that is to be the foundation of all good law while the world lasts. When he is dead God will come down on Nebo and alone bury him, no man or woman or angel worthy to attend the obsequies. The child grows up and goes out and studies the horrors of Egyptian oppression and suppresses his indignation, for the right time has not come, although once for a minute he let fly and when he saw a task-master put the whip on the back of a workman who was doing his best and heard the poor fellow cry and saw the blood spurt, Moses doubled up his fist and struck him on the temple till the cruel villain rolled over in the sand exanimate and never swung the lash again. Served him right!

But, Moses, are you going to undertake the impossibilities? You feel that you are going to free the Hebrews from bondage: But where is your army? Where is your navy? Not a sword have you, not a spear, not a chariot, not a horse. Ah! God was on his side and he has an army of his own. The snow-storms are on God's side: witness the snow banks in which the French army of invasion were buried on their way back from Moscow. The rain is on his side: witness the 18th of June at Waterloo when the tempests so saturated the road that the attack could not be made on Wellington's forces until eleven o'clock and he was strong enough to hold out until reinforcements arrived. Had that battle been opened at five o'clock in the morning instead of at eleven the destiny of Europe would have been turned the wrong way. The heavy rain decided everything. So also are the winds and the waves on God's side: witness the Armada with one hundred and fifty ships and twenty-six hundred and fifty guns and eight thousand sailors and twenty thousand soldiers sent out by Philip II. of Spain to conquer England. What became of men and shipping? Ask the wind and the waves all along the English and Irish coasts. The men and the ships all wrecked or drowned or scattered. So I expect that Moses will be helped in rescuing the Israelites by a special weaponry.

To the Egyptians the Nile was a deity. Its waters were very delicious. It was the finest natural beverage of all the earth. We have no such love for the Hudson, and Germans have no such love for the Rhine, and Russians have no such love for the Volga, as the Egyptians have love for the Nile. But one day when Pharaoh comes down to this river, Moses kes a stick and whips the waters and they turn into the gore of a slaughter-house, and through the sluices and fish-ponds the incarnadined liquid backs up to the land and the malodor whelms everything from mud hovel to throne-room. Then came the frogs with horrible croak all over everything. Then this people, cleanly almost to fastidiousness, were infested with insects that belong to the filthy and unkempt, and the air buzzed and buzzed with flies, and then the stamper started cows to bellowing and rses to neighing, and camels to groaning, as they rolled over and expired. And in boils, one of which will put a man's wretchedness, came in clusters from the top of the head to the sole of the foot. And then the clouds dropped hail and lightning. And then locusts came in swarms of them, worse than the grasshoppers ever were in Kansas, and then darkness dropped for three days so that people could not see their hand before their face, great surges of midnight terroring them. And last of all, on the night of the 18th of April, about eighteen hundred years before Christ, the Desiring Angel sweeps past; and hear it night long, the flap! flap! flap! of his great wings until Egypt rolled on, at last, the eldest child dead in its Egyptian home. The eldest son of Pharaoh expired that night in the palace. All along the streets of Memphis and Thebes and all up and down the Nile there was a funeral wail that would have made the fold of the unnatural darkness if it had not been impenetrable.

The Israelitish homes, however, were touched. But these homes were full of preparation, for now is your chance, O wronged Hebrews! Snatch up what is of food you can and to the desert! The moons are better than the bondage have suffered. Its scorpions will not sting so sharply as the wrongs that have given you all your lives. Away! The child who was cradled in the basket of reeds on the Nile will lead you. Up!

This is the night of your rescue. They gather together at a signal. Alexander's armies and all the armies of old time were led by torches on high, great crests of fire; and the Lord kindles a torch not held by human hands but by omnipotent hand. Made out of straw or oil but kindled of the atmosphere, such a torch as the world never saw before and never see again. It reached from the earth to the heaven, a pillar of fire, that practically saying "This way! March way!" On that supernatural flame more than a million refugees set eyes. Moses and Aaron lead on. Come the families of Israel. Then the herds and flocks moving on the sands to what is the beach of the now called Bahr-el-Kulzum but in the Bible the Red Sea. And I dipped my hands in its blue water the heroics of the Mosaic passage I love me.

After three days' march the Israelitish were encamped for the night on the shore of the Red Sea. As the shadows fell, in the distance is seen the chariot of Pharaoh in pursuit. There were hundred finest war chariots followed by common chariots rolling at full speed. The rumbling of the wheels and the roar of infuriated Egyptians came down the darkness. But the Lord opened crystal gates of Bahr-el-Kulzum and enslaved Israelites passed into liberty when the crystal gates of the sea rolled against the Egyptian pursuers. About two o'clock in the morning the interlocked axle trees of the Egyptian chariots could not move in either way. But the Red Sea opened the horses, and unhelmeted the warriors, and left the proud host a wreck in the Arabian sands. Then two seas arose, and Moses led the men first, and Miriam led the women in her, and the women beat time with their feet. The record says: "All the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." What a thrilling story of endurance and victory. The greatest triumph of Handel's genius was shown in his immortal dramatic oratorio, "Israel in Egypt." He had given to the world the oratorio of "Esther and Deborah," and "Athaliah," but reserved for his mightiest exertion at the full height of his powers the marshalling of all musical instruments to the description in harmony of the scenes on which we this morning dwell. He gave twenty-seven days to this production, with its twenty-eight choruses, enthralling his own time and all aftertime with his "Israel in Egypt."

So the burden of oppression was lifted, but another burden of Egypt is made up of deserts. Indeed, Africa is a great continent for deserts, Libyan desert, Sahara desert, deserts here and there, and yonder, condemning vast regions of Africa to barrenness, one of the deserts three thousand miles long, and a thousand miles wide. But all those deserts will yet be flooded, and so made fertile. De Lesseps says it can be done, and he who planned the Suez Canal which marries the Red Sea, and the Mediterranean knows what he is talking about. The human race is so multiplied that it must have more cultivated land, and the world must abolish its deserts. 800 million of the human race are now living on lands not blest with rains, but dependent on irrigation, and we want by irrigation to make room for 800 million more. By irrigation the prophecy will be fulfilled, and "the desert will blossom as the rose." So from Egypt the burden of sand will be lifted.

Another burden of Egypt to be lifted is the burden of Mohammedanism; although there are some good things about that religion. Its disciples must always wash before they pray, and that is five times a day. A commendable grace is cleanliness. Strong drink is positively forbidden by Mohammedanism, and though some may have seen a drunken Mohammedan, I never saw one. It is a religion of sobriety. Then they are not ashamed of their devotions. When the call for prayers is sounded from the minarets the

THE MUMMIED PHARAOH.

Mohammedan immediately unrolls the rug on the ground and falls on his knees, and crowds of spectators are to him no embarrassment: reproof to many a Christians who omits his prayers if people are looking. But Mohammedanism, with its polygamy, blights everything it touches, Mohammed, its founder, had four wives, and his followers are the enemies of good womanhood. Mohammedanism puts its curse on all Egypt, and by setting up a sinful Arab higher than the immaculate Christ, is an overwhelming blasphemy. May God help the brave and consecrated missionaries who are spending their lives in combatting it.

But before I forget it I must put more emphasis upon the fact that the last outrage that resulted in the liberation of the Hebrews was their being compelled to make bricks without straw. That was the last straw that broke the camel's back. God would allow the despotism against his people to go no further. Making bricks without straw!

That oppression still goes on. Demand of your wife appropriate wardrobe and bountiful table without providing the means necessary: Bricks without straw. Cities demanding in the public school faithful and successful instruction without giving the teachers competent livelihood: Bricks without straw. United States Government demanding of senators and congressmen at Washington full attendance to the interests of the people, but on compensation which may have done well enough when twenty-five cents went as far as a dollar now, but in these times not sufficient to preserve their influence and respectability: Bricks without straw. In many parts of the land churches demanding of pastors vigorous sermons and sympathetic service on starvation salary, sanctified Ciceros on four hundred dollars a year: Bricks without straw. That is one reason why there are so many poor bricks. In all departments, bricks not even, or bricks that crumble, or bricks that are not bricks at all. Work adequately paid for is worth more than work not paid for. More straw and then better bricks.

But in all departments there are Pharaohs: Sometimes Capital a Pharaoh, and sometimes Labor a Pharaoh. When Capital prospers, and makes large percentage on its investment, and declines to consider the needs of the operatives, and treats them as so many human machines, their nerves no more than the bands on the factory wheel—then Capital is a Pharaoh. On the other hand, when workmen, not regarding the anxieties and business struggles of the firm employing them, and at a time when the firm are doing their best to meet an important contract and need all hands busy to accomplish it, at such a time to have his employees make a strike and put their employers into extreme perplexity and severe loss—then Labor becomes a Pharaoh of the worst oppression, and must look out for the judgments of God.

When in December of 1889, at the Museum at Boulac, Egypt, I looked at the mummies of the old Pharaohs, the very miscreants who diabolized centuries, and I saw their teeth and hair and finger nails and the flesh drawn tight over their cheek bones, the sarcophagi of these dead monarchs side by side, and I was so fascinated I could only with difficulty get away from the spot, I was not looking upon the last of the Pharaohs. Pharaoh thought he did a fine thing, a cunning thing, a decisive thing when for the complete extinction of the Hebrews in Egypt he ordered all the Hebrew boys massacred, but he did not find it so fine a thing when his own first-born that night of the destroying angel dropped dead on the mosaic floor at the foot of the porphyry pillar of the palace. Let all the Pharaohs take warning. Some of the worst of them are on a small scale in households as when a man, because his arm is strong and his voice loud, dominates his poor wife into a domestic slavery. There are thousands of such cases where the wife is a life-time serf, her opinion disregarded, her tastes insulted, and her existence a wretchedness though the world may not know it. It is a Pharaoh that sits at the head of that table, and a Pharaoh that tyrannizes that home. There is no more abhorrent Pharaoh than a domestic Pharaoh. There are thousands of women to whom death is passage from Egypt to Canaan, because they get rid of a cruel task-master. What an accursed monster is that man who keeps his wife in dread about family expenses, and must be cautious how she introduces an article of millinery, or womanly wardrobe without humiliating consultation and apology. Who is that man acting so? For six months—in order to win that woman's heart, he sent her every few days a bouquet wound with white ribbon, and an endearing couplet, and took her to concerts and theatres, and helped her into carriages as though she were a princess, and ran across the room to pick up her pocket-handkerchief with the speed of an antelope, and on the marriage-day promised all that the liturgy required, saying, "I will!" with an emphasis that excited the admiration of all spectators. But now he begrudges her two cents for a postage stamp, and wonders why she rides across Brooklyn Bridge when the foot-passage costs nothing. He thinks now she is awful plain, and he acts like the devil, while he thunders out, "Where did you get that new hat from? That's where my money goes. Where's my breakfast? Do you call that coffee? What are you whimpering about? Hurry up now and get my slippers! Where's the newspaper?" The tone, the look, the impatience—the cruelty of a Pharaoh. That is what gives so many women a cowed-down look. Pharaoh! you had better take your iron heel off that woman's neck, or God will help you remove your heel. She says nothing. For the sake of avoiding a scandal she keeps silent; but her tears and wrongs have gone into a record that you will have to meet as certainly as Pharaoh had to meet hail, and lightning, and darkness, and the death angel. God never yet gave to any man the right to tyrannize a woman, and what a sneak you are to take advantage of the marriage-vow, and because she cannot help herself, and under the shelter of your own home out-Pharaoh the Egyptian oppressor. There is something awfully wrong in a household where the woman is not considered of as much importance as the man. No room in this world for any more Pharaohs!

But it rolls over on me with great power the thought that we have all been slaves down in Egypt, and sin has been our taskmaster, and again and again we have felt its lash. But Christ has been our Moses to lead us out of bondage, and we are forever free. The Red Sea of a Saviour's sacrifice rolls deep and wide between us and our foretime bondage, and though there may be deserts yet for us to cross we are on the way to the Promised Land. Thanks be unto God for this emancipating Gospel! Come up out of Egypt all ye who are yet enslaved. What Christ did for us he will do for you. "Exodus!" is the word. Exodus! Instead of the brick-kilns of Egypt come into the emerald vineyards of God where one cluster of grapes is bigger than the one that the spies brought to the Israelites by the brook Eshcol, though that cluster was so large that it was born "between two upon a staff."

Welcome all by sin oppressed,
Welcome to his sacred rest;
Nothing brought him from above,
Nothing but redeeming love.

CHRIST'S PRAYER.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 17: 1-19. Golden Text, Heb. 7: 25.

OUR beloved Lord, after his last most precious teaching of his disciples before he suffered, let out his heart for them in prayer. Just this once, the true Holy of Holies, the inner sanctuary of the heart of the God-man, is laid before us. God give us hearts disciplined by the Holy Ghost, thoughts and wills bowed in holy adoration as we draw nigh to listen!

"Father, the Hour is Come."

Heaven, earth, hell; eternal life and eternal death, God's triumph, Satan's defeat, the glory of God and the salvation of man, all hung on that hour! "For the joy that was set before him," the redemption of his Church, his Bride, our beloved Lord, saw beyond death right into glory, beyond the redemption price to what it purchased! It was the hour on which the destiny of every immortal soul should hang. "Glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee; as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he may give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." We can never know "the power of an endless life" but as we live it. The powers of the age to come, the light of eternity gauges the reality, and the value or worthlessness of things temporal. The atmosphere of eternity becomes our natal air, the only air we can breathe, as we learn really to know him. Oh, how often have we sought to exercise power over the flesh! Oh how often have we attempted to conquer that which yields to no other sway but that of Jesus! He alone has "power over all flesh," the flesh in the demon-possessed Mary Magdalene as much as the flesh in the law-abiding Saul of Tarsus, or the guileless, but still unsaved, Nathaniel. "All power is given unto me both in heaven and in earth." He expects no other to exercise his power, but every disciple to believe in it and count upon it until they can say with Paul, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Nothing but eternal life, Christ in us, can subdue the flesh.

"I have glorified thee on earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." Nothing was left to be accomplished but Gethsemane and the Cross. A human life, in which self and sin had no part, had been lived on the earth; God had been manifest in the flesh, the fall of man had been tunnelled in the life of Jesus, and the way through the fall to the glory had been discovered in the holy life and the sacrificial death of Jesus. "The Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." "And now, O Father, glorify thou me,"—me the Man—"with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee"—as God—"before the world was." It was a prayer for the union of God and man, but it must come through death, and Jesus saw beyond death.

"I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world." The Word, the expression, the express image of the Father, had made man understand that Father's heart of love and his intense holiness, and the disciples began to understand that Jesus the Son was indeed the way to the Father. They could know the name or character of God as no Old Testament saint could, for they had seen "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." But who are these men given to the Son to whom the Lord Jesus has manifested his Father's name? They were given to him "out of the world." They had made their choice for Jesus, and given themselves. Their aim was to know God's will and do it. The Comforter, the Spirit of truth, abides forever with those who keep God's commandments; Jesus manifests himself unto those who keep his commandments, and he and his Father make their abode with those who keep his sayings and his words.

Am I one whom the Father has given to Jesus? is a natural question. Here is his description of these given ones. "They have kept my Word," "the words which thou gavest me . . . They received and know of a truth that I came forth from thee, and they believed that thou didst send me." "They are thine." "I am glorified in them." "The world has hated them because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Such are the distinguishing marks of these given ones. Forgiveness of sins and the new birth are presupposed; these are the elite of the church of God who "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." (Rev. 14: 5.) This means an entire, uncompromising separation in spirit unto God, a distinct, deliberate choosing of God before self, and before the world, day by day and on all occasions; it means a life habitually yielded, a will always laid down, a life led always in the presence of God.

Of these beloved ones, the Master says: "I pray for them." Nothing draws us so near to other souls as to pray for them, and to be prayed for by them. There is a oneness in the presence of God which ignores distance, position, education, and all that separates. The one Spirit, the one life, circulates in the members of the Body with intense reality. How wondrous that our great Intercessor entered into this oneness with those whom the Father had given him! His first prayer is, "Holy Father, keep them. I am no more in the world; through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one as we are." The greatest of all dangers comes from the spirit of self which divides the members one from another. It takes Divine power to maintain the unity of the members of Christ. Outward conformity will not do it, only God dwelling in us recognizes God dwelling in our fellow-members and greatness of the eternal unity in one life overpowers the temporary things which divide. God the Father is in charge to keep his children one. But there is a responsibility on our part, too. We must also "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith (we) are called in all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." (Eph. 4: 1-3.) "And now, I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to thee." The Comforter is not come, what is to become of the helpless ones?

Holy Father, Keep

"While I was with them in the world I kept them in thy name . . . but now?" Oh the tender love which, at such an hour, just before Gethsemane and the Cross, could set aside his own burden to plead thus tenderly for them! And was he heard? Yes, while they forsook him and fled, while Peter denied him, the eye of that faithful Father saw them still, and it was still true, "All his saints are in thy hand," (Deut. 33: 3); not one was lost but the son of perdition. Is he our keeper still? And while we really trust and yield to him, shall we not be kept whatever the temptations, whatever the suffering, through which he leads us? Surely, yes, our God is engaged on our behalf, our God is in trust for us.

"I have given them thy word, and the world hath hated them, because they are

Not of the World,

even as I am not of the world." Jesus Christ's estimate of his people is that they are heavenly, not earthly, that they are "not of the world," even as he. There is nothing for a Christian to be ashamed of if he is snubbed by people of the world. The tests by which the world tries a man are his appearance, his wealth, his position, his property, his reputation; but the true disciple parts with all these, he sells all that he has, or signs it over to the Lord to dispose of, so that he possesses nothing whatever for which the world can value him; the world's treasures are his ashes, his treasures are imperceptible to the world. The world has no eye for his beauty, and they cannot admire it in his disciples. The followers of Jesus are intruders and strangers among the worldlings, and the more they become like Jesus, the more do they become misunderstood and hated. The world will not have Christ; "Away with him, away with him;" is their cry, and just as far as they see Christ in us, they will hunt us down to the very death. And yet it is in the midst of a world which hates and misunderstands us that we are called to live and witness! "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil," Just there, in the most impossible of surroundings, let them shine, light in the midst of darkness, lambs in the midst of wolves! "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world." God teach us this great lesson, "For this cause came I unto this hour." I am commissioned, under orders, in trust with this hour, and all that comes out of it, for my Master! What a dignity this puts upon the simplest service.

"Neither pray I for these alone, but for

Them also which Shall Believe

on me through their word; that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." These words are like a Will and Testament which bequeaths to every "given" one the whole of this wondrous prayer of Jesus. But still the burden is principally on the one thought, unity. "That they all may be one," a unity as true, as eternal, as indissoluble as that which binds the Holy Trinity as One. And how? "I in them." Self is a divisive principle, it seeks its own. Christ, who is purely and utterly unselfish, unites. Christ in us lifts us above the narrowness of our own self-life, and binds us together, because the same life which is in one is in the others also.

LESSON POINTS,

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

THESE words spake Jesus and lifted up his eyes to heaven. A praying Saviour, blessed example! Oh! that all his followers knew the power of earnest prayer. Prayer is the key of heaven and faith the hand that turns it. Martin Luther knew its value when he said to a friend: "I have so much business to do to-day that I shall not be able to get through with less than three hours' prayer." How many of us would say, "I have so much business on hand that I cannot afford to spend more than three minutes in prayer!" May the Holy Ghost breathe upon us the spirit of true, earnest, heartfelt prayer, so shall obstacles be removed, rough places be made smooth, crooked things be straightened, and blessed peace follow the destructive storm.

Oh what peace we often forfeit,
Oh what needless pain we bear;
All because we do not carry
Everything to God in prayer.

Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me that they may be one as we are. In a sermon which a noted man of God once preached, this anecdote occurred, referring to his favorite topic of the union of all Christians: "I recollect," he said, "on one occasion conversing with a British sailor who gave me a good deal of his history. He told me that the most terrible engagement he had ever been in, was one between the ship to which he belonged and another English vessel, when, on meeting in the night they mistook each other for enemies. Several persons were wounded, and both vessels were much damaged by firing. When the day broke, great and painful was the surprise to find the English flag hoisted from both ships. They saluted each other, and grieved sorely over their mistake. Christians, sometimes, commit the same error. One denomination mistakes another for an enemy; it is night, and they do not recognize one another. What will be their surprise when they see each other in heaven's light! How will they salute each other when they understand and know each other better.

Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth. Perhaps few things tend more powerfully to impress the mind with the evidence attending true Christianity, than the fact, that many who have sat down to read the Bible to oppose it, have been compelled by the force of conviction to cordially embrace its truths. Gilbert West and his friend, Lord Lyttleton, both men of acknowledged talents, had imbibed the principles of infidelity from a superficial view of the Scriptures. Fully persuaded that the Bible was an imposture, they determined to expose the fraud. Mr. West chose the resurrection of Christ, and Lord Lyttleton the conversion of St. Paul, for the subject of hostile criticism. Both sat down to their respective tasks, full of prejudice and a contention for Christianity. But the result was extraordinary. They were both soundly converted. They expected to meet and exult over an imposture exposed to ridicule, but they came together lament over their past folly, and congratulated each other on their joint conviction that the Bible was the Word of God. Their able inquiries have furnished two most valuable books in favor of the Bible, one, entitled: Lyttleton's Observations on the Conversion of St. Paul; the other, West's Evidences of the Resurrection of Christ.

He ever liveth to make intercession for Æschylus, one of the most celebrated poets of Greece, had repeatedly and greatly distinguished himself in several famous battles. But countrymen forgot their obligations, both his valor and his genius, and in compliance with the voice of public clamor, he was justly sentenced to death, and would have been immediately executed had not his brother Aminius, who had lost a hand in the service of his country, promptly throwing off his cloak, presented the maimed arm to the view of his brother's judges. The appeal, though silent, prevailed and Æschylus was pardoned. And so if we look into Rev. 5: 6, we see Christ represented visionally there as standing between God and us, bearing in his glorified body the marks of death and sacrifice, moving and prevailing argument with the Father to give us the mercies he pleads for.

A SISTER'S EFFORT.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for November. "He ever liveth to make intercession for them." Heb. 7: 25.

DAWKNESS was closing in one evening when Louise Moreton opened the gate of the grove around Moreton Manor and hurried along the path, thickly shaded with overhanging trees, which led to the old house half a mile off. She had gone a few steps when a ragged boy stepped out of the shadow of the trees and spoke to her.

"Miss Moreton, aint it?"

"Yes, I am Miss Moreton; what do you wish me?" Louise seldom spoke so abruptly but the boy startled her, coming out of darkness like a robber.

"Here's a letter for you. The gentle was to give it to you unbeknownst; so I ed here instead of going to the house."

Louise's first impulse was to refuse to take the letter. But she took it and hurried on, was anxious that her father should not be waiting for his evening meal, which she had to go to the table. That was the place, once occupied by her dear, dead mother. Many other of that mother's places in the household, far more difficult to fill than one at the table, Louise had tried to fill, she had done so with more success than she had expected of one so young.

"Where is Louise?" Judge Moreton was sitting fretfully at this moment and he sent of his sons to look for her. She now came the room with her brother and the judge gathered around the table. The judge looked at her, or he would have seen the face was very pale and that traces of tears on her cheeks.

Louise excused herself as soon as she could do so after the meal was over, but, late at night, when she knew that her father was sitting alone in his library immersed in law papers she went there to him. The judge looked up in surprise as she entered and noticed the pallor of her face.

"My child you are ill," he said, "What the matter? You have been working too long. We must take better care of you. We cannot afford to have you sick."

"No, papa I am not sick. I have been from Edward to-day. O Papa! do forgive me and have him back again. Don't frown, the judge's face had clouded when she mentioned the name—"he is my brother and my own son. I cannot be happy while he is away. It seems dreadful."

"My dear, it is his own fault. He brought his punishment on himself. It is less than he deserves. If he had had justice he would have been in the Penitentiary."

"But, Papa, he has sincerely repented, sure he is very sorry. Read his letter. He has given up all his old ways and he says he has followed the courses that led to his ruin."

"I am glad of that for his sake, but I am not glad for yours. People are apt to make good resolutions when they are suffering from the consequences of their sin and as apt to forget them when they are restored. No I cannot forgive him and even if I could he could not come s & Wright would have him arrested at once. Do you know that his defalcation was more than two thousand dollars?"

Yes, I know, but that is all paid. You see I could do whatever I liked with that thousand dollars that Uncle Thomas left and there was nothing I wanted so much as to put Edward right, so I paid them his and they promised not to hurt him. O, do have him back for my sake!"

My child, you amaze me. It was sheer to spend your money so. Besides, that not put Edward right. He broke the law he can never get right until he has borne punishment prescribed for his crime."

But you don't wish him sent to prison, is it? It would do no one any good and it would break his heart. He is quite changed. I am sure he would behave. I would promise, I would forgive him and have him back, keep him straight."

That is more than I could ever do. You know what you promise Louise."

Oh! I am sure I could. He thinks so much of paying his debt, and he loves me dearly sure he would not grieve me. And I love so much. I am always thinking of him. I forgive him for my sake!"

My child you have been so good and dutiful did not think there was anything I could say to you, but I do not think this is right. Never, I will think it over again and tell to-morrow."

Louise left him and went to her own room and prayed that God would soften the father's heart toward the repentant sinner. She was without hope but it was not time to relax. The next day her father told her sadly, firmly, that he could not grant her request. She wept bitterly and wrote to her brother that her father had said.

Louise felt the disappointment more than her father knew. The elasticity went of her step, she grew listless and weak, all her old time cheerfulness deserted her. At last, she became really ill and the family physician was called in. He treated her case lightly at first; said her system lacked tone, he would soon set her right. But after a while he began to look serious and even anxious.

One day, after Louise had been under the doctor for about a month he sought an interview with the judge. "I am afraid she will never get well," the doctor said plainly. "Sometimes delicate constitutions fail from some cause we cannot reach. I thought it my duty to prepare you."

The judge went to his daughter's room. He looked very beautiful as she lay there and her eyes were full of pity for him.

"Papa, I am going to leave you," she said, and he feared so for some days, and this morning I saw it in the doctor's face. I am sure he thinks so, too."

"My child, it will kill me to lose you."

"Poor Papa, I know you will suffer. I wish I could stay with you. But now you will do nothing in memory of me, will you not? I should not mind dying if you would let me have Edward back when I am released."

It would comfort you to be doing something that I wanted so much. It will be my request and dying people are always in demand, are they not?" she asked with the smile of her old sweet smile.

The judge was not in the judge's heart to refuse. He kissed her, and promised.

"Thank you, dear Papa, she said. "You are very good. You will find Edward's address on my desk. Take it with you now."

On the day the judge told his daughter he had written to his son and told him to come at once, so that she might see him before he died. He did not tell her all he wrote. "I owe this," were his concluding words, "to your sister Louise. She sacrificed her life for you and I believe her life is being loved of you. You will be an ingrate if you prove false to her faith in you."

Louise brightened in expectation of her father's coming. He was far off in a Western land and it would take him several days to get home. But they had no fear that she would die before he arrived. From the time that he was to come she revived. The doctor had no tonic at his command that had been so effective. "There is a chance for the better," he said. "If it can be secured, she may have a chance yet." All Louise hoped for was that she might live a few days with her brother after he had seen him and his father fully reconciled. Then she could die in peace. But Edward's arrival gave a still further impetus to her life. It was long before the judge had any notion of the permanency of his son's reformation, but he was convinced at last and rejoiced he had yielded to the intercession of his son who loved the prodigal so much that he was near dying on his account.

THE CLOSING PERIOD.

Prof. J. B. Dimbleby, Chronologist at the British Chronological and Astronomical Association, on Daniel's Great Prophecy.

RESPECTING the Second Advent, some remark that the Lord said, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man." The Greek does not really say this. The words are "Concerning that day and hour," which may refer more to the incidents connected with the Lord's coming than the time. But even if we do not know the day or the hour, we well understand the period. There is a statement made in Daniel 12: 10, respecting our knowledge of the great prophecies at the time of the end, and we must not overlook it. We are told that "the wise shall understand." This is written to encourage our study and to impress our minds with the fact that prophecies are written to convince us that the Scriptures are inspired. The "seven times" of the Gentile period thrice mentioned in Daniel 4: 23, 25, and 32; also by our Lord in Luke 21: 24, and St. Paul in Romans 11: 25, are 2,520 years. In connection with its first 1,260 years, let me point out what must be regarded as in the book of Daniel. It is that the fourth beast, pagan Rome, had to begin to dominate over the saints in the year (Anno Mundi), 3970 1-2, and cease in 4636 1-2. Now what are the facts of history? Jerusalem became tributary to Rome in 3970 1-2, and in 4636 1-2 (638 A.D.) the Saracens, who were Mohammedans, took possession of Jerusalem. The Roman supremacy was therefore 666 years, as prophesied in Rev. 13: 18, and ended about 286 years after the copy of the Scriptures in the Museum was written! The following is another point of importance. In Rev. 13, the Mohammedan power is called a beast and ranks with pagan Rome. One beast continues 42 months, which are 1260 day-years, and the other 666 years. The two together make 1926, which added to the fore-mentioned 3970 1-2, the beginning of the universal empire of Rome, we again have 5896 1-2 (our 1898 1-2) as the fulfilment of the prophecy!

A Remarkable Prophecy

Here is a most important point for our consideration. Although the little horn, or Mohammedan power is to prevail for 1260 years, which end at 1898 1-4 A.D., yet there is no clear evidence that the Ancient of Days does not come to the mid-heavens some time previous to this date, and consequently the first resurrection—that of the holy dead—take place, and together with all living saints, who are then quickened, ascend to mid-heavens where the grand levee and assize occurs.

This Great Assize precedes the full and complete Restoration of the Jews, and the Millennium, or may be regarded as the beginning of both of them. It is denominated "that day" in Scripture, particularly by Isaiah, and to it the Apostle St. Paul alludes when speaking of the crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge would give him in that day. The glory of this day was revealed by the transfiguration on the mount. Thousands of Christians in England, America, and elsewhere, are expecting to see it, but great as is the interest on earth in the near revealing of the great salvation, the hosts of heaven are doubtless waiting with joy the hour when the "set time" arrives.

It is interesting to notice that our Lord said: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," and in Rev. 11: 2, we are told how long this treading down shall last, viz., 42 months, which are 1,260 days at thirty days per month—the days, as in other parts of Scripture, representing years. It is plain that Jerusalem is now being trodden down by the Mohammedans, and has been since the year A.M. 4636 1-2 (738 A.D.) so that the period of their domination must expire in 5898 1-2 (1898 1-4 A.D.) Therefore the Times of the Gentiles will end in 1898. Now as the oppression of the Jews ceases in this 1898 1-4, we must expect their restoration will then begin, because St. Paul says, "Blindness is happened to Israel till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled (Romans 11: 25).

There are three living writers on the approximating fulfilment of prophecy, who are known as having given more investigation to this subject than any other men. I respectfully allude to the Rev. Grattan Guinness, Rev. M. Baxter, and Mr. John Steed, who compute the end of the 2520 years to be near 1898, where I place it. Perhaps one hundred writers could be mentioned, some of them men of eminence, who concur approximately in reckoning this date to be somewhere near the end of this century.

A WELL REMEMBERED SHIP.

RECENT outrages on American sailors in Chili recall the story of an aged citizen of New London, Conn., who was entertained recently at a banquet on board the U. S. frigate Constellation. He was the captain of a whaler until old age compelled him to retire several years ago. He is now in his ninety-fourth year. During a voyage he took in 1821, he went ashore at a Chilean port where he was arrested and charged with an offence of which he was innocent. He was taken into the interior and set to work in the mines. Being half starved and cruelly treated he grew desperate, and at last, at imminent risk of his life, made his escape. He found his way to the coast, and seizing an open boat, rowed out to sea. After drifting for several days and being several times almost drowned, he saw to his intense joy a vessel carrying the Stars and Stripes. It was the Constellation. He was taken on board, had the first good meal he had eaten in several months and was brought home. Recently, when the Constellation was off New London, the old man went on board and told his story. The officers gave him a warm welcome and held a banquet in his honor. He had not seen the old ship before, since it rescued him seventy years ago. There was no ingratitude in this for the old man was deeply thankful, but he had never had the opportunity of visiting the ship. The same plea, however, cannot be made for that numerous class of people who owe their rescue from Satan's bondage to the efforts of the Church of Christ yet neglect its services and do little or nothing for its support. (1 Timothy 6: 18.)

HOW TO RECOGNIZE NATIONALITY.

IMMIGRANTS at the barge office in New York often betray their nationality unconsciously. A visitor there inquired of one of the inspectors recently what country a party came from who were leaving the building. "Italy" promptly answered the Inspector. "How do you know? You did not see their faces," said the visitor. "Oh there is no doubt," was the reply. "You cannot always tell by their faces; their actions are the best guide. The men, you see, are carrying nothing whatever, all the luggage belonging to the party is being borne by the women. I have noticed thousands of Italians landing, but I have yet to see any one of the men carrying any burdens. You can pick out the North German immigrants by their walk. They have an indescribable way of walking, which can only be compared to that of a sailor. The carriage of the French immigrants is peculiar also. Naturally, the majority of those who come to this country are from the peasant class, and although none of them come over with wooden shoes, you would think that they were still wearing their wooden clogs from the awkward manner in which they move around. The Irishman generally comes armed with a stick, and if you take the trouble to examine it you will find that it is a blackthorn." It is by their walk and actions, too, that true members of Christ's kingdom are recognized. When men behave like the world and are selfish, greedy and unconcerned about the welfare of others they cannot be recognized as Christians however loud their professions may be. (Matt. 7: 20.)

A CRUEL WILL.

JUDGMENT was pronounced in the Court of Chancery at Trenton, N. J., on Oct. 20, in a suit to break the will of a millionaire. About twenty-six years ago a man settled at Smithville, N. J., and began business. He prospered and built a beautiful mansion. He made many large gifts to philanthropic enterprises and, when he died, he left all his large fortune to found an industrial school and other similar purposes. It came out after his death that he had a wife and four children in Vermont, whom he deserted before going to Smithville and to them he left nothing in his will, though they were in needy circumstances. They appealed to the court to refuse probate to the will, on the ground that the man was of unsound mind when he made it. There was no evidence of mental incapacity except that of his unnatural disposition of his property. The Chancellor, therefore, though with evident reluctance, pronounced in favor of the will. He held that the courts cannot reject a will on the sole ground that it does not comport with their ideas of justice and propriety, or even because it appears to be unjust and cruel. If a testator observes the requirements of the law and has testamentary capacity, he may lawfully make an unjust will. It is so in God's government of the world; men are not constrained to do right, and wrongdoing is not regarded as proof of mental incapacity. The fact, however, involves a fearful responsibility for all who know the good and deliberately choose the evil. (Luke 12: 47.)

A MERCIFUL EVICTION.

CROSBY STREET, New York, was in a state of turmoil on October 20 owing to an effort to evict twenty-four families, containing in all over one hundred persons, from a tenement house. An agent of the owner had notified them to leave, but they would not do so. Then he served them with a fresh notice requiring them to quit the premises within twenty-four hours; but they still remained. Finally a platoon of police entered the building and turned them out by force. They made a great commotion about and it was many of them were Italians, their compatriots, who are numerous in the district, turned out by the hundred to sympathize with them in their native language. Some of them were accommodated for the night in the police station, but others lighted fires on the street and made themselves as comfortable as they could camping out. The reason for the peremptory eviction was that the house was evidently unsafe and on the day when the people were turned out, a watchman, while passing, heard a loud crack in the wall, and gave warning to the Building Inspector. Wide fissures in the wall were clearly visible, and it would probably have fallen if it had not been promptly closed up. The people seemed incapable of realizing that the eviction was prompted by concern for their own safety. People who knew the circumstances thought them very foolish, but they were not so foolish as are impenitent sinners who show resentment when they are urged to flee from the wrath to come (Prov. 15: 12).

CRIME DETECTED BY PHOTOGRAPHY.

An interesting series of experiments have been made by Dr. J. Jeserich with the object of rendering photography more efficient in the detection of forgery and poisoning. He has placed several of his plates on exhibition. He has shown, by enlarging photographs taken upon sensitized plates, that it is possible to detect certain kinds of forgery in the most unimpeachable way; for example, where a figure or a word has been altered—and this is one of the commonest kinds of forgery—the different inks employed appear in the plate in quite different colors. Similarly where a name has first been written in pencil and then traced over in ink, however carefully the pencil marks have been erased, some faint traces of the plumbago are sure to remain in the interstices of the paper, and these are revealed in the magnified photograph. Dr. Jeserich's photographs of hair and of pure and impure blood, before and after treatment with reducing agents, are also most curious, and the highest expectations are entertained of the use that may be made of them in murder trials. The evidence thus furnished will be of the most convincing kind, because it will not depend on testimony. It will be that of the criminal's own act revealed by the light of the sun. That will be the kind of evidence which at the last day will convict the guilty man whose sins have not been washed away by the blood of Christ, and it will leave him speechless. The enormity of sin will be revealed when it is set in the light of the great white Throne. (Luke 12: 2-3.)

DANGEROUS BOOKS.

HOWEVER strong and exalted your character, never read a bad book. By the time you get through the first chapter you will see the drift. If you find the marks of the hoofs of the devil in the pictures, or in the style, or in the plot, away with it. You may tear your coat, or break a vase, and repair them again, but the point where the rip or fracture took place will always be evident. It takes less than an hour to do your heart a damage which no time can entirely repair. Look carefully over your child's library; see what book it is that he reads after he has gone to bed, with the gas turned upon the pillow. Do not always take it for granted that a book is good because it is a Sunday-school book. As far as possible know who wrote it, who illustrated it, who published it, who sold it. Young man, as you value heaven, never buy a book from one of those men who meet you in the square, and, after looking both ways, to see if the police are watching, shows you a book—very cheap. Have him arrested as you would kill a rattle-snake. Grab him and shout "Police! police!"

A SURE CURE.

THERE are those who get along without religion while going through great sorrows and calamities. We do not understand the philosophy which they have adopted, or the plan of procedure on which they have entered. They are a mystery to us; they are a mystery to the Church of Christ. We simply know that the only complete solace is in the Gospel of Jesus. The world has pointed out a great many wells of comfort, and it says if you will only drink deep enough, the thirst of the soul shall be slaked; but many of us have tried all these fountains, and come away more thirsty than when we went:

Substantial comfort will not grow
In Nature's barren soil;
All we can boast till Christ we know
Is vanity and toil.

When persons are sick, especially if it be a chronic illness, people come in and give a great many prescriptions, and tell how the prescribers were helped; and after a while, if a man has been sick long enough, he will have a hundred prescriptions, any one of which he is assured will cure him. He tries half-a-dozen or a dozen of them, and, perhaps, only increases his illness. Well, now, we are all sick with sin, and at times we are sick with sorrow. The world has a great many panaceas and a great many catholicons. It says: "If you will do this you will get better, and if you will do that you will get cured;" but we have, many of us, found out the fallacy of all such prescriptions. Jesus Christ comes in after the failure of all other attempts, and, as the Divine Physician, saith: "My grace shall be sufficient for you!" And many of us have found that it is sufficient.

NEWSPAPERS.

THERE are papers in New York that long ago came to perfection of shamelessness, and there is no more power in venom and mud and slime to pollute them. They have dashed their iniquities into the face of everything decent and holy. And their work will be seen in the crime and debauchery and the hell of innumerable victims. Their columns are not long and broad enough to record the tragedies of their horrible undoing of immortal men and women.

God, after a while, will hold up these reeking, stenchful, accursed sheets, upon which they spread out their guilt, and the whole universe will cry out for their condemnation. See the work of bad newspapers in the false tidings they bring! There are hundreds of men to-day penniless, who were, during the war, hurled from their affluent positions by incorrect accounts of battles that shook the money-market, and the gold gamblers, with their hoofs, trampled these honest men into the mire. And many a window was hoisted at the hour of midnight as the boy shouted: "Extra! Extra!" And the father and mother who had an only son at the front, with trembling hand, and blanched cheek, and sinking heart, read of battles that had never occurred. If an individual makes a false statement, one or twenty persons may be damaged; but a newspaper of large circulation that wilfully makes a misstatement in one day tells a hundred thousand falsehoods. The most stupendous of all lies is a newspaper lie.

ONLY JUSTICE.

THE heaviest stroke that comes down upon a fallen woman's soul is the merciless indignation of her sisters. If the multitudes of the fallen could be placed in a straight line, it would reach from here to the gates of the lost, and back again. But what of the destroyer? We take his arm. We flatter his appearance. We take off our hats. He is admitted to our parlors. For him we cast our votes. For him we speak our eulogies. And when he has gone we read over the heap of compost: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. They rest from their labors and their works do follow them." In the fashionable city to-day there walk a thousand libertines. They are a moving pest. Their breath is the sirocco of the desert. Their bones have in them the decay of the pit. They have the eye of a basilisk. They have been soaked in filth, and steeped in uncleanness, and consumed in sin, and they are all adrip with the loathsomeness of eternal death. I take hold of the robe of one of these elegant gentlemen, and pull it aside, and say, "Behold a Leper!"

CLOSE COMMUNION.

WE deplore the many sharp things that have been written in many papers on the fact that the chief body of the Baptists believe that they ought not invite to their communion table those who have not been immersed. They have as much right to have that belief as the Pedobaptists have a right to the opposite belief. We know close-communion Baptist ministers and open-communion Baptist ministers, and we do not find that the latter are any more genial, or earnest, or conscientious, or useful than the former. Let each denomination mind its own business, and cease meddling with others. If the communion table of the Baptist Church were the only one in the land, and you Pedobaptists were not allowed to sit at it, there might be some ground of complaint; but when there are thousands of communion tables all over the land, where the sprinkled as well as the plunged may partake, what are you making such a fuss about? If there are ten houses on a street where you are invited, and there is one that does not invite you, what an unreasonable thing for you to spend your time in throwing stones at the windows of the one closed house! Let each church make its own rules and stick to them. If we do not find things to suit us, in Baptist, Methodist, Congregationalist, Episcopalian, or Presbyterian Churches, let us go where we like them better.

LANTERNS WANTED.

THIS is a dark world to many people, a world of chills, a world of fog, a world of wet blankets. Nine-tenths of the men we meet need encouragement. Your work is so urgent that you have no time to stop and speak to the people; but every day you meet scores, perhaps hundreds and thousands of persons upon whom you might have direct and immediate influence. "How? how?" you cry out. We answer: by the grace of physiognomy. There is nothing more catching than a face with a lantern behind it, shining clear through. We have no admiration for a face with a dry smile, meaning no more than the grin of a false face. But a smile written by the hand of God, as an index or table of contents to whole volumes of good feeling within, is a benediction. You say: "My face is hard and lacking in mobility, and my benignant feelings are not observable in the facial proportions." We do not believe you. Freshness and geniality of soul are so subtle and pervading that they will, at some eye or mouth corner, leak out. Set behind your face a feeling of gratitude to God and kindness toward man, and you will every day preach a sermon long as the streets you walk, a sermon with as many heads as the number of the people you meet, and differing from other sermons in the fact that the longer it is the better. The reason that there are so many sour faces, so many frowning faces, so many dull faces, is because men consent to be acrid and petulant and stupid. The way to improve your face is to improve your disposition. Attractiveness of physiognomy does not depend on regularity of feature. We know persons whose brows are shaggy, and whose eyes are oblique, and noses are ominously longitudinal, and the mouth straggles along in unusual and unexpected directions; and yet they are men and women of so much soul that we love to look upon them, and their presence is an evangelism. They get married sooner than the painted doll-babies that call themselves young ladies, and make home happy long after the curls have turned gray and the foot of the dance has turned into a rheumatic shuffle.

PRESENT EVILS.

MEN like to hear the frailties and faults of others chastised. With what blandness and placidity they sit and hear the religious teacher excoriate the ambition of Ahab, the treachery of Judas, the treason of Athaliah, and the wickedness of the Amalekites. Indeed, I have sometimes felt sorry for the Amalekites, for in all ages, and on all occasions, they are smitten, denounced, and pursued. They have had their full share of censure and exhortation. It is high time that in our addresses in pulpits, and in domestic circles, we turn our attention to the driving out of these worse Amalekites which are swarming in society to-day, thicker than in the olden time. The ancient Amalekites lived for one or two hundred years; but these are not weakened after a thousand years. Those traversed only a few leagues of land; these stalk the earth and ford the sea. Those had only a sword or spear; these fight with a million swords, and strike with a million stings, and smite with a million catastrophes. Those were conquered with human weapons; but to overcome these we must bring out God's great field-piece, and employ an enginery that can sweep from eternity to eternity.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., commenced series of services for Pastor C. H. Spurgeon the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, on Sunday, Oct. 25th. The congregations morning and evening were large.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy will hold its next meeting on Nov. 10 in Hamilton Hall, Columbia College, New York. Rev. J. Hendrick de Vries of Yonkers, N. Y., will read a paper on "Calvinism and Arminianism."

The International Sunday School Lesson Committee meets in New York on Nov. 10 to arrange the next or Fourth Series of Lessons. The committee invites suggestions for practical teachers and superintendents. It should be addressed to Warren Randolph Newport, R. I., and should reach him by November 9.

Rev. J. Scovill is holding services in Buffalo, N. Y., at the Hudson Street Church. A deep interest has been manifested and there have been many tokens of blessing. The music part of the services is in charge of Mrs. Shinn of Buffalo. Churches desiring to avail themselves of Mr. Scovill's services during winter may address him at Elmira, N. Y.

The Eighty-sixth Street Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York hold meetings every night at 8:30 P. M. during the Week of Prayer, November 8-14, Wednesday excepted. Among the clergymen who will assist in these meetings are Rev. E. W. pole Warren, D. D., Rev. Abbot E. Kittredge, Rev. Wilton Merle Smith, and Rev. I. Haldemann.

Gipsy Smith commenced his services in Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, October 25. The church was crowded at first service and the earnest evangelist won many of his hearers to tears. At the close the services many remained for prayers several persons sent in the names of unconverted relatives and friends for whom they asked the Evangelist and the Church to pray.

Rev. C. H. Yatman's Meetings at Newburgh, N. Y., have been wonderfully successful. An attractive feature has been three illustrated sermons, with object lessons. At the first which was on "The Seven Silver Cup Life," Trinity Church was crowded to excess. The newspapers of the city say that the interest in these meetings was intense at beginning, and has been growing through.

The Board of Church Extension of the Methodist Church has received a letter from a reader of this journal enclosing a donation which asks should be the beginning of a fund for purchase of a Gospel Car. Having read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Baptist Church had such a car he was anxious that Methodists should do likewise. The Board, however, has decided against his proposal would have returned his money had he his name and address.

A Conference on Missions to the Jews will be held in the Hebrew-Christian Church, St. Mark's Place, New York, November 13. Three meetings will be held each day, but evening meetings, which will commence at 7:45 o'clock, will be held in the Presbyterian Church, corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second Street. Among the eminent ministers who have promised to take part are: George C. Needham, Albert and W. J. man, Bishop Nicholson, S. H. Kellogg, and Alex. McLean, D. D.

The Central Union Mission in Washington, D. C., one of the best managed and most successful missions in the whole country, celebrated its seventh anniversary on October 1. The main hall of the mission has been every night during those seven years and vices have been held there. Besides this, rural branch missions have been organized, the Gospel wagon has made its journey into outlying districts and the workers have preached to crowds. During the year no less than 872 persons have professed conversion at the meetings in the Mission. 4,689 have made requests for prayer, the mission was organized, seven years ago, there have been 3,438 conversions. philanthropic work the Mission has been as usual. During the year, it has furnished lodging to 1,762 persons and given 3,335 while 200 persons have been clothed there.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Our Demand on Chili—La Marechale Booth-Clibborn's Visit—Hall Caine's Mission to Russia—Parnell's Successor—Strengthening our Navy—General Notes.

OUR trouble with Chili has, within the last few days, assumed a decidedly serious aspect. On Secretary Blaine's return to Washington, a conference was held at which President Harrison, and Secretaries Blaine and Tracey were present. The result was that instructions were immediately sent to U. S. Minister Egan, at Santiago, acting on which he appeared before the Chilean Junta and, in the name of the United States Government, demanded satisfaction and reparation for the outrageous assault upon the crew of the U.S.S. Baltimore in the streets of Valparaiso, and an immediate explanation of the entire affair. It is quite confidently asserted in official circles at Washington that the administration means to press matters with Chili until the latter gives some satisfactory explanation. An order has been given to the Navy Department to prepare at once a list of all vessels that can be sent to Chilean waters within ninety days, and this indicates that the government will be in readiness to make a formidable showing of naval strength, if necessary. There will, however, be no precipitate action, but due opportunity will be given to Chili to furnish explanation. It is strongly hoped that peaceful policies will prevail, but, in the present position of affairs, everything must depend upon Chili's answer and the attitude that government assumes regarding the insult to the flag. The President hopes to be able to announce in his annual message to Congress that the controversy has been satisfactorily adjusted. Within the time specified, the Navy Department will be able to equip for active duty in South Pacific waters the Philadelphia, Kearsarge, and Concord of Admiral Gherardi's squadron, the Chicago, Atlanta, and Bennington of Admiral Walker's squadron, and the Newark and Petrel, now at Boston and New York, respectively. All these could set sail for Valparaiso within 90 days. Besides, there are the Baltimore, now at Valparaiso, the San Francisco at Callao, and the Boston and Yorktown en route there. These, with the Yantic, Thetis, Ranger and Mohican, would give an available fleet of sixteen war ships—all modern, except four, and superior to any Chilean warship, except possibly the Captain Prat and Esmeralda. Chili has available three great battle ships, three armored cruisers, two large torpedo cruisers, five corvettes, and nineteen other armed boats of various sizes. The finest of these is the Captain Prat, one of the most formidable war vessels afloat, with an armament of eight great breech-loading guns and plates 12 inches thick and a speed of 19 knots an hour. If necessary, our own navy could hurry forward work on the now nearly completed monitor Miantonomoh, a vessel of such tremendous strength and armament that she could defy the entire Chilean fleet. But in all probability there will be no need of extreme measures with the South-American Republic, whose best interests, as well as those of the large body of English capitalists who have investments there, all lie in the direction of peace.

Traces of a Prehistoric Race.

As an exploring party was at work in the Gila Valley, Arizona, lately, a most interesting discovery was made. About ten miles from Gila Bend Station, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, is a hill about 800 feet above the valley, three sides of it almost inaccessible and the fourth so constructed that it could be held as a stronghold by a handful of troops against an army. On the summit are the ruins of a fortress with traces of barrancas and rawbridges, such as might have been used in some of the European castles in mediæval times. There are also the ruins of towers built of stone and cement, commanding the approaches to the fortress itself. Within the fortress are circles built with stone and cement, resembling modern rifle pits, and in these were found numerous flint arrow-heads and fragments of pottery and articles of warfare. Granaries for corn, cisterns and water-tanks had been hewn out of the solid rock, and on the enclosed summit were evidences that, at some remote period, a large number of people had settled down there, probably in a state of siege, with a determination to be self-sustaining. The only path to the fortress had been laboriously cut out of the granite sides of the mountain. These people, who belonged to a vigorous and industrious, but unknown race, unquestionably had a knowledge of architecture and mechanics; but in what remains of their once impregnable fortress, there has been found nothing by which they can be identified.

Will Redmond Succeed Parnell?

YOUNG, talented, and courageous, John E. Redmond, the Parnellite candidate for the vacancy in the House of Commons caused by Parnell's death, has come to the front as the self-announced "elected leader of the Parliamentary Party." He has already secured the support of a number of leading Parnellites, although John Dillon and the faction he represents have declared that he stands very little chance of being elected, unless the Tories withdraw their candidate and support him. Redmond is known as a politician of a vigorous and uncompromising stripe, one who does not hesitate to declare that he places little confidence in the Liberal promises to support a measure for securing autonomy for Ireland. Thus far the distinctive Parnellite element remains without a leader, and the division in the Irish ranks shows little prospect of being healed in time to make a solid front when Parliament opens.

Chicago's World Fair Profits.

ALREADY the shrewd Illinoisans are figuring on the harvest of dollars to be reaped during the World's Fair. They estimate that ten million visitors will seek the Fair Grounds and that the average individual expenditure will be not less than $30. There are some who even place the figures a good deal higher; but in any event, the big Western City realizes that it has struck a bonanza and is determined to make the most of it. The calculations are based on past experiences in similar great fairs. The World's Fair in London in 1851 netted $1,718,000, on an expenditure of $617,000; the Dublin Fair in 1853 made a loss; the Paris Fair in 1855 also made a loss, although 510,000 persons visited it; the World's Fair in London in 1862 had 6,250,000 visitors and that at Paris in 1867, 10,200,000 visitors. The Vienna Exposition of 1873 was profitable to all concerned and attracted 3,500,000 strangers. The Philadelphia Fair in 1876 had 9,910,000 visitors and that of Paris in 1878 sold 16,000,000 tickets, making an enormous profit to the Parisians and to trade generally. The great Paris show of 1889 returned a profit to the management of $1,600,000. Now, with all these experiences in view, Chicago estimates that the profit to the city in trade, will not be less than $500,000,000.

A Good-Natured Campaign.

IN spite of the efforts of the politicians to infuse an undue amount of excitement into the elections, owing to the nearness of the Presidential year, the canvass in almost all the states has been an unusually quiet and good-natured one. Even in New York, the amount of ante-election acrimony and vituperation has been remarkably small, and the gubernatorial candidates, Flower and Fassett, have been quite Chesterfieldian in their mutual attitude toward each other. The Strengthening Our Navy.

IN view of the possible complications with Chili, the launching of a new protected cruiser prevailing politeness has extended to local candidates, and we find Messrs. Meyer and Boody, the Republican and Democratic rivals for the Brooklyn mayoralty, fraternizing pleasantly in public, together. In Massachusetts the struggle for Governor swamped all other interests, Russell and Allen each having warm friends in abundance. A feature germane to the canvass, was the Senatorial prospects of Henry Cabot Lodge, which were dependent upon the success of the Republican candidate. A peculiar incident was the desertion of the Republican for the Prohibition standard by a number of colored voters—a thing hitherto unheard of. In Pennsylvania, the Democrats made use of the charges of corruption against Mr. Quay, the Republican manager, to some advantage, as many Republicans, in the country more particularly, were thereby led to vote the other ticket. Probably the only really hot old-time contest was in Ohio, between Governor Campbell and Major McKinley for the Governorship. Major McKinley was indefatigable and went all over the State, making fully 100 speeches dealing with labor and the tariff, while the Governor bent his energies on the Western Reserve, where he addressed great audiences of farmers, speaking toward the close as often as five times per day.

La Marechale Booth-Clibborn's Visit.

SINCE the death of Mrs. General Booth, of the Salvation Army, there is no more commanding female figure in the Army's work than that of La Marechale Booth-Clibborn, who arrived in this country from Paris a few days ago. It is now ten years ago since this lady, then a young girl, the eldest daughter of Gen. Booth, was sent to begin the work in the French capital. There she was received with sticks and stones, and she suffered persecution and even imprisonment for the cause she loved. Soon she was joined by Maud Ballington-Booth, then Miss Charlesworth, and the two young girls went among the rabid Communists, where even the police feared to venture, and preached the Gospel in their own way, quelling riots and facing wild crowds with sweet songs and brave faithful faces. Many times the two stood up before the Communists mobs at the peril of their lives. In Switzerland, even worse persecution was encountered. The brewers, saloon men, theatre managers and others instigated the people to violence and the Salvationist were expelled from the Canton of Geneva. For persistence in holding meetings La Marechale was imprisoned fourteen days at Neufchatel; but her heroism, and the plucky defence she made, were the means of turning public opinion in the Army's favor, and now its troops can sing and preach anywhere in the Swiss Republic. La Marechale, whose portrait is given above, is the wife of Commissioner Clibborn, formerly a Quaker Clergyman. She has been actively engaged in Salvation Army work since her ninth year, and her two baby daughters, Evangeline and Victoire, wear the scarlet sash and have ben consecrated to the same work. This is her first visit to the United States. She will speak in several cities, East and West, during her stay.

—a valuable addition to our navy—which took place last week, is of special interest. She is to be known as Cruiser No. 10 and will have a displacement of two thousand one hundred tons, twin screws, a speed of eighteen knots per hour, and a main battery of rapid fire guns. These vessels are unique in their kind, and cost each about six hundred thousand dollars. Work is being pushed on several other cruisers of similar pattern, and when finished, the cruiser fleet will be among the swiftest and

Mr. Hall Caine's Mission to Russia.

ONE of the most brilliant literary men in Europe, Mr. Hall Caine, a native of the Isle of Man, has been commissioned by the Russo-Jewish Committee of London, to visit the Czar's empire, for the purpose of ascertaining and faithfully reporting the actual condition of the Hebrews there. So many conflicting stories have been received concerning their treatment by Russia that such an inquiry has become absolutely necessary, and the high character of Mr. Caine, whose portrait appears on this page, leaves no doubt that it will be faithfully carried out. Writers have gone from Europe and this country, and, after spending some time in different parts of the Czar's domain, have recorded the result of their observations in language that has excited the indignation and sympathies of the whole civilized world. Much of what has been written, however, is challenged by official sources as having been overdrawn. Rev. Dr. Adler, the Chief Rabbi of London, and the head of the Russo-Jewish Committee, representing the more conservative element among his co-religionists, believes that justice can be best served by a dispassionate estimate of the situation, which will enable the Committee to work intelligently for the relief of their fellow-Hebrews. Mr Caine is the author of many works that have achieved celebrity, some of them stories of powerful historic interest, and showing a literary grasp that recalls both Victor Hugo and Charles Kingsley.

NEWS NOTES.

The Liberals have won a decisive victory in the Chilean elections.

There are fully 50,000 unemployed men in New York at present.

Professor Snow, of the American Public Health Association, estimates that the chinch bug does $100,000,000 damage yearly.

A crisis is believed to be approaching in Papal affairs and the prospect of the Pope leaving Rome is again being discussed in European capitals.

Walt Whitman, the aged poet and philosopher, is failing and his death is shortly expected. He is now 73 years old and lives at Camden, N. J.

Emperor William of Germany, has removed his whiskers and the sale of photographs of the bearded Imperial countenance has been stopped.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has issued rules to enforce the attendance of young Indian children at the schools established on the reservations.

Mr. Dibbs, the leader of the Opposition in the New South Wales Legislature, has succeeded Sir Henry Parkes as Premier and has formed a new Cabinet.

Germany has adopted a new uniform for her infantry soldiers. All bright colors and white have been discarded, and light headgear has been substituted for the heavy helmet.

The trustees of the Baron Hirsch Fund for the relief of the Hebrews in America are considering the advisability of dotting the tenement districts of New York with free baths.

A train on the Burlington Road dashed into a misplaced switch near Monmouth, Ill., a few nights ago, and the entire train was ditched, four persons being killed and a large number injured.

Under the law passed by the last Congress, bids were opened at Washington last week for extending the ocean mail service in American steamships. This points to a large increase in our merchant marine.

An uprising in Paraguay, with the object of overthrowing the government of President Gonzales, has been promptly suppressed, the rebels beaten in a fight with the government troops and driven into Argentina.

Annexation meetings, to be held at Stony Point, Woodstock, St. Catharine's, Bothwell, Niagara Falls, Thamesville, Winnipeg, Sarnia, Amherstburg, and other Canadian towns, have been arranged for early dates. The annexation feeling is spreading at a rate that alarms the old-time Conservatives throughout the Dominion.

MR. HALL CAINE.

LA MARECHALE BOOTH-CLIBBORN.

CRUISER NO. 10.

ALL OR NONE.

I SHALL have five texts—one of them a good one, the other four bad. The first text is God's text. Exodus 10: 26:—"There shall not a hoof be left behind." That is God's text, and the whole sermon will illustrate it by exposing the compromises with which it was met.

The other four are Pharaoh's texts, or, if you like, the devil's, for that is exactly what the devil says to man. Exodus 8: 25:—"Pharaoh called for Moses and for Aaron, and said, go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land." That is his first proposal. Then we find him saying at the twenty-eighth verse, "I will let you go that ye may sacrifice to the Lord your God in the wilderness; only ye shall not go far away." That is the second of his compromises. In the tenth chapter, at the eighth verse you have the third. He said to them, "Go, serve the Lord your God; but who are they that shall go?" Adding, "Go now, ye that are men and serve the Lord." And Pharaoh's fourth and last proposal is in the twenty-fourth verse of the same tenth chapter:—"Pharaoh called unto Moses, and said, Only let your flocks and your herds be stayed."

Satan's Tenacity.

Satan is very loth to give up his hold on men. He is quite as loth as Pharaoh, and he must be driven to it by force of arms; I mean by force of divine grace, before he will let God's people go. Many of Satan's slaves altogether disregard the voice of God. For them there are no Sabbaths, no Bibles, no religion. Practically they say, "Who is Jehovah that we should obey his voice?" Now, when God means to save men he soon puts an end to this. For some reason quite unknown to the man—it may be quite unguessed by him—he feels uneasy: he is disturbed. He thinks one morning he will go up to a place of worship; not that he cares much about it, but he thinks that he shall perhaps be a little easier there. He takes his Bible: he begins to read a chapter. A very striking passage comes before his eye. He is not more easy, for the text has fixed upon him. Like a barbed shaft it has struck into his soul, and he cannot draw it out again. He is more troubled than ever. He begins to inquire a little about the things of God; there is some respect now outwardly to religion; the man is considerably changed.

First Movements.

You see him sitting under the word of God, and perhaps Satan says now, "Well, you are a fine fellow. You are beginning to occupy a seat Sunday after Sunday in the house of prayer. You have given up your evil habits to a large extent. You are quite a different man. Now you have done something very pleasing to God. You may rest content with this." And it is a very sad thing when men do rest content with such a paltry hope as can have come out of poor performances like these. But still they will stop just there if they can, for Satan does not mind where he makes men halt so long as they will stay under the dominion of sin, and refuse to come to Christ.

If the Lord drives a man from that by the solemn movements of the Spirit upon his soul, then the devil will say to him "How do you know that this is all true?" and he has not to go far before he finds infidels to help his unbelief. I am sorry to say that he can find them in the pulpit pretty plentifully, preaching their infidelities as "advanced thought"; and so poor souls get bewildered, and scarcely know their right hand from their left, and they begin again to relapse into a condition of indifference, and remain where they were.

Blessed be God, if he means to save such, he will, by push and pike, and point of bayonet, carry the day. They shall not rest where they are. The right hand of the Lord is stretched out still, and he will make the Pharaoh of evil yet know that Jehovah is stronger than he. Grace is mightier than nature, so at last it comes to this—that the man is driven to yield to God; and when he is driven to that point Satan comes in again with

His Compromises.

We are going to speak about these four compromises to-night. The first compromise is found in the eighth chapter at the twenty-fifth verse.

"Sacrifice to your God in the land."

"Yes," says the devil, "you must be a Christian, that is evident. You cannot hold out any longer, for you are too uneasy in your sins. You will have to be a Christian." "But," says he, "stop in the world and be a Christian. Remain where you are. 'Sacrifice to your God in the land'; by which he sometimes means this: live in sin, and be a believer. Trust yourself with Christ, and then indulge yourself in whatsoever your heart desires. Do you not know that he is a Saviour of sinners? Therefore stop in your sin, and yet trust in him. Oh, I charge you, by the living God, never be duped by such a treacherous lie as this, for it is not possible that you can find any rest or salvation while you live in sin. My dear hearers, Christ came to save us from our sins, but not in our sins. He has built a hospital of mercy into which he receives the worst possible cases. All are welcome, but he does not receive them that they may continue sick, but that he may heal them and make sound men of them. What a fool a man is who thinks that he may drink and be a Christian, that he may cheat in his business and be a Christian, that he may act like the ungodly world in all respects, and yet be a Christian. It cannot be.

Complete Separation.

Yes, but Satan, retreating a little, says, "Well, now, of course I did not mean that you were not to give up your grosser sins; but I mean to tell you of something better. Love the world, and live with worldlings, and find your company and your joy among them, and yet be a Christian. Surely you are not going to throw up everybody, are you? You know you must not be singular. You must not make yourself an oddity altogether. You have many merry companions of yours, keep to them. They do not, perhaps, do you much good. Well, you must not be too particular and precise." So he says, "Continue in the world, and be a Christian." Shall I tell you God's word about that? "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." That is short, though not sweet. A man says, "Can I not put my hymn-book in one pocket and a pack of cards in the other, and so go to heaven and keep friends with the world?" No, it is not possible. "Let my people go, that they may serve me," is God's word. "Come ye out from among them; be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing." Shun with horror Satan's old compromise: dream not that you can love the world, and yet have the love of God in you.

When the enemy cannot get on with that, he harks back a little, and cries, "That is very proper: you are hearing very faithful teaching this time, but listen to me! You can live for yourself, and be a Christian. Do not go out into worldly company, but enjoy yourself at home. You see you want to have your own soul saved. Well, live for that." This is only a subtler and ### Uglier Form of Selfishness.

It is that, and nothing better. "Look," says Satan, "I do not ask you to be profligate with your money, be penurious with it: be very thrifty. Everybody will pat you on the back, and say, 'He is taking care of number one, and he is doing the right thing.' Come, now; and make a good thing of religion. Believe in Jesus Christ, of course, in order that you yourself may be saved, and then live all the rest of your life trying to hear sermons that will feed you, and read books that will comfort you, and become a great man among religious folks." Hateful advice! Do you not know, dear friends, that the very essence of Christianity is for a man to deny himself? So you must come out of that. Selfishness will not do. You must love the Lord with all your heart, and you must love your fellow-men. There must be an obedience to that command that thou "love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself," or else there is no coming out into safety. Thus the first compromise will not hold.

Secret Discipleship.

Pushed back from the first compromise, Pharaoh proposed a second, and this is found in the twenty-eighth verse of the eighth chapter:

"Only ye shall not go very far away."

Satan says, "Yes, I see your conscience tells you that you must come out from the world, and come out from sin, but do not go very far away, for you may want to come back again. In the first place, do not make it public. Do not join a church. Be like a rat behind the wainscot. Never come out except it be at night to get a mouthful of food. Do not commit yourself by being baptized, and joining the Church; do not go so very far as that. Just try, if you can, and save yourself from the wrath to come by secret religion, but do not let any one know it: There really cannot be any need of actually saying, 'I am a Christian.'" My friend, this is the very depth of Satan. This is what Satan would have with some of you, that you may fall by little and little. Therefore defeat him: come out boldly. Take up your cross, and follow Jesus. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

The tempter also says, "Do not be so very precise and exact. The Puritanic saints—well, people point the finger at them. You need not be quite so particular." By which he means this—that you may sin as much as you like so long as you and that you are not to obey God thoroughly, but only to obey him when it pleases you. This is flat rebellion against God. This will never do.

Do not Violate Propriety,

"Well," he says, "if you are to be so precise do not be so desperately earnest. There are some of those Christian people who are always looking after the souls of others, and trying to proclaim Christ to everybody. You know they are a very dogmatic lot, and they are a great deal too pushing and fanatical. Do not go with them." Just so. He means, stand and serve the Lord, because you dare not do any other, but never give him your heart; never throw your soul into his cause. That is what Satan says; and do you think that such traitorous service will save you? If Moses had thought that going a little way into the wilderness would have saved

Israel, he would have let them go a little way into the wilderness, and there would have been an end of it. But Moses knew that nothing would do for God's Israel, but to go clean away as far as ever they could, and put a deep Red Sea between them and Egypt. He knew that they were never to turn back again, come what might, and so Moses pushed for a going forth to a distance; as I would in God's name push for full committal to Christ with everybody who is tempted to a compromise.

"Oh, but," Satan will say, "be earnest too. Yes, be earnest. Of course that is right enough, and be precise in all your actions; but do not be one of those people who are always praying in secret. You can keep an open religious profession going without much private praying, without heart-searching, without communion with God. These are tough things," says he, "to keep up. You will find it difficult to maintain the inward life, and preserve a clean heart and a right spirit. Let these go by default, and and be always busy and active; and that will do." But it will not do, for unless the heart and soul be renewed by the Spirit of God, it little matters what your externals may be. You have failed before God unless your very soul is joined unto him by a perpetual covenant that shall never be forgotten. What a blessing it is when a man can say—I have done with these compromises; I do not want to serve God and find favor with the world. I do not want to go just a little way from the world. I pray God to divide me from the world by an everlasting divorce, just as it was with Paul when he said, "The world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."

Attend to externals,

Pushed back from that, the enemy suggests another compromise in the tenth chapter, at verses eight and eleven:

"Go, serve the Lord your God: but who are they that shall go? Go now, ye that are men, and serve the Lord."

Yes, that is his next point. "Yes," he says, "we see what it has come to. You are driven at last to this—that you must be an out-and-out Christian; but, now," he says, do not worry your wife with it;

Do not Take it Home."

Or he says to the woman, "You are to follow Christ. You seem driven to that; but never say anything to your husband about it." Was not that a pretty idea of Pharaoh's—that all the men were to go, and were to leave the women and children to be his slaves? And that is just the idea of Satan. "You have plenty to do to look after yourself; but your wife—well, leave her to her own ways. Your husband—leave him to his irreligion." Let us answer him thus—"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." So said Joshua of old, and so let every man here say.

And the children. "Oh," Pharaoh says, "leave the children!" Do you not see he knew very well that, if they did that, they would themselves come back again? What man among us would go away into the wilderness, and leave his wife and children in slavery? Should we not want to come back to them? Should we not think that we heard their cries? Should we not want to look into their dear faces again?

Leave them in Slavery?

Oh, that cannot be! And yet let me say there are many professing Christians who seem as though they were themselves determined to be the Lord's, but their children should belong to Pharaoh and the devil. Well, the girls must go into society; of course, they must "go into society." And so everything is done to put them into places of danger where they will not be likely to be converted, and where, in all probability, they will become gay, and vain, and light.

Then a situation is looked out for the boy. How often there is no question about the master being a Christian! Is it a business that the lad can follow without injury to his morals? "Nay, it is a fine roaring trade, and it is a cutting house, where he will pick it up in a smart way. Let him go there." Ay; and if he goes to perdition? Alas, there are Christian men who do not think of that! The children of some professors are offered up to the Moloch of this world. We think it a horrible thing that the heathens should offer their

Children in Sacrifice

to idols, and yet many professors put their children where, according to all likelihood, they will be ruined. Do not let it be so. Do not let the devil entangle one of you in that compromise, but say, "No, no, no; my house, God helping me, shall be so conducted that I will not put temptation in my children's way. I will not lead them into the paths of sin. If they will go wrong, despite their father's exhortations and their mother's tears, why, they must; but, at any rate, I will be clear of their blood, for I will not put them into places where they would be led astray."

Now the devil is getting pushed into a corner. Here is the man's whole house to go right for God, and the man gives himself up to be a Christian out and out. What now? "Well," says the enemy in the twenty-fourth verse,

"Go ye, serve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed."

Just so. What does Moses say to that? "Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt-offerings, that we may sacrifice unto Jehovah our God. Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not a hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God; and we know not with what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither." This was the divine policy of

"No Surrender,"

and I plead for it with you. Satan says, "Do not use your property for God. Do not use your talents and your abilities; especially, do not use your money for the Lord Jesus. Keep that for yourself. You will want it one of these days, perhaps. Keep it for your own enjoyment. Live to God in other things, but, as to that, live to yourself." Now, a genuine Christian says, "When I gave myself to the Lord I gave him everything I had. From the crown of my head to the sole of my foot I am the Lord's. I cannot leave my substance to be the devil's. That must come with me, and must be all my Lord's; for his it is even as I am."

The Christian takes the line which Moses dictated: "I do not know what I may be required to give. I know that I am to sacrifice unto the Lord my God, and I do not know how much. I cannot tell what may be the needs of the poor, the needs of the church, the needs of Christ's church all over the land. I do not know, but this I know, that all that I have stands at the surrender point. If my Redeemer wants it he shall have it."

Now, brothers and sisters, you that profess to be Christians, come you, stand right square out, and own yourselves wholly and altogether the Lord's. "My house is his, and my all is his. Whether I live or die—whether I work or suffer, all that I am, and all that I have, shall be forever my Lord's." This is to enter into peace: this indeed is to be clean delivered from the power of Satan; this is to be the Lord's free man; and what remains but with joyful footsteps to go onward toward Canaan, enjoying all things in him, and finding him in all things? This is to be a Christian of the true order. The Lord make you so by faith in his dear Son! Amen and Amen.

WHITE SLAVES.*

IN the old time, after a tour of observation, a wise man came home to say, "So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun; and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter." If this report had been written by one who had been climbing with me through the tenement houses of not less than a score of Boston streets, conversing with the sewing-women, looking on their poverty-lined faces and their ragged children, breathing the poisonous air of the quarters where they work, and listening to their heart-rending stories of cruelty and oppression, it would be an appropriate summary of our observation. It is my purpose at this time to take you on a tour of observation. As well-lighted streets are better than policemen to ensure safety and good order, so I believe that the best possible service I can render the public is to turn on the light, and tell as plainly and as simply as I can, the story of what I have seen and heard and smelled in the white slave-quarters, which are a disgrace to our fair city.

I shall confine myself at first to the work of women and children in their own homes. Most of this work is parcelled out to them by middlemen who are known as "Sweaters." It is a foul word, born of the greed and lust for gold which pervade the most reckless and wicked financial circles of our time. The sweater takes large contracts and divides it out among the very poor, reducing the price to starvation limits, and reserving the profits for himself. Some of the women whose story I shall tell do not work for sweaters, but are treated almost as badly by the powerful and wealthy firms who employ them. In these cases the firm itself has learned the sweater's secret, and through an agent of its own is sweating the life blood out of these half-starved victims.

Fifteen Cents a Dozen.

Let us begin near at home with a South Boston case, which came to my notice through the dispensary doctor for the district. It is a widow with one child—a little boy scarcely three years old. The child is just recovering from a troublesome sickness, through which the doctor became acquainted with her. She has been sewing for a good while for one of the largest and most respectable dry-goods houses in Washington Street—a firm whose name is a household word throughout New England. Her sewing has been confined to two lines—cloaks and aprons. For some time she has been making white aprons—a good long apron requiring a yard, perhaps of material; it is hemmed across the bottom and on both sides, the band, or apron-string is hemmed on both sides, and then sewed on to the apron, making six long seams. For these she is paid fifteen cents a dozen! And beside that, this great rich firm, whose members are rolling in wealth and luxury, charges this poor widow fifteen cents expressage on her package of ten dozen aprons, so that for making one hundred and twenty aprons, such as I have described, she receives, net, one dollar and thirty-five cents! If she works from seven o'clock in the morning till eleven o'clock at night, she can make four dozen; but with the care of her child, she is unable to average more than three dozen, for which after the expressage is taken out, she receives forty cents a day for the support of herself and her child. Her rent *From White Slaves by Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D. D., a startling exposure of the cruelties and oppressions practised in Boston, Mass., on the worthy poor. The classes described are not the criminal or the lazy poor but people who are anxious to work for a livelihood and who are being ground down to starvation wages by wealthy and reputable employers. Dr. Banks writes from personal knowledge and he could find similar and even worse cases in New York and other cities. Pp. 204. for the one little room is one dollar per week. It is idle to say that this firm is compelled to do this by competition, for the material and making of these aprons cost less than ten cents, and the firm retails them ordinarily at twenty-five cents apiece.

Human Vultures.

The city abounds in organized firms of sharpers, who prey upon the necessities of the hard-pinched laborer. If there be anything in Boston that can rival the cruelty of the tenement-house sweat-shop you will find it in the dens of some chattel-mortgage sharps, whose business methods I have investigated. Here is a woman who made her living by making overalls at five cents a pair. Times of course were always hard with her. Her husband was out of work a good part of the time. At a period when they were in a specially hard strait, they borrowed ten dollars of one of these loan sharks. They were to pay two dollars a month interest on it. If at any time it ran over two or three days and the interest was not paid, so that the collector had to call for it, he charged and collected two dollars extra for calling. The money was secured by a chattel-mortgage upon every article of household furniture they possessed. These mortgages are ironclad, and put the people at the mercy of the man who holds them. In the course of fifteen months, under the cover of this loan of ten dollars, this firm managed to squeeze forty dollars out of the earnings of these people; and then they came to foreclose the mortgage and take away the furniture, and would have removed every household article they possessed had not the police officer on the beat, a man of noble heart and generous instincts, stepped in and agreed to become personally responsible for the amount. I know of another case, that of a Swedish family who "got behind," and could not pay the rent. Sickness came upon them and they borrowed fifty dollars. In a little over a year they paid sixty dollars in interest, but the principal had not been reduced one dollar. Some of the instalment firms are just as bad, and are often in league with these sharpers.

The Church's Duty.

To my mind Christianity stands to-day very much as it stood two thousand years ago, when Jesus hung upon the cross between two thieves. The anarchy which, atheistic and reckless, would destroy all law and all property, is one of the thieves, and the devotee of the gold-god of our time, who clutches his money-bags and says: "I have a right to get all the money I can and do with it what I please," is the other thief. Christianity stands between them; her mission is to change them both, and bring them with a regenerated purpose into brotherhood and fellowship.

All hail the dawn of a new day breaking,
When a strong-armed nation shall take away
The weary burden from backs that are aching
With maximum work and minimum pay.
When no man is honored who hoards his millions,
When no man feasts on another's toil,
And God's poor suffering, starving billions
Shall share his riches of sun and soil.

RESCUING THE WAIFS.

The Means Adopted by Practical Christian Workers for Making Good Christian Citizens out of the Boys of the Streets.

THE work among boys, which Rev. J. C. Collins will describe this week at the Convention of Christian Workers, in Washington, is one of the most hopeful of the many efforts devised during the past few years for the benefit of particular classes. It originated, as was briefly mentioned in the article on the Convention, which appeared with portraits and illustrations in this journal last week, with Mr. Collins himself and the Society of Christian Workers was so much impressed by the good already accomplished, that in 1887 it was formally adopted by the Society and special measures were taken for its extension and development. Since that time the movement has grown rapidly, new clubs have been organized and a very large number of boys have availed themselves of their advantages.

A Boys' Club as conceived by Mr. Collins, is simply a large, clean room as near as possible to the centre of the city. It has a library of about a hundred first-class boys' books, chiefly biography, history and travel. These are on open shelves at one end of the room, so that the boys may take them down themselves. Then there are the appliances for various quiet games. A few long tables and chairs, and with warmth and light the Boys' Club is complete. It is placed in charge of an earnest Christian young man, abundantly furnished with patience, tact and the love of souls. The club-room is opened about six or seven in the evening all through the winter, and is kept open till nine or half-past nine. The boys of the streets, whose homes are in some rear tenement, where there is neither comfort nor amusement, are not slow to appreciate a nice bright warm room where they can read an interesting book, or play a game of checkers or dominoes. They are glad to become regular members and spend their evenings there. Membership tickets are given free and are highly valued by the boys. That is the beginning. It is, however, only the beginning, though it is much to get the boys away from the pavement and the doors of the saloons. Mr. Collins has no faith in any system which is not religious. But the first business is to get hold of the boys and, as he says, when he is angling he does not use a boat-hook. The initial letter at the head of this column is formed of a picture taken from a photograph of three barefoot boys who are fair specimens of those who come to a Boys' Club.

Now begins the real work of the Boys' Club. The Superintendent has his material with which to work. There is running water at hand and the boys of their own accord soon prefer to wash their faces and hands before sitting down; thus habits of cleanliness are formed. Then the Superintendent opens a penny Savings Bank and offers interest. As soon as a boy has five dollars to his credit he is advised to transfer his account to a regular Savings Bank; the habit of thrift is inculcated. Would any of the boys like to learn a trade? Carpentry, shoe-making, telegraphy, type-setting? Ten or fifteen boys can make up a class and by paying a small fee each—say twenty cents for ten lessons can help pay the cost of a teacher. Thus a habit of industry and self help is inculcated. Then, now and again, the Superintendent can arrange a field-day. Some kindly friend will come and play and sing, and another will give a reading or an interesting talk and the boys are pleased with the entertainment.

During this time the Superintendent is making acquaintances. The boys know that he is their friend or he would not have charge of a place like that. They tell him where they live and what they do. Would they not like to go to a Sunday School? The Superintendent knows where they will be welcome. He spends the early part of the day, before the club opens, in visiting the parents of members.

They have seen the improvement in their son and they welcome the instrument of it. Here is an opportunity for Christian work and helpfulness in many ways. They tell him their troubles and he gives them advice, perhaps induces them to attend church. The Superintendent also pays frequent visits to the Police Court. A boy has been arrested for some small offence. The judge knows that to send him to prison will be to help him on the way to ruin. He is willing to place him in the charge of such a man as the Superintendent of the Boys' Club, who knows how to handle boys and who promises to look after the boy and try to redeem him.

Although the movement is yet in its infancy and the number of towns in which Boys' Clubs have been organized is comparatively small, over eleven thousand boys have already been registered as members and have been influenced for good. Their ages vary from eight years to fourteen—that very critical period when a word spoken on the right side and a little care, which the father, sometimes careless, sometimes exhausted with his day's labor, is unable to give, may save a boy from evil and make a man of him. The work, of course, is restricted by the lack of funds at command. It costs about fifteen hundred dollars a year to establish and support such a club as we have described. The results cannot be estimated in dollars. One needs to know how much a boy is worth. Or, if money is to be the standard, how much the State will gain if that barefoot boy you meet in the street, instead of growing up to steal, and to be maintained in prison for years, becomes an honest, self-supporting citizen. It would pay the State to provide funds for such a work, but it would be better if a few Christian men in every town and city would band together and furnish the means. If there are any such men in a city which has no such institution, who would enter on the Christ-like work they cannot do better than communicate with Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn., who will be glad to give them aid and advice.

THIRTY-SIX YEARS' PERSISTENCE.

IN answer to a question as to answers to prayer, George Muller, whose portrait and life appeared recently in this journal, told an incident of his own experience, which shows the patient faith of the man. He says:

I have had immediate answers to prayer, so many that I could reckon them by tens of thousands. If I say that during the fifty-four years and nine months that I have been a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ I have had thirty thousand answers to prayer, either in the same hour or the same day that the requests were made, I should not go a particle too far. Often, before leaving my bedroom in the morning, I have had prayer answered that was offered that morning, and in the course of the day I have had five or six more answers to prayer; so that at least thirty thousand prayers have been answered the self-same hour or the self-same day that they were offered.

But one or the other might suppose all my prayers had been thus promptly answered. No; not all of them. Sometimes I have had to wait weeks, months, or years; sometimes many years. During the first six weeks of the year 1866 I heard of the conversion of six persons for whom I had been praying for a long time. For one I had been praying between two and three years; for another between three and four years; for another above seven years; for the fourth above ten years; for the fifth about fifteen years; and for the sixth above twenty years.

In one instance my faith has been tried even more than this. In November 1844, I began to pray for the conversion of five individuals. I prayed every day without one single intermission, whether sick or in health, on the land or on the sea, and whatever the pressure of my engagements might be. Eighteen months elapsed before the first of the five were converted. I thanked God, and prayed on for the others. Five years elapsed, and then the second was converted. I thanked God for the second, and then prayed on for the other three. Day by day I continued to pray for them, and six years more passed before the third was converted. I thanked God for three, and went on praying for the other two. These two remain unconverted. The man to whom God, in the richness of his grace, has given tens of thousands of answers to prayer, in the self-same hour or day on which they were offered, has been praying day by day for nearly thirty-six years for the conversion of these two individuals, and yet they remain unconverted; for next November it will be thirty-six years since I began to pray for their conversion. But I hope in God, I pray on, and look yet for the answer.

NOT OF THE WORLD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 15. John 15: 19; 17: 15, 16; 1. John 2: 15.

WHEN a man is conscious of being near death, his prayers for his family and friends are sure to be for blessings which he deems essential for them. He will no longer be with them to help them, to advise them, to protect them. What will they need? What does he desire for them? Jesus was in this situation. He had loved his own with an infinite love. He was about to give the highest conceivable proof of it by laying down his life for them. What does he desire on their behalf? His gaze stretches forward and he sees a mighty host being gathered through them and those who shall follow them. He is concerned about them too. He prays for all. They will be in danger. They will be surrounded with men of power and influence whose principles are diametrically opposed to those which he has been laboring to instill into their minds. Satan, who tempted him, will tempt them. The world will attract them with its pleasures and vanities. What is it that he desires for them? That petition, whatever it may be, will give us the key to his ideal of the Christian.

The occasion is very solemn. As we listen to the Great Teacher pleading with his Father for his beloved ones we learn what he desires for them and whatever we may have wished before this, we cease to wish it now and long only that his prayer may be answered. "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world." Why not? The Master has his own weighty reasons. If they were taken out of the world the light he has been kindling would be taken away. They are to shine. They are to enlighten the world, to tell men what he has been teaching them, to make known the way to better things. It would be ill for the world if they were taken away and he does not ask for it. Nor would it be well for them. Their faith was weak, they knew little as yet of the power at their command. Driven to bay, ostracized, confronted with enemies subtle and powerful, they would test their weapons and would be themselves as much amazed as their assailants at the effect. They would gain confidence, they would see lives transformed by the truths they were to utter, they would grow in patience, in faith and love. It would be well for them as well as for the world that they should not be taken away. An acorn was given to a Chinaman, and he was told that out of it an oak, like the one from which it fell, would grow. But he planted it in a flower-pot and kept it in-doors. It grew, but lacking the winds and storms which would have made it strong and hardy in the open air, it was dwarfed and feeble. The robust, vigorous, useful Christian is not developed in the cloister but in conflict with the world.

Jesus would not pray that his followers should be taken out of the world, but there was something for which he would pray. There is a pitiful, loving yearning in the words of that cry: that "Thou wouldst keep them from the evil." In the world, but not of it. Surrounded by evil, but not contaminated. That is Christ's desire. Influencing but not influenced. Kept unspotted from the world. It is a noble conception. The Christian in the workshop, in the office, in the store, in the bank, in the factory, on shipboard, among all kinds of evil, of seductive influences, yet holding fast to his faith, his virtue and purity, and from him radiating an influence which affects all who come in contact with him. He is a power because of the Divine life within him. The echo of his Lord's cry rings in his ears when temptation assails him, "That thou wouldst keep them from the evil," and he is strong in God's strength to resist. The selfishness, the greed, the jealous rivalry of the world are far down below the level on which he lives. He loves not the world nor the things of the world, for his affections are set on things above.

Jesus was praying for us who have believed on him "through their word." Has his prayer been answered so far as we are concerned? If we do not know, our friends and neighbors know, and the world knows. Does the world believe that that man has the spirit of Christ whom it hears depreciating his rivals, whom it sees pushing and crowding to secure the best place in the car for himself, who is harsh and overbearing to his employees, who makes hard bargains with those who deal with him, and who adds house to house and field to field knowing that thousands of his brethren, in the same city with him, lack the common necessities of life? That man, if he be a Christian, has not been kept from the evil. And he has not been kept because he would not be kept.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Bertha A. Holmes may obtain all information as to the mode of organizing a Circle of King's Daughters by writing to the headquarters of the Order, 158 West 23d Street, N. Y., where crosses, etc., can also be purchased.

Robert A. Ward will find the Baptist Young People's Society practically identical in aim with the Society of Christian Endeavor, but it is, as its name implies, composed exclusively of members of one denomination. It therefore differs from the Society of Christian Endeavor in that point as the latter aims to unite in aggressive religious work, members of various denominations, who agree on the fundamental principles of the Gospel.

Henry Mendenhall. No, the officers of the Christian Endeavor Society do not receive any salary from the Society.

R. L. W. Each Circle of King's Daughters is practically independent. It can choose its own objects for aid and relief. The Central Council is composed of ladies living in or near New York City. Mrs. Margaret Bottome is President of the Order and Chairman of the Devotional Committee and of the Committee on Work for men and boys. She is the wife of a Methodist minister but the Order is undenominational.

THE WISCONSIN ASSOCIATIONS.

At a State Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Wisconsin held recently at Milwaukee, thirty-four associations were represented. The report showed that two new associations had been organized and no work discontinued. Thirty-five paid men are engaged in local fields; 113 local conferences and five district conventions were held against thirty-five last year. At these conferences $554.21 were raised for State work, and over one hundred conversions reported. Among the city associations, reports showed a large increase in membership, increase in professed conversions, better financial condition and more interest in Bible study.

The work among the lumbermen and miners was reported as in most excellent condition, thousands of miles having been travelled, hundreds of meetings held and much good done.

Other marked features of the convention were the midnight meeting at which ten men out of a large number gathered in from neighboring saloons, professed conversion; the meetings at the German Department; and the men's meeting at the central department led by L. W. Messer, which resulted in sixteen professed conversions.

A KING'S DAUGHTER IN SIBERIA.

A FORMIDABLE expedition, "In His Name," has been undertaken by Miss Kate Marsden—a lady who wears both the Silver Cross and the Red Cross, indicating her membership in the Order of King's Daughters and in the Society of the Red Cross, which ministers to sufferers in war, epidemics, and overwhelming public calamities. She has had much experience in nursing the sick in many lands and is about to go to India to labor among the lepers. In studying the disease, preparatory to setting out, she heard that a remedy for it was to be found in Siberia, and she resolved to go there and see for herself. An interesting account of her journey is sent by Mrs. Mary B. Willard to the Silver Cross. It appears from this narrative that Miss Marsden had no difficulty in securing from the Czar such a passport as has given her access to prisons, convict establishments, and hospitals everywhere. She has, therefore, without losing sight of the primary object of her journey, had abundant opportunities of doing good by the way. She has been allowed to talk freely with the convicts on their way to the mines and deserts which are to be the scene of their exile, and also to those who have reached their destination. Her medical knowledge has enabled her to give physical as well as spiritual aid to her afflicted sisters. Mrs. Willard's object in writing is to raise a fund for Miss Marsden's use. That lady had sufficient funds for her journey when starting, but she was so touched by the miseries she witnessed that her kind heart would not allow her to part from the sufferers without leaving in their hands gifts of tea, sugar, and other comforts, and also copies of the Gospels. Many of these women are Nihilists and a large number of them are in utter ignorance of the Gospel. As Miss Marsden told them of Jesus their interest became intense and their longing to hear more of him was profound. She could not let the opportunity pass of giving a new Testament to those who would value it so much and who need it so bitterly. In this way the money set apart for her journey has been exhausted, and she is in need of funds to proceed to the farthest part of Siberia where the plant is said to exist of which she is in search.

"Before reaching Omsk," says Mrs. Willard, "Miss Marsden met Bishop Dionesius, a Greek priest who has labored for forty years in that part of Siberia in which she hopes to find the plant which is said to be a specific for leprosy, and he added his testimony to its existence among the wild tribes around Yakoutsk, and its efficacy in many instances personally known to him. Thus encouraged, Miss Marsden journeyed on alone, to Irkutsk, where she has a third of journey still before her.

"In the letter just received she has pencilled a little sketch of the barge on which she is to travel for many weeks up the River Lena. It is a kind of raft covered over, and on the cargo the passengers make their beds. The boats are floated by the current, which is very powerful, as far as Yakoutsk, and then burned for firewood, so it may be inferred that they are not built for comfort or endurance. Black bread for the voyage is laid in store and upon this the voyagers must depend for their food during the month. From Yakoutsk comes a long horseback ride of many hundred miles, into the leper regions, where Miss Marsden and a physician who accompanies her during this part of the journey expect to make their test of the herb which, through the kindness of Bishop Dionesius, they hope to find awaiting them in sufficient supply on their arrival in Yakoutsk."

The King's Daughters have reason to rejoice in having among their number a lady who who will venture on such a journey In His Name.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations ask us to remind our readers of the Week of Prayer for young men, which is fixed for November 8-14. The address calls attention to the fact that the call to this season of prayer "comes to the American Association this year not only from our own International Convention at Kansas City, but with equal urgency from the more recent World's Conference at Amsterdam. From both meetings the outlook gained over the entire Association field indicates decided progress in work among young men. Not only have the American Associations grown in strength, numbers and useful work, but in other lands and continents similar advance is noticeable. To the World's Conference were brought encouraging reports of progress in Great Britain, Germany, France, Switzerland, Holland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Italy. In India, a national organization of the Associations has been affected, and to the committee of the World's Conference were added members from India and Japan. The Associations have more reason than ever before to heed this call of their representatives coming from both sides of the ocean, to a season of praise, thanksgiving and prayer for the blessing of God upon their work.

"The Committee urges upon every Association the importance of a unanimous and faithful observance of the Day and Week indicated. Special attention is also called to the recommendation of the Kansas City Convention that unusual attention and prayerfulness mark the observance of this season so that it may, by God's blessing, result in the conversion of the largest number of young men. That, in that time, every Association, however small, be urged to a special thank-offering to be used for the furtherance of the international work. The aid that can be rendered by such contributions to the great work laid upon the Committee by the Associations, is greatly needed and will be very welcome. All such collections should be forwarded to the treasurer, B. C. Wetmore, 40 E. 23d St., N. Y."

ONCE IN AWHILE.

IT is easy enough to be pleasant
When life flows by like a song;
But the man worth while is the one who will smile
When everything else goes wrong;
For the test of the heart is trouble,
And it always comes with the years,
And the smile that is worth the praises of earth
Is the smile that shines through tears.

By the cynic, the sad, the fallen,
Who had no strength for the strife,
The world's highway is cumbered to-day
They make up the items of life.
But the virtue that conquers passion,
And the sorrow that hides in a smile,
It is these that are worth the homage of earth,
For we find them but once in awhile.

—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells of Life in China and the Perils Endured by Missionaries and their Wives.

MISSIONARY work has a special attraction for the youthful Christian mind. Perhaps it is because in early life, the heart is overflowing with love and sympathy for the neglected and the oppressed; perhaps because there is in connection with a missionary career, particularly in eastern countries so much that is romantic and adventurous, that contemplation kindles in the young mind a fine enthusiasm and a desire to go out into the world and help spread the Gospel message abroad.

Uncle John, having spent some time in the Flowery Kingdom during his travels, was eagerly questioned by the junior portion of the household, whose interest had been stirred up by the news of the terrible peril of our missionaries in China.

"The Chinese," he said in explanation, "are the most exclusive people in the world. It was a hard fight for many years before they could be persuaded even to open a single port for purposes of commerce. A few were opened by treaty, and then the merchants found, to their dismay,—so bitter was the hostility to foreigners,—that no trading could be done unless the merchant vessels were protected by a naval force. The first missionaries who went to China took their lives in their hands, for they found the native priests—representing the three great religious sects, Buddhism, Confucianism and Taoism—determined to resent the introduction of Christianity. Although the government was disposed to be more liberal and even granted some privileges to the missionaries, the priests from time to time roused the fanaticism of the people and they attacked the missionaries and massacred the natives who had become Christians. This has been repeated of late years, and quite lately France, Germany, England and our own government succeeded in securing from the Emperor an edict addressed to all the governors of the provinces throughout the country, commanding them to protect the missionaries and afford all the necessary facilities for their work. But here again the priests, acting in conjunction with many secret societies that seek to overthrow the present government of China, were successful in making the edict useless. You have read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD how the poor missionaries have been driven from their stations, their dwellings burned and robbed of their contents and their pupils subjected to terrible cruelties."

"Yes; we read about the attacks on the teachers at Hankow and other places," said Tom.

"Not only at Hankow, but at Wusuch, Wuhu, Ichang, and many other towns along the Yang-tse-kiang, the great commercial river of the Empire. The most important of the secret societies is the Kolahut, and, while it has instigated many of the assaults upon the missionaries, its real object is to procure the downfall of the present Emperor. But nearly every naval power has warships in Chinese waters now, and any attempt against the lives of missionaries will instantly be punished. Much as the missionaries are opposed to violent measures, it may become necessary to teach the Chinese a lesson that will secure foreigners protection in the future."

"Who were the first missionaries to China?"
"The first I don't recall but among the earliest were the Rev. Griffith John, of the London Missionary Society, who is known as 'The Apostle of Hankow,' and the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission. The latter paid a visit to the United States, quite lately. Both have done magnificent work in the Gospel field, and may properly be regarded as the pioneer missionaries in Central China. Griffith John was converted in boyhood, and after receiving an academic training, started for China in his twenty-third year, having solemnly dedicated himself to the work. He studied the Mandarin dialect, which educated men use there, as well as the language of the common people. In 1861 he went to Hankow, a large inland city on the Wangpoo River. Since then he has travelled much and preached the Gospel in almost every province in the kingdom. Besides he has done much good work fighting the vices of opium-smoking and gambling. All Chinamen own little boys and girls, and their skin is almost as fair, while in the south they are olive-complexioned. In the north are eternal snows; in the south smoking volcanoes. The ladies of Peking and Hongkong totter about painfully on their compressed feet, about three and a half inches long and hardly bigger than those of a goat, trailing their dainty silks behind them, while the Tartar women, who leave their feet as nature made them, have really a fine carriage."

"How do they manage to keep their feet so small?" enquired one of the children.

"By a process called 'footbinding' begun when they are babies, like Sister Milly there" was the reply. "The four small toes are tucked in under the sole and they gradually become a part of it, while the heel is forced forward to meet them. But with all their faults and their peculiar way of doing most things backward, as it seems to us, the Chinese have some fine traits. Every year a Chinaman pays his debts. The obedience of children to parents is simply perfect. Then, they are the politest people in the world. Indeed, sometimes this politeness is carried so far that it is hardly agreeable to a guest, who is urged by his host to accept things he must never really dream of accepting. Another odd thing is that when cold weather comes, a Chinese father or mother doesn't go, as we do, and build a hot fire in the furnace. They put on extra clothing on the children and keep adding to their garments until they look more like over-dressed dolls than anything else I ever saw. Still another strange thing is to find a literary family, where father and sons are really cultured, while the mother and daughters cannot even read. The common name in China is Wang—just as Smith is common here, only more so."

"But while one may like the novelty of an experience among them, an American can never get thoroughly accustomed to some things, eating with chop-sticks instead of knife and fork, for instance. Soup, dumplings, cakes, rice, chopped meats, chopped fish and a variety of member how at home, at the family altar, Jesus so often shed the "oil of gladness on their head."

Family worship, says the Evangelical Messenger, is a power if engaged in spirit and in truth. Eternity alone will reveal the amount of good accomplished through this instrumentality. Should we not, every time we engage in family worship, expect and realize a sensation of the presence of Jesus? This would bring more fruit, more immediate results—more liberty in the praise of God.

FALL BLESSINGS.

ALREADY the poets are tuning their harps to wintry chords. One of them sings thus plaintively:

It seems but yesterday and yet
To-day I find my garden set
In silver and the royster wind
Made bold to pluck me by the gown.
What time I wandered up and down
The patch to see if left behind
Was one last rose that I might press
Against my withered cheek, and less
Feel time unkind.

But the blessings of the Fall are with us as abundantly and there is cause rather for thanksgiving than for sorrow. What a delightful home is that where parents and children alike find reason for praise and thankfulness the year round!

"We have not only the present surroundings to make us happy," says Dr. Talmage, "but our minds are crowded with vivid reminiscences. The memory becomes a kaleidoscope, and every minute the scene changes. You give to the kaleidoscope of memory a turn and there they are, natural as life, around the country hearth on a cold winter night. Hear the hickory fire crackle, and see the shadows flit up and down the wall. Games that sometimes well-nigh upset the chair—"Blind Man's Buff," "Who's got the Button," "The Popping Corn," "The Molasses Pudding," and the witch stories that made the neighbors' boys afraid to go home after dark. Hickory nuts on one dish, roseate apples on the other. The boisterous plays of "More Bags on the Mill," "Leap Frog," "Catcher," around and around the room until someone got hurt and a kiss was offered to make up the hurt, the kiss more resented than the hurt. High old times! Father and mother got up and went into the next room because they could not stand the racket. Then, instead of compunctions of conscience, a worse racket. But now the scene is fading out. You had better turn the kaleidoscope."

The Secret of a Happy Home.

The beauty of home with Christian training and love and obedience is grandly illustrated in a chapter from the experience of a German family, which is related by John W. Kramer in his book: The Right Road. A teacher once lived in Strasburg who had hard work to support his family of nine children. Still they were his chief joy and delight. His brain would have reeled and his heart sunk if he had not trusted in his Heavenly Father, when he thought of the number of jackets, stockings, and dresses they would need in the course of a year, and the quantity of bread and potatoes they would eat. His house, too, was very close quarters for the many beds and cribs, to say nothing of the room required for the noise and fun which the merry nine made. But father and mother managed very well and the house was a pattern of neatness and order.

One day there came a guest to the house. As they sat at dinner the stranger looked at the hungry children about the table and said compassionately:

"Poor man! What a cross you have to bear!"

"! A cross to bear?" cried the father, wonderingly. "What do you mean?"

"Nine children, and seven of them boys at that," replied the stranger; adding bitterly, "I have but two, and each of them is a nail in my coffin."

"Mine are not," said the father with decision. "How does that happen?" asked the guest.

"Because I have taught them that noble art of obedience. Isn't that so, children?"

"Yes," cried the children.

"And you obey me willingly?" The two little girls laughed roguishly, but the seven youngsters shouted, "Yes, dear father, truly."

Then the father said to the guest: "Sir, if death were to come in at that door waiting to take one of my nine children, I would say"—and he pulled off his velvet cap and hurled it at the door—"Rascal, who cheated you into the belief that I had one too many?"

The stranger sighed; for he saw that it was only disobedient children that make a father unhappy.

are inveterate gamblers, and Mr. John has known them to gamble away even their wives and children."

A shudder ran through the little group on hearing this statement.

"The other eminent missionary, Mr. Taylor, was consecrated to God from his birth, as many children of Christian parents are. As a boy he took a great interest in China, and at fifteen he began to study in earnest for the work to which God had evidently called him. His education was very meagre. In 1853 he sailed and his experiences in the mission field for many years were very perilous and exciting. He was attacked by fanatical mobs, for preaching and distributing the Gospel, but the work of the Inland mission prospered in spite of persecution. His letters home were the means of stirring up the missionary spirit in many young men's souls, and a number joined him as helpers. There are now several hundred zealously at work, but there is room in that great land, with its 360,000,000 population, for many more, for there are entire provinces where Christ's message has never yet been delivered and where idolatry, superstition, and darkness prevail."

"China is a land of wide extreme and queer customs," continued Uncle John. "In the north, the children have red cheeks, like our delicacies such as birds' nest soup, sharks' fins, ducks' tongues and dishes that are found nowhere else in the world are set before you, and with as good a grace as possible you go through the formality of dipping your chopsticks into the different platters and taking the chances of ever getting the morsel to your lips. Yet there are 180,000,000 queues that nod an accompaniment to twice that number of chopsticks every meal time in China."

The Family Altar.

It is never forgotten in after life. Our sons and daughters feel stronger and thank God to the end of their earthly pilgrimage, that they were raised at the family altar. Away from home, even after they have erected their own family altar, they think of the time when father read in the family Bible, and father and mother, brothers and sisters bowed together at the throne of grace—and though separated from them, they join them in this holy and delightful soul-mellowing service.

There is a scene, where spirits blend,
Where friends hold fellowship with friend;
Though sundered far, by faith they meet
Around one common mercy seat.

Perhaps years after father and mother have entered into their rest, the children reverently re-

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Aleph, a young Chaldean student, of a notable family arrives in Alexandria with his friend and companion, Cimon, a Greek, who has visited the city many years previously. During the journey down the Nile, the latter points out the various places of interest to Aleph. Egypt is under Roman rule, and the period is early in the first century of the Christian era. On landing, the friends encounter an aged Egyptian, Seti, to whom a drunken Roman officer is about to offer violence, when Aleph disarms the latter, very skillfully. Seti is grateful to the youth and on leaving him warns him that he has made an enemy of the dissipated son of Ptoleus the Roman Governor of the city. He also cautions him against Ptoleus and also against Malus, a crafty Jewish trader of great influence. The two friends pass some time in viewing the sights of the city, after which Aleph, who is there on highly important business matters, seeks the great banker Alexander. Before visiting him, however, he learns some interesting facts regarding the man he is to see. Alexander is the Alabarch, or representative head of the orthodox Hebrews of Alexandria, a man of great wealth and influence, to whom the magnates of all nationalities, and even the government officials themselves, frequently resort for financial aid. His place of business is a vast, imposing building of great strength, and here at times come the students, travelers with letters of credit, merchants and others. On arriving there, Aleph while he waits, amuses himself in studying the faces of those who, like himself have come for the purpose of doing business with the banker.

CHAPTER III. Continued.

THE two students who came in with Aleph seemed better to deserve the name. They had just come from a lecture by Philo, a brother of the Alabarch; and found much to commend in his ingenious attempts to Hellenize the Hebrew writers or to Hebraize the Greek—they were uncertain which way to put it.

They agreed that he was a very broad man and ready to do justice to great men of other nationality than his own. They were also hearing lectures on astronomy and Hipparchus in the observatory rooms at the Serapeum, as well as on the physics and metaphysics of Aristotle at the Museum.

Aleph was not sorry to have this little insight into student life in Alexandria; and considering the number of persons in the room on his arrival, he was expecting to have a still longer time to observe and listen, when, to his surprise and apparently to that of others around, a special servant came to conduct him to the banker.

After passing through a large room occupied by many persons busy at desks, and crossing a broad passage from which rose a flight of marble steps, they came to a small room plainly furnished, in which were seated two men. What was his surprise to recognize in one of them the Egyptian Seti! The pleasure he felt sprang at once to his face, as he advanced with a warm but modest greeting which the aged man cordially reciprocated, and then presented him to the Alabarch as "the young man of whom we have been speaking."

Alexander was a Jew to the slightest inspection. But his features though national were royally so, and might have belonged to Solomon. Their whole expression bespoke one accustomed to great thoughts and plans; while yet a certain watchfulness, like distant pickets about a royal encampment, looked out from far back in his frank and friendly eyes as of one who knows that all sorts of characters will come to a banker, and who knows how to protect himself on occasion. His manners were polished and courtly—as might have been expected of one who dealt only with the highest and most cultured classes, and was even a companion of princes. In watching him one felt sure that the man was larger than his wealth, however large that might be. He was still in the prime of life, and without a thread of silver in his dark hair and beard.

Alexander received the young man graciously, though with wide-open, all-observing eyes.

"I happened," said the Egyptian to Aleph, "to be with my son when your name was brought in; and, though you gave me no name yesterday, I fancied that the Chaldean was the friend I have occasion to remember, and that his first business would naturally be a banker. I had just finished explaining how we met when you came in."

"That I am as glad as surprised," returned the young man, "to see you here and in such a relation, you doubtless have already discovered. Perhaps I am the more glad because my business with this gentleman is such as may call for a word of friendly prepossession in my favor from one who is known here. For the present I am compelled to remain unknown. I can only appear as Aleph, the Chaldean, in company with his preceptor and friend, Cimon, the Athenian. So I have no papers to present on which to ask an open account for him and myself, within certain limits, with a banker. I have only certain jewels to place in his hands, of the value of which he must judge"—and he drew from the bosom of his tunic a small box which he opened and handed to Alexander.

The banker was surprised. In all his wide experience he had never fallen in with such brilliants—so large, so beautifully and variously hued, with such soft and mystic fires playing about them and raying out from their inmost depths. A pearl, a ruby, a sapphire, and a diamond—that was all; but, as Alexander turned the box this way and that, there flashed out upon him such lovely lights as he had never seen in the Imperial treasury at Rome, enriched as it was with the regalia of many nations.

After carefully taking out each gem and examining it on all sides, and then as carefully replacing it in its luxurious bed, Alexander at length fetched a long breath and slowly said:

"If any common stranger had brought me these remarkable jewels I should have demanded to know his name and station—in short, that he is the rightful owner of such a treasure. This would only be a common prudence. But I happen to have an uncommon father-in-law, who has a notion that he has a gift of reading character in faces and bearing, and who thinks so favorably of yours that he might quarrel with me if I should deal with you on strictly business principles. I should be sorry to have him do that. Besides, to tell the truth, I have something of his weakness for a good face and figure, and whatever else that indescribable something about you is that demands confidence. So I think I will venture"—and he threw an arch look and smile at Seti.

And he drew two sheets of papyrus toward himself. After writing for some time, he read over to himself carefully what he had written, and then handed the sheet to Aleph, saying, "Is this satisfactory?"

The young man read a full description of the box and its contents; an acknowledgment of the receipt of it as basis for credit to the extent of 200,000 aurei (1) or staters, (2) to be drawn upon at pleasure in large or small sums; also a promise to restore the jewels on repayment of sums advanced with a moderate interest.

Aleph pronounced the paper entirely satisfactory, and far more favorable than he had any reason to expect—adding, however, that he had no idea of making any large drafts on the sum pledged; as one of the objects he had in view in Alexandria would compel him to live in a very quiet and inexpensive way, even if it were not a matter of choice.

Alexander then proceeded to copy the document, and to affix his signature and seal to it and to the copy. He retained one and gave the other to Aleph, with a parcel of small slips of papyrus (3) each already signed by himself, but otherwise blank, saying:

"Whenever you wish current money, fill in one of these with the sum desired, in your own handwriting and with your name as given to-day, and present it in the room through which you passed in coming here. . . . Now I will put this treasure where it will be somewhat safer than it was when walking the streets of Alexandria under the protection of a cane,"—and he rose and took the box and his copy of the paper he had just executed to carry them into an adjoining room whose door, massive with iron, proclaimed the very citadel of the financial stronghold.

"Will you add this small parcel of valuable documents to the box?" said Aleph, as he again produced from the bosom of his tunic an elaborately tied and sealed parcel.

Alexander had hardly resumed his seat, after a few moments' absence, when a light step was heard descending the stairs in the neighboring passage, the door softly opened a little, then wider, and after a moment a young lady advanced into the room. Seti and Aleph were so seated that they could not well be seen from the door; and the maiden, seeing none but Alexander, went hastily up to him, put her hand on his shoulder, kissed his forehead, and said:

"Father, word has just been brought to me that my poor nurse, Miriam, who has come back to the city sick, is now dying, and wants to see me. May I take a servant with me and go? In the absence of my mother and brothers I thought I had better come directly to you, as I may need to be gone for some time, and you would be alarmed at my prolonged absence."

"Certainly I would have been. Take two servants: then you can send one of them back for anything that may be needed. Let the woman have every possible help and comfort. But, Rachael, do you not notice your grandfather?"—nodding his head toward Seti, who had risen and was coming toward her.

Rachael turned suddenly, with a faint exclamation of surprise, and sprang into the open arms of the Egyptian, exclaiming:

"When did you come? I thought you were still in Upper Egypt. How glad I am to see you, my dear grandfather—as glad as one can be whose foster-mother lies dying!"

"I will not keep you from her—only to answer your question by saying that I reached the city safely last evening, thanks to a young friend of mine. No particulars at present. Perhaps I will step in at Miriam's on our way home (I accidentally heard of her whereabouts this morning), and see if the leech has done his best, and, if not, whether old Egypt can do better."

"Do, grandfather," she pleaded, "and come soon: for I verily believe that the priest Seti knows more of the healing art than all the rest of Alexandria—the daughters of my people not excepted."

As she glided toward the door her eye rested for a moment with a startled look on Aleph. He had till now been unobserved. The tall form of Seti had been interposed. She hesitated a moment, as if to make sure that the young man was not some one whom she ought to recognize, and then hastened away.

Ah, those great, lovely eyes! It was but a second that their inquiring look rested on him; but they at once made him forget every other feature. He had not failed to notice her faultless figure, the queenly carriage of her head, the easy grace and even majesty of her every movement; and when she turned to greet Seti he had had full view of an exquisite face, hesitating between girlhood and womanhood—a face wonderfully luminous with a certain spiritual and lofty loveliness—but the moment her eyes shot their fires into his, all previous impressions vanished, and he saw nothing but eyes, eyes. In talking over the events of the day with Cimon at the khan in the evening, he could not, for the life of him, remember distinctly whether she was tall or short, dark or brown-haired, light-complexioned or otherwise—he could only remember the glorious eyes. But the young man was in Alexandria for a purpose, and a great one: and what had he to do with a maiden's haunting eyes? Just nothing at all. So he turned his own eyes to the business in hand; and the effulgent twin stars that had just risen above his horizon, contrary to the order of Nature, silently sank back again and disappeared—almost.

He rose to take leave. But Alexander said, "Wait a little," and touched a string. A servant appeared, to whom he gave some directions in a low voice. When he had dismissed the man, he said that he had just sent to notify those in waiting that no more business would be done to-day. He added that he usually closed business earlier on the sixth day of the week out of regard to the sacred seventh, and that so he had some leisure for conversation; if the young man would resume his seat.

"Speaking of our Sabbath," continued he; "reminds me that I ought to invite you to our place of worship for to-morrow: for I learn that you are not a worshipper of Belus?"

"Hardly," said Aleph with a smile.

"Nor a fire-worshipper?"

"By no means."

"Nor a worshipper of the sun, moon and stars?"

"I was not so taught," emphatically.

"But you were taught to worship the One God who made the heavens and the earth, and who spake by Moses and the other prophets."

"Even so: our family religion for generations has been that of the Hebrews—it being the most credible and satisfactory within our knowledge."

"Our common friend here could not tell me quite as much as this," said Alexander with a gratified look, "but I am glad to hear it, and hope to learn at some future time how your family came into possession of our faith. You observe our sacred day?"

"I do, as does also my companion. Though a Greek by birth, he is a Hebrew in religion. We will be pleased to accept your invitation for to-morrow. Where shall we find your place of worship?"

"We Jews are 300,000 strong. So there are several synagogues in the city; but two of these are much larger than the rest, and stand for two different schools of doctrine among us. The one with which I am connected is the Diapleuston and is on the street of Canopus, not far from here. The other is on Emporium Street, and is not so large as ours, but still has many substantial adherents, of whom Malus, our chief shipping merchant, is the most prominent. Indeed, I think that he is now the chief ruler of his synagogue."

"May I ask," inquired Aleph, "what the doctrinal difference between the two synagogues is?"

"The chief difference," answered Alexander, "relates to the degree of authority to be allowed to our Sacred Books. We of the Diapleuston say that their authority is final on all matters of which they speak—that their writers were so guided and guarded by Jehovah in composing them that they were at first perfectly free from mistake of all sorts: while the other school maintain that, while properly enough said to be of divine origin, our Scriptures have always been more or less mistaken in their teachings and need to be sifted by learned men. Especially are they prepared to admit the possibility of mistake to almost any extent in Moses and the earlier Scripture writers. Not a few deny that we have any Moses. What passes under the ancient name is really the invention of recent times."

"This is the result I should expect. One seems to be left at liberty to take as much or little of the Scriptures as suits him: for if parts of them are unreliable, and we have no sure way of determining where these parts are, we will be likely to locate them where our prejudices and inclinations say. The larger part of the Book may easily be considered secular or unimportant by one who wishes as much."

"Very true," said Alexander; "and see what the other synagogue, have actually come to! Some reject the doctrine of angels, some that of a human soul distinct from the body, some that of personal responsibility, and nearly all that of miracles and all other forms of supernaturalism in history, as well as that of a future state of settled character and destiny for men. And so on. Really, between them all, there is very little of the Sacred Book left. The sum of their doubts and denials would cover almost the whole of it. What is left is the brief revelation, that Malus, the Sadducee, uses. His maxim is to discard what anybody doubts."

"This seems to me a sad state of things," said Aleph, fetching a long breath that was almost a sigh. "It would be almost unimaginable in the house of my fathers. Practically, these people are without a revelation. The only revelation to each is that bundle of guesses and notions which he calls his knowledge or judgment: and there are about as many different revelations of this sort as there are men; and, to my thinking, they are all about equally worthless. It is sad that circumcised people have some uncircumcised notions."

"A sad state of things, indeed," consented Alexander, "but we may console ourselves with the fact that this sad sort of people are a minority and a small one, and have been quite unknown among our people till quite recent times. I trust they will soon become unknown again. When the Messiah, whom we are daily looking for, comes and accrediting himself by signs and wonders, declares that not one jot or tittle of the law shall fail, even Malus will have a revelation that is worth the having."

"May he come quickly!" said the young man devoutly.

Alexander looked intently for a moment on the kindling and abstracted face before him, and then as devoutly said "Amen."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Josie C. Priest, Phila., writes:

I noticed that in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD information is wanted of the correct title of a poem which is "The Master stood in His Garden."

The music is by James McGranahan, and is in the book called "The Gospel Choir."

H. C. Call, No. Adams, Mass., referring to E. W. M.'s question, writes:

The Cabalists described seven heavens, each rising in happiness above the other; the highest being the abode of God and the most exalted angels. The term "Seventh Heaven," when used by clergymen, refers to the Heaven of Heavens. (II. Chron. 5:18.)

J. Bell, Nashville, Tenn. Who was the first missionary? Where do we find the first record of missionary work?

The first missionary of whom we have any account was St. Paul. See Acts 11:29, 30, for the first recorded missionary collection, showing that the work had then actually begun. The pioneer missionary sent from this country to a foreign land was Adoniram Judson.

P. O. B., Berea, Cuyahoga Co., Ohio. Which is the latest and best translation of the Bible, according to modern investigation and comparison of languages, especially Hebrew and Greek?

The Revised Version, which may be had of almost any bookseller. The most eminent scholars in the world worked upon it for years together, and it is unquestionably what you want.

Subscriber, Newburg, Pa. What is the unpardonable sin?

There have been many theories on the subject. There is little doubt, however, that it consisted in ascribing to Satanic power the miracles worked by the Saviour. It showed the moral sense and to indicate that the person was beyond the pale of mercy.

Miss S. C. Staunton, Va. What is the proper name to be engraved on bridal presents of silver, etc? Should the last initial be that of the bride's maiden name, or that of the groom's name, or can the initials of the given name of both parties be given with the surname of the groom?

The usual custom is to engrave the initials of both parties, if the gifts are given at the wedding. You had better consult a jeweler, however, as these customs vary.

S. F. Morse, Brunswick, N. J. Why may not the words: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," in Matt. 28:19, be regarded as an interpolation, seeing that the Apostles neither taught nor used that formula and that it also lacks the necessary confirmation of two or three witnesses and was given before the New Testament or Covenant was confirmed by Christ's death and made forever unalterable thereby?

These words appear in the Revised Version which omitted all that was doubtful or not contained in the oldest manuscripts. The fact of their retention shows that they were in the oldest manuscripts, and we cannot go beyond the authoritative conclusion reached by the Revisers.

Subscriber (no address.) The tenth commandment forbids covetousness; is it wrong for me to wish I was as rich as So-and-So when I know I should use my money in doing good?

Covetousness is to wish for something in the possession of another. Probably you would be content for Mr. So-and-So to retain his money, too. It is not his money that you are wishing for, but simply that you might have money to use in God's service. If so, you are not coveting. The wish, however, is not to be commended. If you are trusting in God and believing that he arranges the lot of all his servants, would it not be wiser to be content with the lot he has arranged for you? You remember Agur's words, (Prov. 30:9): "Give me not riches lest I be full and deny thee. . . . Feed me with food convenient for me." You are right in endeavoring in all legitimate ways to gain money, but you are wrong and show a spirit of rebellion against God if you repine because riches are denied you.

S. Brantford, Ont., Can. If by expense, time, and culture, fruits, flowers and animals are greatly improved in usefulness and value, how much more essential is it that these factors should be employed in the culture of the human family? The comparative few who have wealth do bring up their children cultured ladies and gentlemen, but the great mass cannot afford it. How far in the direction of culture should this latter class go? Is a man justified in contributing largely to the cause of Christ at the expense of his children's culture? The great mass of the children of Christians are in this position from the cause named. Where shall the line be drawn?

The Mosaic law required one-tenth of the entire income to be devoted to the Lord. There is abundant evidence that a man who gives liberally is not impoverished thereby. (See Prov. 11:24.) The spirit of Christianity requires every man to do the best he can for his family in the way of education and culture. (See I. Tim. 5:8.)

P. B. Rant, Williamstown. Where did the devil come from? By whom created? How did sin enter heaven?

Your questions have puzzled theologians for centuries, and have occasioned discussions which have had no profitable issue. There is no source of reliable information but that contained in Scripture and that is of a very meagre character. See Rev. 12:7, 9, and 11, Peter 2:4. The inference from those and other passages is that Satan was created by God as man was, that he was pure and innocent but like man liable to fall. That he did fall and was cast out of heaven. If cannot be conceived that God created an evil being, though, as we know to our sorrow, he did create a being who became evil. The whole subject is wrapped in mystery and the Bible writers are more intent on the practical question of teaching us how to be delivered from the power of Satan than in giving us his biography. The less we know of him and have to do with him the better for us.

Taking butter from milk was known in the earliest times. It was left for our time to make a milk of cod-liver oil.

Milk, the emulsion of butter, is an easier food than butter. Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil is an easier food than cod-liver oil. It is rest for digestion. It stimulates, helps, restores, digestion; and, at the same time, supplies the body a kind of nourishment it can get in no other way.

A WORKER'S TRIAL.

It would be difficult to find anyone who ever really derived any permanent advantage from working on the Sabbath, although many in a small way of business—such as bakers and greengrocers—imagine that they would lose their trade if they were to discontinue the practice. There are, however, many persons now living and doing well who have thought otherwise, and who have prospered beyond their most sanguine expectations. A pleasing instance occurred to a young man, a baker by trade, who lived in a seaport town of Maine. He had resided in the place sufficiently long to form many pleasant connections, and to become greatly attached to his abode, when he was told by his employers that in consequence of some new arrangements, his services would be required during part of the Sabbath, namely, from nine in the morning till two in the afternoon. His employers, seeing that the young man was greatly perplexed, said to him:

"You can take a month to consider the matter, and then we will talk further on the subject;" intimating at the same time that unless he complied with the proposal they would be constrained, although unwillingly, to look out for another assistant.

The young man was greatly distressed; he desired to continue in the situation which he occupied till able to commence business on his own account, and there was certainly no hope whatever of his obtaining a similar situation in the town. His determination was, however, soon made; and notwithstanding the earnest remonstrances of his young friends, who entreated him not to ruin himself, he firmly yet respectfully made known to his employers that he could not work on the Lord's Day.

"Very well, then the matter is settled," was the brief reply. Nothing more was said; the master turned on on his heel, though not without a secret consciousness that the place of the young man would not be readily supplied—and the discharged journeyman went slowly to his lodging, hoping, as he turned round the corner, and passed the door of the baking-house, that he might hear the voice of his master calling him to return.

A week passed—then another; the faith of the young man was sorely tried, but he remembered the promises of the Bible, and took courage; at length, when his savings were nearly exhausted, he wrote a letter to his family that he was going so Boston in quest of a situation, probably from thence to Portland; and that, in the event of his not succeeding, he should return in about a week. This done, he proceeded to put the letter into the post-office, and had nearly reached the place when he was beckoned across the street by an elderly tradesman, who asked him if he had got a situation. On being answered in the negative, the baker, for such he was, said:

"Well, I have been thinking about retiring from the cares of business for some time past. I have no family, and have acquired sufficient to take me to my journey's end; so if you feel inclined to take my business you shall have it."

The young man answered that he would gladly embrace such a favorable offer, but having neither relations nor friends to assist him with the necessary capital, he should not be able to do so.

"Well I have thought that matter over, too," said the tradesman, "and the difficulty can be easily got over. Let the stock be valued by mutual friends, and an agreement drawn up and signed, and you shall pay me by installments. I know that you are a young man of sound principles, and therefore I will undertake to recommend you to those with whom I have been in the habit of dealing, as well as to those who deal with me. Never fear; do as I have done, trust in Divine Providence, and you will do well."

The agreement was made at once, and the young man returned to his lodging in high spirits; it was no longer needful to set out for Boston, nor yet to ask his friends to look out for a situation on his account. He wrote to them, indeed, and that on the same day; but his letter told only of joy and thankfulness. In about a fortnight he commenced business, and shortly after married a very respectable young woman. He is now a flourishing tradesman, with a good prospect of retiring from business "independent" at no distant period.

TWO GIRLS.

There is a girl, says a writer in The St. Louis Advocate, and I love to think of her and talk of her, who never comes in late when there is company, who wears a pretty little air of mingled responsibility and anxiety with her youth, whom the others seem to depend upon for many comforts. She is the girl who helps mother. In her own home she is a blessed little saint and comforter. She takes unfinished tasks from the tired, stiff fingers that falter at their work; her strong, young figure is a staff upon which the gray-haired, white-faced mother leans and is rested. She helps mother with the spring sewing, with the week's mending, with a cheerful conversation and congenial companionship that some girls do not think worth while wasting on only mother.

The girl who works—God bless her!—is another girl whom I know. She is brave and active. She is not too proud to earn her own living, or ashamed to be caught at her daily task. She is studious and painstaking and patient. She smiles at you from behind counter or desk. There is a memory of her sewed into each silken gown. She is like a beautiful mountaineer already far up the hill, and the sight of her should be a fine inspiration for us all. It is an honor to know this girl—to be worthy of her regard.

WHERE FLOWERS BLOOM.

There is a land where flowers bloom
Abundantly and free,
Where smiles the softest, bluest sky
On sparkling, silver sea.

O, land of innocence and love
Without a grief or care!
Where children bound light as the wave
In arch of treasures rare.

To heaven's light I see the bud
Ope dewy petals fair;
Its perfume light as angels' breath
Now fills the morning air.

The rose is withered, fallen, dead;
Of beauty naught remains
Save leaves which on the ground are strewn,
Soon lost by winds and rains.

Then do not idly sit and pine
For joys no more to be;
But see where flowers eternal bloom,
Beyond fair Canaan's sea.

—MARY S. WAYMAN.

THE REST CURE

Is very often the best cure. But many people cannot afford to rest indefinitely. Worse still, the very knowledge that they cannot, seriously interferes with the best use of the rest they have. Too often going to the doctor means that the patient shall stop short, while cares, duties, and expenses keep right on. Many therefore hesitate and delay.

Drs. Starkey & Palen's COMPOUND OXYGEN presents an easy way out of this common dilemma. Has done it for a score of years, and for more than three score thousand people. The agent used is pure Oxygen. The method used puts it directly where it can do the most good—in the Lungs. The Treatment neither interferes with business or pleasure. This simple thing has made multitudes of run-down, over-worked, nervous, and sick people as good as new. A book of 200 pages tells who (in small part), and how in their own words. Gladly mailed free on receipt of address.

There are "other makes" of Compound Oxygen, as there are "other makes" of U. S. Bank Notes. This calls for caution only.

Revised Edition - - - 140th Thousand.

OUR COUNTRY.

By DR. JOSIAH STRONG,

Paper, 30 cts. Cloth, 60 cts.

THE MOST POWERFUL BOOK OF THE CENTURY ON AMERICA.

This revision, which is based on the census of 1890, shows the changes of the last ten years and pictures the religious, social, and economic conditions and tendencies of our country to-day, thus adding to the value of the earlier editions the merit of being the first general application of the revelations of the recent census to the discussions of the great questions of the day. The present edition has been printed from entirely new plates, and enlarged by the addition of more than one-third new matter. Diagrams have also been employed to illustrate some of the more startling facts and comparisons.

DOES CHILI MEAN WAR?

The Southern Republic Assumes a Defiant Attitude, Instead of Explaining the Killing of American Sailors in Valparaiso—The Official Despatches Indicate Warlike Possibilities—The Two Fleets Contrasted.

It is only a few months since the Chilean squadron visited the United States and its officers were feted and entertained at New York, Boston and other leading American ports. Uncle Sam's blue-jackets and the diminutive man-of-war's men of the Southern Republic fraternized together, while their official superiors exchanged many courtesies and compliments. At that time, also, our own State Department was in amicable communication with the government at Santiago on the reciprocity question, for Chili, as the leading Southern commercial power and the centre of the great nitrate traffic, was to be an important factor in the new commercial policy. The war with Peru several years ago, from which the Chileans had emerged victorious, had for a time prostrated Chilean commerce, but the national energies brought speedy recuperation. At the same time, that war had produced two evils of no common magnitude: it had burdened the country with a huge debt and unsettled the old conservative administrative methods, placing the reins of government in the hands of political factionists who did not hesitate to manage it to suit their own selfish interests.

Jose Balmaceda, the President of Chili, was the most pronounced representative of this class of statesmanship. Rapacious and self-seeking to an intense degree, he conducted the governmental machine rather as a personal perquisite than a public office. At last his offences against constitutional government grew so rank in the nostrils of the Chileans that a formidable political party was organized which ultimately accomplished his overthrow; but only after a civil war, costing thousands of lives and many millions of treasure. Throughout the whole of that war, which was only recently ended, and whose progress was reported from time to time in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the sympathies of our own government were on the side of the Congress armies representing the opposition to Balmaceda's tyrannical rule. But our warships that lay in Chilean waters for the protection of American interests—like those of other nations in guarding the respective foreign interests—remained neutral spectators of the struggle. Our minister to Chili, Mr. Maurice Egan, it is true, has been accused in some quarters of a too active sympathy with the Balmacedists, and of acting in an advisory capacity to the dictator, and thus giving special offence to the Congress Party and its leaders; but this is denied. Still, even the mere color of partisanship at such a critical period, was enough to inflame the excited Chileans, who were struggling bravely for their liberties, and the unfounded impression of American sympathy with their unpopular ruler undoubtedly gained a foothold sufficiently strong to furnish a clue to the undisguised resentment displayed by the Chileans toward our citizens now in that country.

It was in all probability this unfounded impression that was the provoking element in the Valparaiso affair. On October 16th, last, a party of seamen from the U. S. S. Baltimore, then in Valparaiso harbor, while in the city and walking about unarmed and unsuspecting of danger, were attacked by a Chilean mob with knives and pistols. During the melee, an armed force of police came upon the scene and when all was over a number of the Americans were lying unconscious; one, Charles Higgins, a boatswain's mate, was dead, another, Arthur Turnbull, was dying, and four others were dangerously injured. The character of some of the wounds showed that the police had used their bayonets on the unarmed Americans. Thirty-five of the sailors were arrested and dragged through the streets to jail from which they were afterwards released.

Immediately on this outrageous occurrence being reported by Captain Schley of the Baltimore and Minister Egan to the government at Washington, a despatch was sent by President Harrison's order to Mr. Egan, directing him to bring the matter to the attention of the Chilean government and inquire whether there were any qualifying circumstances within its knowledge, and whether it had any explanation to make of its failure to investigate the affair and bring the guilty persons to justice. The closing words of this dispatch were:

You will at once bring to the attention of the Government of Chili the facts as reported to you ing of others, but even more as an apparent expression of an unfriendliness towards this Government which might put in peril the maintenance of amicable relations between the two countries.

If the facts are as reported by Capt. Schley, this Government cannot doubt that the Government of Chili will offer prompt and full reparation.

To the utter astonishment of the government at Washington, a despatch was received from Minister Egan by cable, announcing that the Chilean Minister of Foreign Affairs regarded our government's despatch as formulating demands and advancing threats that were "not acceptable, nor could they be accepted in the present case or in any other of like nature." He insisted that he recognized only the jurisdiction and authority of his own country in judging and punishing the guilty in Chilean territory. An investigation had been going on, but it was secret, and the result could not be communicated, as it was still in progress. Meanwhile he could not admit that the Valparaiso disorders or the silence of his government should appear as an expression of unfriendliness toward the United States. This, which was in effect a repudiation of official responsibility for the killing of the Baltimore's ed by a glance at the peculiar condition of the political parties there at the present time. When President Balmaceda's government dissolved under the guns of the Congress armies, a Provisional government was formed, with George Montt, Commander of the Navy, as President and chief of the Junta de Gobierno, or governing body. But with the total disappearance of Balmaceda's power, there sprang into activity a number of factions, each body striving for the Presidency when the Provisional government should be superseded. At the present time there are several rival candidates in Santiago, and among them are various members of the Junta. Both in her army and navy, Chili may be said to be in fighting humor, and these candidates have apparently resolved rather to risk a diplomatic rupture with a friendly power than incur the disapproval of the Chileans in their present temper.

With the elections settled, calmer and juster counsels would doubtless prevail. Senor Pedro Montt, the new Chilean Minister at Washington, states that his government will assuredly do justice in the Valparaiso matter, and that no Chilean official could have sympathized with the attack upon unarmed American sailors. In spite of the prevailing excitement, the opinion holds in high official circles that the affair will terminate satisfactorily and peacefully.

Meanwhile the greatest activity prevails in naval circles in anticipation of possible hostilities. Our warships are being made ready as rapidly as possible for active service, and within the next few weeks a formidable fleet will be in waiting for emergencies. The President will take no further steps until Minister Egan's full report concerning the action of the Junta is received. It is even possible that our government may ignore the Junta altogether, and await the formation of a stable government in Chili, before enforcing our demands, as, in the present unsettled condition of affairs in that country, precipitate action by the United States would have the appearance of an unnecessary display of force toward a puny nation. Still, our naval chiefs, while quite ready for war if it comes, by no means underrate the strength of the Chilean navy. That country has thirty-two vessels of all grades available for service, of which two are ironclads, one a cruiser, two torpedo gunboats, three improvised cruisers and several other gunboats and cruisers of an inferior class. The U. S. warships Baltimore and San Francisco could not attack the Chilean fleet in the by Capt. Schley, and will inquire whether there are any qualifying facts in the possession of that Government or any explanation to be offered of an event that has very deeply pained the people of the United States, not only by reason of the resulting death of one of our sailors and the pitiless wound-boats of the Baltimore or to the officers who desired to come ashore in the evening, thus establishing a practical boycott on the American vessel.

Chili's unexpected course is partially explain-

THE GOSPEL ARCHIPELAGO.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon, the Fourth of the Series on "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis." Text: "When we had discovered Cyprus we left it on the left hand," Acts 21: 3, and "I John, . . . was in the isle that is called Patmos." Rev. 1: 9.

GOOD-BYE, Egypt! Although interesting and instructive beyond any country in all the world, excepting the Holy Land, Egypt was to me somewhat depressing. It was a post-mortem examination of cities that died four thousand years ago. The mummies, or wrapped up bodies of the dead, were prepared with reference to the Resurrection Day, the Egyptians departing this life wanting their bodies to be kept in as good condition as possible so that they would be presentable when they were called again to occupy them. But if when Pharaoh comes to resurrection he finds his body looking as I saw his mummy in the Museum at Boulac, his soul will become an unwilling tenant. The Sphinx also was to me a stern monstrosity, a statue carved out of rock of red granite sixty-two feet high and about one hundred and forty-three feet long and having the head of a man and the body of a lion. We sat down in the sand of the African desert to study it. With a cold smile it has looked down upon thousands of years of earthly history; Egyptian civilization, Grecian civilization, Roman civilization; upon the rise and fall of thrones innumerable; the victory and defeat of the armies of centuries. It took three thousand years to make one wrinkle on its red cheek. It is dreadful in its stolidity. Its eyes have never wept a tear. Its cold ears have not listened to the groans of the Egyptian nation, the burden of which I tried to weigh last Sabbath. Its heart is stone. It cared not for Pliny when he measured it in the first century. It will care nothing for the man who looks into its imperturbable countenance in the last century.

But Egypt will yet come up to the glow of life. The Bible promises it. The missionaries like my friend, good and great Doctor Lansing, are sounding a resurrection trumpet above those slain empires. There will be some other Joseph at Memphis. There will be some other Moses on the banks of the Nile. There will be some other Hypatia to teach good morals to the degraded. When, soon after my arrival in Egypt, I took part in the solemn and tender obsequies of a missionary from our own land, dying there far away from the sepulchres of her fathers, and saw around her the dusky and weeping congregation of those whom she had come to save, I said to myself: "Here is self-sacrifice of the noblest type. Here is heroism immortal. Here is a queen unto God forever. Here is something grander than the pyramids. Here is that which thrills the heavens. Here is a specimen of that which will yet save the world."

Good-bye, Egypt! This sermon finds us on the steamer Minerva in the Grecian Archipelago, the islands of the New Testament, and islands Paulinian and Johannian in their reminiscence. What Bradshaw's directory is to travellers in Europe, and what the railroad guide is to travellers in America, the book of the Acts in the Bible is to voyagers in the Grecian, or as I shall call it, the Gospel Archipelago. The Bible geography of that region is accurate without a shadow of mistake. We are sailing this morning on the same waters that Paul sailed but in the opposite direction to that which Paul voyaged. He was sailing southward and we northward. With him it was: Ephesus, Coos, Rhodes, Cyprus. With us it is reversed and it is: Cyprus, Rhodes, Coos, Ephesus. There is no book in the world so accurate as the Divine Book. My text says that Paul left Cyprus on the left; we, going in the opposite direction, have it on the right.

The steamer had stopped during the night and in the morning the ship was ground deep enough to get a tear-bottle in which some mourner shed his tears thousands of years ago and a lamp which before Christ was born lighted the feet of some poor pilgrim on his way. That island of Cyprus has enough to set an antiquarian wild. The most of its glory is the glory of the past, and the typhoid fevers that sweep its coast and the clouds of locusts that often blacken its skies, (though two hundred thousand dollars were expended by the British Empire in one year for the extirpation of these noxious insects, yet failing to do the work) and the frequent change of governmental masters, hinders prosperity. But when the islands of the sea come to God, Cyprus will come with them, and the agricultural and commercial opulence which adorned it in ages past will be eclipsed by the agricultural and commercial and religious triumphs of the ages to come. Why is the world so stupid that it cannot see that nations are prospered in temporal things in proportion as they are prospered in religious things. Godliness is profitable not only for individuals but for nations. Give Cyprus to Christ, give England to Christ, give America to Christ, give the world to Christ, and he will give them all a prosperity unlimited. Why is Brooklyn one of the queen cities of the earth? Because it is the queen city of churches. Blindfold me and lead me into any city of the earth so that I cannot see a street or a warehouse or a home and then lead me into the churches and then remove the bandage from my eyes and I will tell you from what I see inside the consecrated deck in the Gospel Archipelago and do you wonder that the sea was populous with the past and that down the ratlines Bible memories descended? Our friends had all gone to their berths. "Captain," I said, "when will we arrive at the Island of Rhodes?" Looking out from under his glazed cap, he responded in sepulchral voice: "About midnight." Though it would be keeping unseasonable hours, I concluded to stay on deck, for I must see Rhodes, one of the islands associated with the name of the greatest missionary the world ever saw or ever will see. Paul landed there and that was enough to make it famous while the world stands and famous in heaven when the world has become a charred wreck.
